But a charge on the subject of the prisoner's statement, that what the law means by believing it in preference to the sworn testimony is when the sworn testimony and the statement conflict in material matters, is not objectionable as instructing the jury that the prisoner's statement cannot avail him unless in conflict with the sworn testimony. Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 129, 9 S. E. 542.

It is not error for the judge, in instructing the jury in relation to the prisoner's statement, to charge that, if they should find the statement consistent and true, they have a right to believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the case; that they should not do so carelessly and capriciously, but under their oaths as jurors, considering the statement in connection with the sworn testimony in the case, and, testing it in the light of that testimony, give it such weight as they might think proper. Keller v. State, 102 Ga. 506, 31 S. E. 92; Smalls v. State, 105 Ga. 669, 31 S. E. 571; Barnes v. State, 113 Ga. 716, 39 S. E. 488.

In Barnes v. State, supra, Little, J., as in Keller v. State and Smalls v. State, supra, when a like charge was before the court, dissented from the ruling of the court approving the charge, on the ground that the instruction deprived the defendant of a material legal right,—of the right to have his statement weighed by the jury and given such weight as they might consider it to be worth, without testing the correctness of it by the evidence in the case, and to have the jury accept the same if they believe it to be true, regardless of the question whether it is consistent with the evidence or with itself.

It is proper to charge the jury that the defendant is permitted by law to make a statement in his own behalf, not under oath, and that it is the right and duty of the jury to weigh and consider that statement; that they may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the case; that, if they believe it, they may accept the unsworn statement of the defendant in preference to the sworn evidence; not capriciously and arbitrarily, but in search of truth; and that there is no presumption touching the defendant's statement,—no presumption that it is true or any presumption that it is untrue. Cornwall v. State, 91 Ga. 277, 18 S. E. 154.

An instruction to the jury that they can give the prisoner's statement just such credit as they think it ought to have, that they may believe it "if they want to do so" in preference to the sworn testimony in the case, or may believe it in part or reject it in part, or reject it altogether, does not authorize them to act arbitrarily in the matter of giving credence to the statement, where the court added an express direction that they should give it such weight and credence as they think it ought to have in determining the truth of the issue. Adams v. State, 125 Ga. 11, 53 S. E. 804.

It is error for the court to charge in a criminal case that the jury should not discard sworn testimony entirely, in order to believe the statement in preference thereto, since the credit to be given to the statement is a question exclusively for the jury. Hayden v. State, 69 Ga. 731.

An instruction requested by the defendant, that the prisoner's statement should be weighed by the jury like all other testimony, and that they may, if they see fit, pass their verdict upon it alone, is properly refused, since, aside from singling out and giving prominence to the testimony of a particular witness, it does not require the jury to believe the testimony of the defendant to be true in order to base a verdict upon it, but authorizes them, if they see fit, to discard the other evidence in the case, however credible, and base a verdict upon defendant's evidence, however incredible. Green v. State, 40 Fla. 191, 23 So. 851.

It is error, after correctly charging on the statement of the prisoner, which, if true, showed that he was guilty of manslaughter, to add: "If the statement is a statement, in your judgment, which demonstrates his innocence, and you believe that statement to be the truth of the case, as I have just stated to you, you have the privilege and it would be your duty in that case to acquit him upon it. On the other hand, if you do not believe that statement to be such a statement as demonstrates his innocence, or if you believe that statement to be untrue, then you may accept the sworn testimony in place of it." Wrye v. State, 95 Ga. 466, 22 S. E. 273.

An instruction that the prisoner's statement would not warrant the jury setting aside unimpeached sworn evidence is erroneous. Durant v. People, 13 Mich. 355. The court said: This instruction was in some measure contradictory of a former portion of the charge which correctly informed them that the statement of the prisoner was entitled to such weight as they should think it was worthy of; for if the jury may give the statement such weight as they think it entitled to, it follows that they may believe it in preference to unimpeached sworn testimony, if, under all the circumstances, and in view of all the evidence in the case, they believe it entitled to greater weight. It is not to be supposed that a jury would give it such greater weight unless they believed it most likely to be true; but, if satisfied of this, there is not, and cannot be, any arbitrary rule which is to prevent them from acting upon that belief, or which can require them to give greater credit to sworn testimony, though unimpeached, when they conscientiously believe it less likely to be true.

An instruction that the jury have a right to take into consideration the statement of the prisoner and give it such weight and credit as they think it entitled to, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, and that they may give it more weight than the sworn testimony of unimpeached witnesses if, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, they honestly believe it entitled to such weight; but, in order to find what weight they ought to give to the prisoner's statement, they should consider whether it is consistent with the other facts which may have been proved to their satisfaction, whether the statement is corroborated or not by other proofs, facts, or circumstances of the case, is not objectionable as laying down an arbitrary or artificial rule by which to estimate the credit due to the prisoner's statement. People v. Jones, 24 Mich. 215.

But a charge that the statement of the defendant, as made on the stand, is not sufficient to overcome the sworn testimony of credible witnesses, although not commended, was held not erroneous in Brown v. State, 60 Ga. 210. In this case Judge Bleckley was of the opinion that where the evidence and the statement conflict, the latter should yield to the former; that, as a general rule, sworn evidence must be more trustworthy than the prisoner's bare word.

Yet a charge that the statement of the defendant in criminal cases "and in this case" is not sufficient, as a general rule, to overcome the testimony of a sworn credible witness, is erroneous as withdrawing from the consideration of the jury the effect which they might have thought proper to give to the defendant's statement "in this case." Day v. State, 63 Ga. 667.

Believing whole or part of statement.

accept defendant's statement in its entirety, and believe the whole of it, and discard the entire sworn testimony in the case, or to discard the statement, or take such portion of it as they desire to believe, and discard the other; that they are to determine the weight and credit they are to give to the statement of the defendant,—is substantially correct, and is certainly not given unfavorably to the defendant. Parker v. State, 1 Ga. App. 781, 57 S. E. 1028.

Where the court had given full and fair instructions as to the statement of the accused, and had distinctly informed the jury that they could believe a part of the statement and reject a part, if they thought a part of it was true and a part of it was false, a charge in the following language, "Find out what the truth of the case is and what the real facts are; and look to the evidence for that purpose, and to the prisoner's statement, if you think it worthy of credit," could not have had the effect of impressing the jury "that they were not to look to, or believe, nor consider any part of the prisoner's statement unless they consider the whole of it worthy of credit." Westbrook v. State, 97 Ga. 189, 22 S. E. 398.

A charge that the jury may believe the statement of the prisoner in preference to the sworn testimony of the case is not erroneous as intending that they must believe it all or none, especially where the court read to the jury the provisions of Ga. Penal Code, § 1010, to the effect that the jury shall give the statement of the accused such force only as they may think right to give it, and may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the cause. Caesar v. State, 127 Ga. 710, 57 S. E. 66.

After the court had instructed the jury with reference to the statement of the accused in the following words: "To this statement you can give just such credit as you think it is entitled to; you may believe the whole of it or any part of it; you may reject the whole of it or any part of it; you may go to the extent of believing it in preference to the sworn testimony in the case,"—there was no error in adding the words, "provided you believe it to be the truth." Mason v. State, 97 Ga. 388, 23 S. E. 831.

Excluding statement from consideration.

That the jury were charged to arrive at their verdict solely from the evidence and the law, and by nothing else, does not erroneously exclude from them all consideration of the defendant's statement, although no instructions were given as to the statement of the accused until the close of the judge's charge. Washington v. State, 124 Ga. 423, 52 S. E. 910. The court said: The charge was not erroneous, especially in view of the oft-repeated rule that "the general tenor of the charge of the court on the trial of a criminal case should be shaped by the evidence alone, and the law applicable thereto," adding, "or, at some stage of the charge

After instructing the jury fully and correctly as to the law in reference to the prisoner's statement, a charge the purpose of which is to inform the jury that they are the sole judges of what the facts in the case are, and that, in finding the facts, they can consider only the evidence before them, does not erroneously confine the jury to the sworn testimony in the case to find the facts, and deprive the defendant of the benefit of his statement to the jury. Tolbirt v. State, 124 Ga. 767, 53 S. E. 327. The court said: It has frequently been held that it is proper for the judge to shape his general charge to the jury upon the evidence alone, appropriately instructing them, however, at some stage of the charge, with reference to the prisoner's statement.

An instruction that the jury, in determining what is the truth of the case, should look to and carefully weigh the evidence before them, is not erroneous as excluding the statement of the accused from the consideration of the jury, where an appropriate instruction had been given in regard thereto. Hoxies v. State, 114 Ga. 19, 39 S. E. 944.

That the court instructed the jury upon a branch of the case, to take into consideration the sworn testimony, and weigh it carefully and impartially, without, at the same time, requesting the jury to consider in this connection the statement of the accused, is not erroneous, where an appropriate instruction had been given in regard to the statement. Knight v. State, 114 Ga. 48, 88 Am. St. Rep. 17, 39 S. E. 928.

An instruction upon the evidence alone, after refusing an inappropriate requested instruction concerning the prisoner's statement, is not erroneous, where it appears from the charge as a whole that the jury were fully informed as to the statutory provisions concerning the statement, and that the accused was given the benefit of all the statement contained, in case the jury should accept the same as true. Lacewell v. State, 95 Ga. 346, 22 S. E. 546.

A charge that, in determining the various questions in the case, the jury must look to the testimony of the witnesses that have been sworn in the case, is not erroneous, although it would have been more appropriate, and would have given to the accused the full measure of his legal right, had the court added, "and the statement of the accused, giving to the latter such force as you think it entitled to receive." Sledge v. State, 99 Ga. 684, 26 S. E. 756.

A charge to the jury that the prisoner's statement is in no sense binding upon them, while not commendable, does not practically withdraw from the jury the consideration of the prisoner's statement, where evidently the judge only meant, and the jury must have understood, that this statement was not binding upon them in the sense that they were obliged to base their finding upon it. Knight v. State, supra.

Charging in language of Code.

In charging upon the prisoner's statement, a trial judge can employ no better language than that embodied in the Penal Code, § 1010, providing that the prisoner's statement shall have such force only as the jury may think right to give it, and that they may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the cause. Rouse v. State, 2 Ga. App. 183, 58 S. E. 416.

It has been said that it would be better in all cases to give in charge the statute and there leave the matter. Brown v. State, 60 Ga. 210; Hendricks v. State, 73 Ga. 581; Ozburn v. State, 87 Ga. 185, 13 S. E. 247.

In Harrison v. State, 83 Ga. 136, 9 S. E. 542, Chief Justice Bleckley said: "But why should the presiding judge be more specific than the statute itself, or go beyond its terms? There is no obscurity or ambiguity in the statute. The legislature has made the matter as clear as can the judiciary. Why should not the legislature be left to address the jury in its own language?"

But it is not erroneous to use other language if the substance of the law is correctly stated. Pitts v. State, 114 Ga. 35, 39 S. E. 873.

It is not error for the trial court to make appropriate comments on the effect to be given to the statement of the prisoner. The court is not limited merely to reading the section of the Penal Code on the subject, without commenting thereon. Strickland v. State, 115 Ga. 222, 41 S. E. 713.

But the court need not amplify an instruction given in the language of the Code upon the prisoner's statement, by telling the jury that, if they believe the statement, they should acquit the accused, or by charging them that they are the exclusive judges of the statement, and authorized to give the accused the benefit of any part of it. Howell v. State, 124 Ga. 698, 52 S. E. 649.

Disparaging charge.

A charge is not erroneous which tells the jury that, in determining what weight, if any, the jury are to give to the statement of the defendant, they should take into consideration his manner upon the stand, his manner of making the statement, what he says and how he says it; consider that he is not under oath; that he is under no penalty to speak the truth; that he is not subject to cross-examination without his consent; that they should also consider his interest in the case, and determine whether or not to give his statement any faith or credit; they should consider it along with all the testimony in the case, and determine whether he is guilty as charged. Hackett v. State, 108 Ga. 40, 33 S. E. 842.

In Morgan v. State, 119 Ga. 566, 46 S. E. 836, the trial judge gave a charge on the prisoner's statement similar to that complained of in Hackett v. State, supra, and, while not approved, it was held not to constitute reversible error.

An instruction which cautions the jury not to view the evidence in detached portions, but to consider the whole of it along with the prisoner's statement, if they believe any of it, and that, if they do not, they may discard it entirely, is erroneous, since the prisoner is entitled to have his entire statement considered by the jury, unaffected by any disparaging intimation by the court that all he said in his defense could not reasonably be accepted as truth. Field v. State, 126 Ga. 571, 55 S. E. 502.

It is erroneous for the court to advise the jury that they may set aside the prisoner's statement solely because he has not adduced cumulative evidence or additional or other testimony to the assertions made in the statement, or some of them. People v. Arnold, 40 Mich. 710.

A charge to the jury that they are to form their verdict upon the facts sufficiently proved, and that the statement of the prisoner is to be considered by them along with the other evidence in the case, but subject to the same tests as to credibility as apply to the witnesses, and subject, therefore, to be received with caution, because of the position he occupies here, is erroneous, since the statute gives to one accused the right to make his statement to the jury unqualified by caution as to the credibility they shall give to it in view of his momentous interests. Andrews v. State, 21 Fla. 598.

An instruction that, in criminal cases, the defendant is not allowed to be sworn as a witness for himself, since it would be too great a temptation to commit perjury, but, while not permitted to swear, the law will not absolutely close his mouth in his own defense, but it permits him to make an unsworn statement as to the whole transaction, is erroneous, since it, in substance, instructs that, in such a case, the accused ought not to be permitted to swear as a witness because he would be under too great a temptation to commit perjury and thus creates the idea that the accused would be under an equal if not greater temptation to speak falsely when availing himself of his privilege to make an unsworn statement to the jury. This error is not cured by the fact that the judge followed this charge with appropriate instructions with respect to the right of the jury to reject or accept the statement of the accused, as they saw proper, but prefaces them with the warning to the effect that the jury should be extremely cautious in believing what the accused said. Alexander v. State, 114 Ga. 206, 40 S. E. 231.

That the court after correctly charging the law as to the defendant's statement, added that he was bound by law to instruct the jury on that subject, is not objectionable as detracting from the force and worth of the prisoner's statement by showing that the opinion of the court was that the prisoner's statement was worth but little, but that he was compelled by law to refer to it. McCord v. State, 83 Ga. 521, 10 S. E. 437. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

An instruction authorizing the jury to consider the statement of the accused in connection with the sworn testimony, and to see if the evidence corroborated the statement, although incorrect, and not happily expressed, is not erroneous, where the judge had previously charged the jury explicitly that they might, if they saw fit, believe the statement of the accused in preference to "all the sworn evidence in the case." Walker v. State, 120 Ga. 491, 48 S. E. 184.

A charge by the court, after stating the statute law applicable to the statement of the prisoner, that the jury should consider the statement in connection with all the evidence in the case in determining what the truth is and what their verdict ought to be, is not objectionable as confusing the statement with the evidence, nor did it take from the jury the right of believing it in preference to the evidence, where the court had, immediately before, charged that the jury might believe the prisoner's statement in preference to the sworn evidence in the case. Sutherland v. State, 121 Ga. 190, 48 S. E. 915.

The court did not err in instructing the jury that they should determine the issues in the case from the testimony submitted to them, considered in connection with the statement of the accused, giving the latter such credit as, in their judgment, it was entitled to, where the court elsewhere told the jury that they could believe the prisoner's statement in preference to the sworn testimony in the case if they believed it to be true. Murphy v. State, 122 Ga. 149, 50 S. E. 48.

A charge that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and that the jury must give his testimony such weight as they think it is entitled to, in connection with all the evidence, if any, which tends to corroborate his statement, should not be given, because it requires the jury to weigh it in connection with all the testimony which tends to corroborate it, instead of with all the evidence. Dennis v. State, 118 Ala. 72, 23 So. 1002.

An instruction that, if the jury find from the evidence in the case that the only persons present at the time of the killing were the deceased and the two defendants, and that no other person saw the homicide committed, and that, if the jury find that the defendants have made a reasonable statement of the facts and circumstances of the killing, and the facts stated by them are not denied or contradicted by any other witness on the part of the state, or proved to be untrue by any other evidence in the case, the jury will be warranted in believing what the defendants state, and finding a verdict in accordance with such statements, —invades the province of the jury, and should not be given. Ballard v. State, 31 Fla. 266, 12 So. 865.

A charge that the statement of the defendant does not directly deny the assault with which he is charged, and that his silence would go far to confirm the testimony of the complainant, is not erroneous. DeFoe v. People, 22 Mich. 224. The court said: The prisoner's statement may be just as significant in what it omits as what it contains; and its omissions as well as its contents may tend to corroborate or impair the facts of the testimony upon which it may happen to bear; and the jury have a right to give it such weight in this and all other respects as, under all the circumstances of the case, they may think it entitled to; and it cannot, therefore, be erroneous in the court to instruct them that they have such right.

A. W. R.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

EDWARD BELL, Plff. in Err.,

GEORGE H. CARTER et al.

Trial — evidence — direction of verdict.

1. Whilst it is true that a substantial conflict in the evidence must be determined by the jury as a question of fact, it is also true that, when the evidence is undisputed, or is so clearly preponderant that it reasonably admits of but one conclusion, the proper disposition of the case upon the evidence becomes a question of law, to be determined by the court.

Conversion by sheriff — prisoner's property — trover — demand.

2. A sheriff, who takes from a prisoner in his custody property rightly belonging to the prisoner and thereafter surrenders it to another, in disregard of the prisoner's rights and in recognition of an adverse claim asserted by another, is guilty of a conversion, and becomes liable in trover, without any precedent demand for a return of the property.

Headnotes by VAN DEVANTER, Circuit Judge.

Case Note. — Liability of officer who turns over articles taken from prisoner to a third person in recognition of the latter's adverse claim.

There is very little authority upon the question presented by the foregoing case.

In Houghton v. Bachman, 47 Barb. 388, it was held that an action in trover will not lie against an officer who has taken certain articles from a prisoner, and has, under the direction of the court, turned the property over to a third party who claimed the ownership thereof. This decision was cited with approval in Smith v. Jerome, 47 Misc. 22, 93 N. Y. Supp. 202, in which case the court denied a motion for a mandatory ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action of trover for the alleged conversion of a gold ingot and certain gold and silver ores. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Van Devanter and Adams, Circuit Judges, and Phillips, District Judge. Messrs. Edward J. Boughton, Ralph Talbot, John H. Denison, and William H. Wadley, for plaintiff in error:

Trover will not lie where a defendant has come lawfully into possession of property, until after demand and refusal to deliver.

Hurt, 114 Ala. 146, 21 So. 468.

Messrs. R. S. Morrison and Emilio D. DeSoto, for defendants in error:

The sheriff was guilty of conversion at the moment he turned this property over to an unauthorized and irresponsible party.

Burton v. Dangerfield, 141 Ala. 290, 37 So. 350; Matheny v. Johnson, 9 Mo. 235.

Mr. A. R. Morrison also for defendants in error.

Van Devanter, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trover for the alleged conversion of a gold ingot and 20 sacks of crushed gold and silver ores. At the trial, which was to a jury, the evidence, without any conflict, established these facts: The defendant was the sheriff of Teller county, Colorado, and as such took the plaintiffs into custody upon a charge of larceny, which was subsequently dismissed. At the time of their arrest the plaintiffs had with them the ingot and ores, and were the right-injunction that the district attorney turn over to the plaintiff certain letters received by him from his wife, and which had been seized by the police upon the plaintiff's arrest for conspiracy.

A somewhat analogous question is treated in the case note to Moss Mercantile Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 657.

Cases involving the liability of an officer who retains in his own possession property taken from a prisoner are not within the scope of this note. A number of such cases will be found in a case note upon Right of officer, in executing criminal process, to take possession of evidentiary articles, to Getchell v. Page, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 253.

ful owners thereof. The defendant took this property into his possession and custody, insisting that it was stolen, and then turned it over to one Burbridge, who was the secretary of the Cripple Creek District Mine Owners' & Operators' Association. Burbridge delivered the ores to the Eagle Ore Sampling Company, and shortly thereafter it disposed of them at the direction of the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association, and paid to the latter the full value of them. Subsequently, when the criminal charge was dismissed, the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant in the district court of Teller county to compel the redelivery to them of the specific ingot and ores so taken from them. In that action the defendant answered under his personal oath, alleging that the property never belonged to the plaintiffs, that their possession had been without right and unlawful, that, after the property came into his possession, he delivered it to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association as the agent of the real owner, and that the property had thus passed out of his custody and into the hands of its true and lawful owner. Without further pursuing their action for a redelivery, the plaintiffs then commenced the present action, charging an unlawful conversion of the property by the defendant. He answered with a general denial.

Apart from a dispute respecting the value of the property, the only possible conflict in the evidence related to the nature and purpose of the delivery to Burbridge. The circuit court was of opinion that the evidence, reasonably interpreted, admitted of but one conclusion; that is, that the delivery to Burbridge was intended to be, and was, a delivery to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association, and was intended to be, and was, a repudiation of the claim of the plaintiffs, and a recognition of the adverse claim of another, of whom the association was claiming to be the agent. A verdict for the plaintiffs was accordingly directed, only the question of value being submitted to the jury.

Without questioning that the verdict was rightly directed, if the evidence reasonably admitted of no other conclusion than the one stated, the defendant insists that there was evidence which made the nature and purpose of the delivery to Burbridge a question of fact for the jury. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider whether there was a substantial conflict in the evidence on that point. If so, the insistence is well taken; otherwise, it is untenable. Whilst, it is true that a substantial conflict in the evidence must be determined by the jury as a question of fact, it is also true that, when the evidence is undisputed, or is so clearly preponderant that it reasonably admits of but one conclusion, the proper disposition of the case upon the evidence becomes a question of law, to be determined by the court. Robinson v. Denver City Tramway Co. (C. C. A.) 164 Fed. 174, and cases cited.

The chief item of evidence bearing upon the question under consideration was the defendant's declaration, in his sworn answer in the prior proceeding, that he had delivered the property to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association as the agent of another claimant, whom he described as "its true and lawful owner." Of course, that deliberate and solemn declaration could not be easily overcome or lightly disregarded. His attention was directed to it when he was testifying in his own behalf, and all that he could say about it was that he did not remember making it.

The substance of his other testimony, which was somewhat contradictory, is embodied in the following extract from his cross-examination:

Q. What date did you deliver this (the property in question) over to the Mine Owners' Association?

A. The same day it arrived in Cripple Creek.

Q. The very day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then it had been arranged in advance that it should be delivered to them as soon as it got there, had it?

A. No, sir.

Q. How did it come to happen, then, on the same day that you delivered it?

A. In taking the ore from the express company's office I met Colonel Burbridge, as I said a while ago.

Q. He was the secretary of this association?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You say you delivered it to him simply for safe-keeping?

A. I turned it over to him, and it was with the understanding that it was to go to the Eagle Ore Sampling Company's vault for safe-keeping, as I had no safe in which to keep it.

Other answers given by him indicated that, shortly after he delivered the property to Burbridge, he was looking to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association, rather than to the sampling company, for indemnification, if he met with loss by reason of what was done. One of his witnesses, a deputy sheriff, testified that he put the sacks of ore in the sampling company's vault at the direction of Burbridge, and also turned over to him the gold ingot; and another of his witnesses, the manager of the sampling company, testified that that company received the ore from the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association and did not know the defendant in the transaction, that the ore was disposed of at the direction of the association and payment therefor was made to it, that the course pursued was the same as in other cases where ore had been seized by the association, and that the gold ingot was not delivered to the sampling company. There was no evidence that Burbridge was a suitable person to be charged with the safe-keeping of the property, or that he had any official connection with the sampling company, or that he had actual or apparent authority to speak for it, or that the defendant exacted from him or it a receipt acknowledging that the property was received for safe-keeping merely. Burbridge was not called a witness, and it was conceded that the gold ingot went to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association, and not to the sampling company.

From this recital of all the evidence upon the subject, it is apparent that the conflict therein respecting the nature and purpose of the delivery to Burbridge resulted from the conflicting statements in the personal testimony of the defendant, and that but for his statement, repeated two or three times, that that delivery was upon the understanding that the property was to be placed in the vault of the sampling company for safe-keeping, the evidence would all have been the other way. That statement is not only without corroboration, but is altogether inconsistent with his statement that he turned the property over to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association on the very day that he reached Cripple Creek with the prisoners and the property, is inconsistent with his conduct at the time and shortly thereafter, is inconsistent with his deliberate and solemn declaration in his sworn answer in the other case, is inconsistent with what was actually done by Burbridge, the association, and the sampling company, and is inconsistent with the reasonable purport and effect of the testimony of the deputy sheriff and the manager of the sampling company. In that situation we think that the conflict in the evidence was unsubstantial, and that, reasonably considered, the evidence that the delivery was actually to the Mine Owners' & Operators' Association, and was in disregard of the plaintiffs' claim and in recognition of an adverse claim, was so clearly preponderant that no other conclusion was reasonably admissible.

It is also said that, as the defendant lawfully came into possession of the property, he could not be charged with conversion in the absence of a proper demand for its return. Ordinarily that would be so; but when such a custodian delivers the property to another in disregard of the rights of the owner, and so puts it out of his power to return it, he makes a demand unnecessary. 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 870 et seq.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. *178.

As it follows that a verdict for the plaintiffs was rightly directed, the judgment is affirmed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IDAHO, Respt.,
v.

L. CHURCHILL, Appt.

Dogs — malicious killing — gist of action.

1. In a prosecution under § 7153, Rev. Stat. 1887, for the malicious killing, maiming, or wounding of a dog, malice is the gist of the action, and must be established to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, in order to justify a conviction.

Same — presumption of malice — burden of proof.

2. In a prosecution for maliciously killing, wounding, or maiming dogs, the state must either show that the defendant entertained malice against the owner of the dogs,

The summary destruction of a dog by a humane society without notice to the owner, when he has failed to procure a license therefor as required by law, does not constitute a taking of property without due process of law. Dogs killing or worrying other domestic animals and fowls.

In Harrington v. Hall (Del.) 63 Atl. 875, a nisi prius case, the court instructed the jury that the killing of a trespassing dog in the act of killing a turkey is justifiable.

A killing of a trespassing dog, which is not doing any injury at the time, is not justified by the fact that it had been a frequent trespasser, and had previously chased and killed fowls, and the owner had been requested to restrain it. Harris v. Eaton, 20 R. I. 81, 37 Atl. 308. See also McChesney v. Wilson, supra.

As a statute permitting any person to kill a dog found out of the inclosure or care of its owner, worrying neat cattle, sheep, or lambs, does not take away the common-law right to kill a dog in defense of one's property, it is justifiable to shoot a dog found killing fowls, if one rightfully believes there is no other way to protect them. Nesbitt v. Wilbur, 177 Mass. 200, 58 N. E. 580.

The killing of a dog, found in one's inclosure frightening and chasing cattle, without any effort being made to prevent it so doing, renders him guilty of a wanton killing, as there is no apparent necessity for killing it. Brookerson v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 421, 93 S. W. 725.

A statute permitting the killing of a dog "found worrying, wounding, or killing any domestic animals outside the inclosure or immediate care of its owner" will not justify killing a dog unless caught in the act. Chapman v. Decrow, 93 Me. 378, 74 Am. St. Rep. 357, 45 Atl. 295.

An act to prevent sheep and other domestic animals being killed by dogs, and permitting the killing of any dog doing damage thereto, will not justify one in shooting a dog that has injured his own dog in a fight. Brown v. Graham (Neb.) 114 N. W. 153.

punishable under a statute declaring it malicious mischief to shoot dogs in malice, sport, or cruelty. Ross v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 108 S. W. 697.

A person traveling upon a highway is guilty of malicious mischief in shooting a dog when 25 or 30 yards from it, merely because it protrudes its nose through its owner's fence and barks. Atchison v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 551, 72 S. W. 998.

It is for the jury to determine whether a dog was "maliciously" poisoned where one whose small son had been bitten by the dog, which, contrary to warnings, he was teasing, after the former had demanded the custodian of the dog to kill it, two weeks later coaxed it from the latter's premises and fed it poisoned meat. State v. Coleman, 29 Utah, 417, 82 Pac. 466.

And, from such circumstances, as the killing was intentional and unlawful, malice may be inferred. Ibid.

In the absence of a denial by the respondent, a conviction of unlawfully killing a dog is justified upon evidence that he told the owner of the dog that he killed it, and no excuse for so doing appeared. Henderson v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 533, 111 S. W. 736.

Dogs are within a statute making one liable for the malicious, wilful, or wanton killing of any animal which it is larceny to steal. State v. Soward, 83 Ark. 264, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1117, 119 Am. St. Rep. 136, 103 S. W. 741.

In a prosecution for malicious mischief in shooting a dog, for the purpose of rebutting a charge of malice, wilfulness, and wantonness, and showing if it was shot by the respondent it was in protecting his property, it may be shown that the dog was shot when among respondent's sheep, and that its presence there would have frightened them and caused ewes heavy with lamb to lose them. Caldwell v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 115 S. W. 597.

Allshle, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was prosecuted on the charge of malicious mischief for shooting, maiming, and killing dogs belonging to one John A. Kelly, the complaining witness. The jury returned a verdict against the defendant, and he was thereupon sentenced to pay a fine. He moved for a new trial, and his motion was denied, and he thereupon appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion. This prosecution is founded on §7153, Rev. Stat. 1887, which is as follows: "Every person who maliciously kills, maims, or wounds an animal, the property of another, or who maliciously and cruelly beats, tortures, or injures any animal, whether belonging to himself or another, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

The chief contention urged is that the evidence wholly fails to establish malice. In the consideration of both the facts and the law in the case, it should be borne in mind that this is a criminal prosecution, and not a civil action for damages, and what may hereafter be said in this opinion will be with special reference to the status of the defendant in his conduct toward the dogs as viewed by the criminal law. It appears that, on January 12, 1908, the complaining witness, Kelly, started out with a pack of 13 hounds to hunt coyotes. The defendant, his wife, and two hired men testified that, sometime before noon that day, a number of these hounds came onto his place, and ran through his corral and barn lot, apparently chasing after his cattle and hogs, and frightening the cows and likewise the hogs; that defendant chased the dogs away several times with sticks and stones. In the afternoon they appeared on several occasions, running through the corral and barn lot, and apparently after the cows and hogs, bawling and yelping as they ran. The defendant, who was at work on a building near the barn, got down from his work several times and drove the dogs away, and, finally, when they were chasing some of his hogs, he got his gun and took several shots at the dogs, killing one and wounding others. Two of the dogs that were wounded were produced in court, and the defendant, his wife, and the two hired men testified that to the best of their knowledge these were the same dogs that were on defendant's ranch at several different times on the 12th day of January, the day on which the shooting occurred. The defendant owned a farm of some 300 acres, and was engaged chiefly in the dairy business. He also had a number of hogs and other live stock on the place. The leading facts in the occurrence are covered by the defendant's evidence, which is substantially corroborated by that of his wife and hired men. It is as follows: "Our cows were in there, and, as many of them were heavy with calf, I had been watching them very carefully. When the dogs ran in there barking, I got down and ran there as quick as I could. At that time they had the cattle bawling and chasing around, and I went after the dogs with anything I could pick up—sticks and stones—and chased the dogs, who were following the cattle down this path going to the river. I chased the dogs down that way, and they would run and look back to see what I was throwing, and dodging. I followed the dogs down this way, and took a circle around this brush. I must have been gone a half hour. I was looking for a man with a gun going with the dogs and I could not find anyone on the place, and I went back and went to work again. . . . Not only would the dogs run through the corral and chase things around, but they chased the calves and pigs in those yards here, and had nearly everything on the place stampeded. I drove these dogs out this way and down that way just as quick as I could each time. The dogs were chasing cows. They appeared to be chasing them. They would run this way and that way. At the time they went in the corral I had no idea they were on any scent. They weren't running in a bunch. Each dog was chasing something individually. The only time I saw the dogs together trailing each other in a bunch, or approaching that, was in the morning when I saw the four. In the evening I saw four dogs out here in one bunch, and I saw three in this corral around the barn. I never saw more than four dogs together that day in one bunch. I began to be pretty well annoyed late in the afternoon. I thought I had had enough of it. About 5 o'clock, just before we were to do our chores, some dogs ran into the corral in this direction and began to chase the calves and pigs here, and I just ran into the house and picked up a gun, a small 22-caliber rifle. I have no other gun on the place. I picked up a few 22 cartridges,—smokeless cartridges,—and I ran out here to this point [indicating], and ran to the barn where the dogs were chasing the pigs [indicating] right in there, and I intended to shoot them right here. I could not get rid of them any other way. I had stoned and sticked them all day, but there were so many animals there I did not dare to shoot them. I chased them down in this direction, and they got into the brush before I got a shot at them. I came back up here between the haystack and the barn. My wife was standing over heré somewhere, and she called to me that the dogs were out in front of the house, chasing the pigs, so I went out in that direction as fast as I could. I ran past the corner of the milk house, and almost on a line with the corner of that fence just about in that direction [indicating south]. That is just about as near my direction as I can point it. I came out at a point just here, and here is where I took a shot at the dogs. At the time I went out there were four dogs chasing the pigs. Each dog was chasing a bunch of pigs. Some of these pigs were brood sows, and I went out there to stop it. Two bunches of pigs were driven off in this direction [indicating], and one bunch was driven over to this fence, and they went through the fence into my neighbor's field. This was at the time I shot the dogs. I shot them while they were in the act of chasing the pigs. At that time on the ranch I had eight head of horses, about 50 cattle stock, a flock of chickens, a flock of pigeons, and over 100 hogs of different sizes. I have mostly Jersey cattle on the ranch, 31 head, and am trying to dispose of everything else. On the ranch that day there were 8 or 9 cows that were expected to calve very soon. One cow dropped her calf within twenty-four hours from the time I shot at the dogs. That was Monday. On Tuesday another cow dropped her calf, and on the following Monday we had another Hereford calf and the Tuesday following another, and on the 28th of January another, making five that have dropped their calves since the shooting. All were milch cows that were on the place. At that time we milked 10 head. The drove of hogs consisted of 8 brood sows, 1 boar, and the balance of the 100 were fair-sized pigs three months old up to pigs that weighed 150 to 200 pounds. One of the sows had farrowed three days before the shooting, and the others were heavy with pig. Since the shooting four of the sows have aborted; that is, produced their pigs prematurely. The pigs didn't live. . . . Twenty-four pigs died. My object in shooting at the dogs that day was to protect my stock, and prevent the dogs from doing it any injury. At the time of the shooting I did not know to whom these dogs belonged. During the day no man appeared on the ranch to look after the dogs or to take care of them."

The state on rebuttal produced witnesses who testified that these hounds were at other places at or near the times when defendant says they were on his ranch, and that they could not, therefore, have been on his place as frequently that day as he and his witnesses claim. This evidence had a tendency to establish an alibi for the dogs for a part of the day, but does not take into consideration the capacity of the dogs for rapid transit between the locus of the alibi and the defendant's ranch. It is admitted that the dogs were there in the afternoon. The state also attempted to rebut and contradict the evidence of defendant and his witnesses by producing experts on the pedigree, traits, habits, and instincts of the dogs, and especially of English fox hounds, such as these were shown to be. It appears that they were full-blood English fox hounds, bred in Missouri and brought from thence to Idaho, and the older ones are referred to by the prosecutor as Missouri hounds. These experts on dog lore testified that such hounds as these would neither chase nor harm domestic animals, and that they would pay no attention to them. They also testified to a personal acquaintance with and observation of these hounds, and that they would not and could not be induced to chase or disturb cattle or hogs. Where the evidence was direct from four eyewitnesses, as was the case here, proof of traits, habits, and reputation, or, as commonly designated, character evidence, would not contradict the eyewitnesses and had no real bearing on the case. The transaction was not established by circumstantial evidence, but by eyewitnesses. Under the rule applicable in cases of homicide, the good reputation of the deceased may not be shown by the state until it is attacked by the defendant. Here the character, or rather the reputation, of the deceased dog was not attacked by the defendant, but only his positive acts and conduct were shown by defendant. This evidence could throw no light on the issue unless it was shown that the defendant knew these traits of the dogs in question. On the contrary, it appears from his own testimony and otherwise that he knew nothing about the traits, habits, or instincts of English fox hounds or dogs of the chase. In the absence of such knowledge in advance, he had a right to act on appearances. In other words, defendant contends that there was apparent impending danger to his live stock such as a reasonable man would resist. Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa, 475; Livermore v. Batchelder, 141 Mass. 179, 5 N. E. 275. The question that confronted defendant was not what the dogs really meant to do (in the absence of positive information to that effect), but what they were doing or apparently intended to do. As said by the supreme court of New Hampshire in Aldrich v. Wright, 53 N. H. 398, 16 Am. Rep. 339, a leading case on the right of defense of property as against the assaults of animals: "He [the defendant] might have entertained, and had good cause to entertain, erroneous ideas of the character of the minks. . . . The evidence against them tended to show what in a human creature would be the ordinary symptoms of a felonious spirit regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief." And again the same court, in considering the question as to whether the defendant was in fact acquainted with or informed as to the habits of certain animals, held that he was not chargeable with such knowledge, and said: "It was not his duty to postpone the defense of his property until, neglecting his usual occupations and incurring expense, he could examine zoölogical authorities, consult experts, or take the opinion of the county on the question whether his 'half-grown' geese were actually endangered in life or limb, etc. The law does not require the farmer who engages in raising live stock to first familiarize himself with the traits and habits of all the breeds of dogs that may infest the country. He may not know the difference between a tramp dog or common cur and a blooded English fox hound with a pedigree antedating the landing of the Mayflower. He may not know, in fact, that the fox hound when he gallops and cake walks up and down the barn lot to the great confusion and consternation of the cattle, hogs, and fowls is merely following the trail of a hungry coyote that had been pilfering the night before, bent on murder and theft; but, on the contrary, he may honestly assume that the hound, himself a trespasser, is bent on mischief, and, if he does not retreat when warned, may at once become liable to forcible ejection. In such case the farmer cannot risk the dangers to his live stock while he investigates the dog's pedigree; and, even if he were advised of that, how can he know at what moment the vicious traits of the dog's remote wolf and jackal ancestors may not get the better of his breeding and social training and run riot in that same barnyard? Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693. Even if it were a fact that defendant knew the traits and habits of the hounds and their alleged kindly and amiable disposition toward his cows and hogs, he had no way of imparting that knowledge to his frightened animals, neither did the cows and hogs have any notice that the hounds, though bawling, yelping, and bay-ing, would not bite, maim, or kill them. They were not informed as to the hounds' pedigree. They, too, were acting on appearances and the instinct of self-protection. The result was that the animals became alarmed and frightened, and as a consequence defendant thereafter suffered a direct pecuniary loss to the extent of 24 prematurely born pigs and 10 per cent falling off in the production of milk.

in their owner's field,—a place where they had a lawful right to be. The hounds were trespassers in the first place. After they had been warned away and sticks and stones had been thrown at them, they became forcible trespassers,—trespassers vi et armis as it were. The assault made by the trespassers upon defendant's cows and hogs was one of apparent danger and peril. So imminent was the peril that the hogs not only retreated but broke the fence, and became themselves kind of involuntary trespassers in the field of defendant's neighbor. The cows, in their alarm, retreated to the wall, and there gave the sign of distress, and sounded the bovine call for help. Now, the question arises: Was it per se malicious for defendant, under these circumstances, to come to the defense of his property, and, in ejecting the trespassing canines, to shoot them? The farmer is not required to fence against dogs. The dogs were unaccompanied by their master, and were undoubtedly running back and forth among defendant's cattle and swine. They were either chasing defendant's live stock or following the scent of a wild animal, neither of which their master owned. If they were only following the trail of a wild animal across the field and through the barnyard, and the defendant had been apprised of that fact and that their intentions toward his kine and swine were honorable and well disposed as would become English fox hounds born and bred in Missouri, then he would perhaps not have been justified in making a deadly assault on them. Of these things, however, he had no notice; besides, he was justified in considering the effect the conduct of the trespassers was having on his cows and hogs, and especially on his gravid animals. He was not obliged to wait until the injury was done and rely on an action for damages to recompense him. The law of trespass is that the injured party shall gently lay hands on the trespasser (manus molliter imposuit), and warn him to move on before further force can be used. In this case the defendant for obvious reasons could not lay hands on the hounds, but he warned them with sticks and stones, but to this they gave no heed. It then became a question with the owner of the premises as to whether the trespassers should be ejected or allowed to scare, frighten, and terrorize defendant's live stock off the ranch. For similar reasons, he could not distrain or impound the hounds.

This is a prosecution where criminal intent is the gist of the action, and must be shown (§ 7153, and subdivision 4, § 6301, Rev. Stat. 1887; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 641; 2 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 428), and differs materially from a civil action for damages for the killing or maiming of such animals. In an action for damages, evidence of the pedigree, habits, traits, and reputation of the dog is important in determining his value to his owner. The admission of this class of evidence was considered by Mr. Justice Wilkes in the cases of Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dew, 100 Tenn. 317, 40 L.R.A. 518, 66 Am. St. Rep. 754, 45 S. W. 790, and approved, and it was said that "there are high and low degrees among dogs as well as among men," and that the dog there involved stood high in "dog circles," and properly belonged to the "blue blood and inner circles of the 400" of Tennessee. The ruling of the court in admitting the evidence in that case was sustained on the ground that it was proper in estimating the value of the dog. There is a great diversity of opinion among the courts in actions for damages as to the circumstances and conditions under which a trespassing dog may be killed. It was aptly remarked by Justice Wilkes in Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dew, supra, that "dog law" is as hard to define as 'dog latin.'" See 2 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 427. Some courts, out of an abundant admiration for the dog, have descanted on his fidelity and good qualities from the spaniel that saved the life of William of Orange (Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365) to the tramp cur "Roger" eulogized in "The Vagabonds;" and in so doing they have generally overlooked the rights of property owners who were subjected to the dog's trespasses. For interesting discussions and notes, see Fink v. Evans, 95 Tenn. 413, 32 S. W. 307; Hamby v. Samson, 105 Iowa, 112, 40 L.R.A. 508, 67 Am. St. Rep. 285, 74 N. W. 918; McChesney v. Wilson, 132 Mich. 252, 93 N. W. 627, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 191; Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, 24 L.R.A. 732, 19 S. E. 734.

From what has been said, it clearly appears that whether or not the defendant could, in a civil action for damages, justify the use of force to the extent and degree it was exercised by him in ejecting the dogs, nevertheless, his action and conduct was in no manner prompted by malice toward the owner of these hounds, nor was it characterized by a wanton and reckless disregard of the rights of property in such animals. The defendant evidently used violence on the dogs through a desire and for the unmistakable purpose of removing them from his premises, and preventing them from annoying and disturbing his live stock. Whether he clearly and accurately measured the force he was using sufficiently to justify him in the eye of the civil law is beside the question here. That he did not act with criminal and malicious intent to wantonly and recklessly destroy the property of another is too clear and apparent to leave any question for submission to a jury on that score. "Malicious," as used in the statute under which this prosecution is had, is not equivalent to the word "wrongful" as used in the law of torts. The former word means more than the latter. It necessarily involves crime, while the latter does not necessarily do so. Chappell v. State, 35 Ark. 345; State v. Hussey, 60 Me. 410, 11 Am. Rep. 209; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, §§ 1068-1070; State v. Phipps, 95 Iowa, 491, 64 N. W. 411; United States v. Gideon, 1 Minn. 292, Gil. 226; State v. Rector, 34 Tex. 565; Note to State v. Robinson, 32 Am. Dec. 661; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 643. The evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict. Instead of establishing malice on the part of the defendant, the evidence negatives malice. However liable a man may be in damages for injury to or destruction of trespassing dogs, it will not do to say that he can be brought to the bar of the criminal courts every time he protects his property against the depredations and annoyances of dogs, whether they be patrician or plebeian dogs.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial granted.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. H. QUEAL & COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

JAMES PETERSON.

Contract — debt of another — consideration.

An agreement in writing by one to take up a past-due note of another if it remains unpaid at a certain future date, without additional consideration to support it, is without consideration, and unenforceable, where the promisor makes no request for forbearance of suit against the maker of the note, and the promisee does not agree to forbear suit; and the mere fact that he does so forbear is not sufficient to establish either such promise or request.

Case Note. — Mere forbearance to sue as consideration for promise by a third person to pay an existing obligation.

That an agreement to forbear to sue in consideration of a promise by a third person to pay the debt of another constitutes a valid APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Lyon County in defendants' favor in an action brought to hold defendant liable on a guaranty. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Simon Fisher for appellant.

Mr. E. C. Roach, for appellee:

A contract to pay the debt of another, made subsequent to the date of the main contract, must be in writing and supported by a distinct and good consideration other than the original indebtedness.

9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 319; Walker v. Irwin, 94 Iowa, 448, 62 N. W. 785; 1 Beach, Modern Law of Contr. p. 594, § 505.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 8, 1896, one Nielson was indebted to plaintiff on a promissory note for $120 then past due, and defendant executed to plaintiff his promise to pay the same in the following words: "In regard to the N.

S. Nielson note of $120 held by you and due September 1, 1895, if this note is not paid by said Nielson by October 1, 1896, I hereby agree to take it up October 1, 1896, for $100." Action being brought against defendant on this obligation, nonpayment by Nielson of his note being alleged, defendant denied his liability on the ground that his obligation was entered into without any consideration, and the evidence showed that, while defendant did voluntarily undertake to satisfy Nielson's obligation for $120, with interest, by paying $100 at a future date, provided Nielson's note then remained unpaid, there is no evidence that defendant requested plaintiff to forbear suit on the Nielson note, or that plaintiff agreed to forbear such suit, or that plaintiff did forbear in reliance on defendant's guaranty. An agreement to forbear for a time the enforcement of a claim is a valid consideration for the promise of a third person to pay. Burke v. Dillin, 92 Iowa, 557, 564, 61 N. W. 371; Rix contract is well settled. The cases so holding are not included herein.

Cases involving a promise under seal to pay, which imports a valuable consideration, are also excluded.

The apparent conflict among the cases on this proposition will, if the language of the courts be confined to the issues presented, and in reference to which the language was used, generally be found to be reconcilable. At first glance it would appear that there is one line of authority holding that there must be a valid and enforceable mutual agreement to forbear between the promisor and promisee in order to support the promise; while still another line of cases hold that such an agreement may be implied from a promise to pay, and other circumstances, followed by actual forbearance in reliance thereon; and still another class of cases hold that a request to forbear, express or implied, followed by forbearance in compliance therewith, may furnish a good consideration for a promise to pay.

These cases, however, are not necessarily in conflict. In the first class of cases, it did not appear that the promisor had requested the promisee to forbear, and the court was therefore merely considering the effect of a mere promise to pay, followed by actual forbearance. And while in those cases, as will hereafter be seen, language was used which would indicate that there must be an enforceable agreement to forbear in order that the promise to pay in consideration of forbearance be valid, yet, as stated, this language was not used in reference to a case in which there was evidence of a request to forbear.

The same may be said of the second class of cases. In those cases there was no evidence of an actual request to forbear. The doctrine of these cases, that a mutual agreement to forbear may be inferred from the promise to pay, together with other circumstances, followed by actual forbearance, is not in conflict with the third class of cases that either hold or recognize that an actual request to forbear, followed by forbearance, is sufficient to authorize an implication of a promise upon the part of the promisor to pay, although the promisee has at no time been bound by a valid, enforceable agreement to forbear. The promise implied in this latter class of cases seems to be a promise on the part of the promisor rather than the promisee; that is, where the promisor asks a forbearance and agrees to pay the debt, it is apparently regarded as a complete arrangement or contract where there is an actual forbearance in compliance with the request. The promise to pay will be implied as of the time of the forbearance. In a way it is a continuing promise.

Reverting to the first class of cases, the doctrine may be said to be well settled that the mere forbearance to sue, although in reliance upon a promise by a third person to pay the debt of another, is not a sufficient consideration to render the promisor liable on the promise. This was the doctrine of Hargroves v. Cooke, 15 Ga. 321, wherein an express promise to pay the debt of another was held invalid under the statute of frauds, because there was nothing contained in the promise to indicate that forbearance entered into the consideration, or that there was any agreement to forbear.

So, in Bieber v. Beck, 6 Pa. 198, the fact that a person undertook to be bail for another to secure a stay of execution, but the entry on the judgment docket was not in such form as to comply with the statute, and was therefore not enforceable as statutory bail, was held not to be sufficient to enable the promisee to hold the promisor on the theory that it was a promise to pay the debt of another in consideration of the forbearance to sue out execution, followed by actual forbearance. The court said that

v. Adams, 9 Vt. 233, 31 Am. Dec. 619. While it seems to have been thought at one time that the promise to forbear which would serve as consideration for a guaranty by a third person must be for a definite time, or for a reasonable time, nevertheless it has been held that, where there is an agreement to forbear, it will be presumed to be for a reasonable time, in the absence of any stipulation as to a specified time. Strong v. Sheffield, 144 N. Y. 392, 39 N. E. 330; Sidwell v. Evans, 1 Penn. & W. 383, 21 Am. Dec. 387. If the creditor does in fact forbear from suing at the request of another, there is a good consideration for the guaranty of the indebtedness in connection with such request. Crears v. Hunter, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 341. But the mere fact of forbearance is not sufficient evidence from which a promise to forbear may be presumed, in the absence of any circumstances from which such agreement may be inferred. Manter v. Churchill, 127 Mass. 31,

As the defendant did not request plaintiff to forbear suit on the Nielson note, and plaintiff did not agree to do so, the fact of forbearance does not indicate that it was in pursuance of a promise to forbear, nor does the forbearance itself imply a request. Had plaintiffs brought suit against Nielson immediately after the execution of defendant's obligation, Nielson could not have defended on the ground that there was an agreement of extension. Therefore plaintiff, having remained without interruption entitled to all the rights which they had against Nielson, suffered no detriment in consequence of the guaranty given by defendant, and, on the other hand, neither Nielson nor defendant received any benefit in consequence of defendant's promise. It is clear that, under such circumstances, defendant's promise to pay Nielson's debt was without consideration.

Judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

the jury found no more than an offer to be bail for a stay of execution, and that execution did not issue within the period, and that it did not follow from such facts that the offer was accepted, and the court added that the acceptance of the offer, if such was the fact, ought to have been expressly found by the jury.

To the same effect, under a very similar state of facts, is Shupe v. Galbraith, 32 Pa. 10.

And in Hoffman v. Mayaud, 35 C. C. A. 256, 93 Fed. 171, where it was sought to hold guarantors on a guaranty of the debt of a third person, which made no reference to forbearance, on the theory that, in reliance thereon, the promisee did forbear, the promise was held invalid as not being based upon a valuable consideration, although for seven months the third person had the benefit of not being sued. The doctrine is here enunciated that "forbearance without an agreement on the part of the creditor to forbear will not be deemed a sufficient consideration. 'There must be promise for promise.'"

The fact that a third person gave an order to a creditor for the payment of a sum of money sufficient to cover the debt of another, and, in reliance thereon, the creditor did not file his claim against the estate of the principal debtor, was held, in Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 18 Pac. 403, not a sufficient consideration to support the order, treating the order as a promise to pay the debt of another. On this subject it is said: "In such a case as this, there must be a consideration to sustain the promise. It is urged herein that the forbearance by the creditor to present his claim against the estate of the deceased and actual forbearance is a sufficient consideration. . . . We cannot see how it became a consideration unless the minds of the parties met on an agreement for such forbearance. There must not only be an agreement to forbear, but actual forbearance. . . . The mere forbearance to sue is not a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay the debt of another."

And in Mecorney v. Stanley, 8 Cush. 85, where it was sought to hold one who signed a note after delivery, upon the theory that he was a promisor, and that the consideration was an agreement to forbear to sue the original maker, the promisee having failed to prove an agreement binding upon him to forbear to sue, the promise was held to be invalid because not based on a sufficient consideration. The doctrine is enunciated that forbearance to sue a third person is not of itself a sufficient consideration for a promise. "To constitute a forbearance to sue a third person a good consideration for a promise by a stranger to the original consideration, it must have been in pursuance of an agreement to forbear." It is, however, said that "it is undoubtedly true that an actual forbearance to sue may often, in connection with other facts, be evidence of an agreement to forbear, and, as such, form a good consideration for a promise."

In M'Farland v. Smith, 6 Cow. 669, defendant addressed a letter to a third person to the effect that, if the writer's brother could make an arrangement with his creditors, the writer would be responsible for payment in one year, and authorizing him to give such assurance to the creditors, which letter was shown to the plaintiff, a creditor, who was, at the same time, assured by the addressee that the letter would legally bind the defendant to pay the debts. It was held that there was no evidence from which the jury could infer an agreement on the plaintiff's part to forbear suit, even though he did, as a matter of fact, forbear for one year, and consequently, even apart from any other objections, he could not maintain an action against the defendant for the debt.

And in Cobb v. Page, 17 Pa. 469, where a debtor had failed and absconded, and a third person told the creditors of the absconder that he would pay all his honest debts, such promise was held invalid because not based on a valuable consideration. From these facts the court said it did not appear that indulgence of the debtor was given, or even thought of. That it could not be inferred from the mere fact that the debtor was not sued or pursued.

An agreement to forbear or give time to a debtor cannot be implied from the fact that the promise to pay by a third person is evidenced by a note running to the creditor, payable one year after date, when the case shows clearly that no agreement with the debtor, nor any agreement taking him into account, was made. Vehon v. Vehon, 70 Ill. App. 40.

To the same effect is Beggs v. First Nat. Bank, 134 Ill. App. 403.

In some jurisdictions, however, apparently very slight circumstances, together with actual forbearance, are sufficient to at least make a prima facie case of an agreement to forbear. Indeed, if the doctrine that mere forbearance would not furnish a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay were not apparently recognized, these cases might fairly be said to establish a contrary doctrine to those just considered. Thus, in Webbe v. Romona Oolitic Stone Co. 58 Ill. App. 222, while recognizing that mere forbearance is not a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay the debt of another, the court held that a written guaranty of the debt of a third person, although it contained no express request for forbearance, or agreement to forbear, was based on a valuable consideration, and was binding upon the promisors, where there was in fact an actual forbearance to sue the principal debtor, together with different payments by the debtor in accordance with the promise to pay, and where nothing whatever was shown to raise a contrary presumption. Under such circumstances it was said that the inference or presumption was that it was agreed by the parties that there should be a forbearance for the time mentioned in the written guaranty.

In Union Trust Co. v. Conus, 129 Mich. 156, 88 N. W. 407, the probate court having ordered a guardian to pay "over forthwith" to his successor funds which he had converted, the latter having put the claim into the hands of an attorney for collection, and a bond with sureties having been executed, conditioned for the payment of the amount in future instalments, the court said that it was a fair inference from all the facts and circumstances that the bond was given to enable the principal to have such additional time in which to pay the indebtedness as would enable him to do so. The court adds that extending the time was a sufficient consideration for giving the bond. Whether there were any "facts and circumstances" other than those already referred to and the fact of actual forbearance, aiding the inference of an agreement to extend the time, does not appear from the opinion.

To the same effect also is Mosher v. Lansing Lumber Co. 112 Mich. 517, 71 N. W. 161.

In Hill v. Omaha, K. C. & E. R. Co. 82 Mo. App. 188, where a third person promised to adjust and settle a matter if the promisee would withhold action for a period of time, which the promisee did, the court said there was no reason why the promise should not be enforced, as it was supported by a sufficient consideration.

So, in Waters v. White, 75 Conn. 88, 52 Atl. 401, where the payee of a note was induced to forbear taking immediate steps to rescind the loan for which the note was given, upon the ground of the maker's fraud, in reliance upon the signing of the note by the maker's wife, her signature was held to be based upon a sufficient consideration so as to render her liable thereon, the court holding that this state of facts authorized an implication that the promisee did agree to forbear.

And in Steadman v. Guthrie, 4 Met. (Ky.) 147, it was said that a guaranty by several persons of the deposits of a bank, made generally to all depositors, was binding upon such guarantors in favor of any depositor who accepted the terms of the guaranty by forbearing to take proceedings to enforce his claim, provided he accepted the guaranty, and notified the guarantors of his intention so to do.

There is also another class of cases which imply an agreement to forbear from the fact of forbearance, together with other facts and circumstances relating to the promise. The evidence in these cases, from which an agreement to forbear is inferred, is of a much stronger character than was presented in the cases just considered.

In Edgerton v. Weaver, 105 Ill. 43, it was said that, "whether actual forbearance, following a promise to pay interest upon interest for forbearance, is evidence of an acceptance of the promise, is a question of fact. If, under all the circumstances in evidence throwing light upon the question, it is reasonable to believe the party acted upon the faith of, and pursuant to, the promise, a jury would be justified in finding that he so acted,—otherwise not. But it is a mere matter of reasoning about human affairs, in which the individual knowledge and experience of the reasoner as to the motives of human action become a factor. It is finding a fact from circumstantial evidence; or, as is said by some writers on evidence, a principal fact from subordinate evidentiary facts. If the question were whether there was an express acceptance by words, there could be no difficulty in perceiving the question to be purely one of fact; yet the only difference between that and the present question is that between direct and circumstantial evidence."

And in McMicken v. Safford, 197 Ill. 540, 64 N. E. 540, where a third person signed a past-due note, in reliance upon which the holder thereof forbore suit, forbearance, together with other evidence, hereafter adverted to, was held to constitute a sufficient consideration to render such third person liable thereon. As to the necessity of a mutual agreement to forbear, followed by forbearance, the court said: "While the plaintiffs in error technically argue that the language used by these parties in this conversation was not sufficiently exact to constitute an agreement of forbearance, we think the proper and natural inference to be derived from it was that Safford proposed that if McMicken would have his sons sign the note, he would give him a reasonable extension of time, and would forbear for a reasonable time to bring suit upon the note that was then due. They did sign the note, and Safford did wait more than three years before bringing suit, which seems to bring the contract within the rule."

To the same effect, also, is Breed v. Hillhouse, 7 Conn. 523, wherein an indorsement on a note,—“I hereby guaranty the payment of this note within four years from this date,”—made after the maturity of the note, was held to be binding upon the guarantor, where it appeared that the holder of the note, in reliance thereon, forbore the collection of the note for the stipulated time. On this subject it is said: “The agreement in question to forbear was clearly proved on a principle of probable presumption which harmonizes with common sense and is conformed to experience; and both reason and experience bear concurrent testimony to the inference of a consideration in this case. The acceptance of the indorsed guaranty by the plaintiff, and his consequent forbearance, prove the agreement in question, and are incompatible with any other supposition.”

Considering this proposition in Boyd v. Freize, 5 Gray, 554, in holding an acceptor upon bills of exchange liable thereon, on the theory that such bills of exchange were accepted to secure the forbearance of suit against a third person, although there was no express agreement to that effect, the court said: “Such agreement may be express, or implied by law. The question, we think, has been between the mere fact of forbearance, without any promise to forbear, and a forbearance in conformity with such express or implied agreement. . . . Whether there was an implied agreement to forbear is a question of fact, depending on the circumstances; and, if they are such as lead to a natural and reasonable conclusion that the new security or other new promise was given to induce the creditor to forbear, and he did in fact forbear, a jury may find that there was such implied agreement or understanding, upon which a court would hold that there was a good and legal consideration to give effect to the new promise. . . . The result, we think, is, that where 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the holder of a debt due, or coming due, presses for payment, and a third party pays part in cash, and gives his own notes on time as collateral security for the residue, and the creditor forbears to take any other measures to enforce his claim on the original demand until the collateral notes become due, a jury may very properly infer an agreement on the part of the creditor thus to forbear enforcing his original claim.”

In Armstrong v. Snyder, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 394, 39 S. W. 379, a third person having written creditors a letter, which the court construed as a promise to pay the claim if the matter were not pressed before January next, to which the creditors replied, thanking him for the guaranty, and asking, as a special favor, the payment of at least part of the claim by the 20th of October, it was held that the inference from the latter letter, in connection with the subsequent conduct of the creditors in declining to press the claim before January, led to the conclusion that the extension of time was based on the previous guaranty, which was therefore supported by a sufficient consideration.

So, where the promise to pay the debt of a third person in itself implied an extension of time, because it was to be paid out of future dividends to be earned, and it was understood that no proceedings would be taken against the original debtor, and none were taken, the promise was held supported by a sufficient consideration. Lansing Nat. Bank v. Coleman, 117 Mich. 177, 75 N. W. 624.

A distinction between the cases already considered and cases wherein it has been sought to hold the promisor on his promise after the promisee has forborne in reliance thereon, and at the request of the promisor, was apparently recognized in Gilman v. Ferguson, 116 Ill. App. 347, where, as construed by the court, the evidence failed to show a request by the promisor of the promisee to forbear to sue a third person, or an agreement upon the part of the promisee to forbear, a promise to pay the debt of another, followed by actual forbearance, was held not to constitute a consideration for the promise. It is said there must be an agreement to forbear, either express or implied. The mere forbearance, voluntarily granted by the complainant, will not suffice. Citing 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 743.

In Mathews v. Seaver, 34 Neb. 592, 52 N. W. 283, a promise to a creditor that, if he would refrain from legal proceedings against a debtor, the promisor would pay the debt, was said to be valid and binding if acted upon by the promisee. In this case, however, the plaintiff alleged that he consented, meaning evidently that he consented to forbear; and the court said that the plaintiff's right to subject the debtor's property to attachment or execution was “waived.”

In New York the doctrine is asserted that, if the promisor requests the promisee to forbear suit against a third person, and, as a part of such request, the promisor agrees to pay the debt, that the forbearance in reliance upon this request and promise is a sufficient consideration to support an action on the promise, although, as a matter of fact, no enforceable agreement to forbear was made. Thus, in Strong v. Sheffield, 144 N. Y. 392, 39 N. E. 330, a wife was held liable on a promise to pay a debt of her husband in consideration of forbearance to sue him, where a promise was made by simply indorsing the past-due note of her husband. The only consideration for the wife's indorsement which was or could be claimed was that, as part of the transaction, there was an agreement by the promisee when the note was indorsed, to forbear its collection, or a request for forbearance, which was followed by forbearance. In reaching its conclusion, the court said: "There is no doubt that an agreement by the creditor to forbear the collection of a debt presently due is a good consideration for an absolute or conditional promise of a third person to pay the debt, or for any obligation he may assume in respect thereto. Nor is it essential that the creditor should bind himself at the time to forbear collection or to give time. If he is requested by his debtor to extend the time, and a third person undertakes, in consideration of forbearance being given, to become liable as surety or otherwise, and the creditor does in fact forbear, in reliance upon the undertaking, although he enters into no enforceable agreement to do so, his acquiescence in the request, and an actual forbearance in consequence thereof for a reasonable time, furnishes a good consideration for the collateral undertaking. In other words, a request followed by performance is sufficient, and mutual promises at the time are not essential, unless it was the understanding that the promisor was not to be bound except on condition that the other party entered into an immediate and reciprocal obligation to do the thing requested."

This case is cited and followed as authority in Niles-Bement-Pond Co. v. Ury, 53 Misc. 305, 103 N. Y. Supp. 226, wherein a request by the promisor for a forbearance to enforce the debt of another, and a promise to pay later, followed by an actual forbearance for a reasonable time, was held to be sufficient consideration for the promise, although no agreement was made to forbear.

This case was also cited with approval on this proposition by that court in Muir v. Greene, 191 N. Y. 201, 83 N. E. 685, wherein the court, in considering the validity of a mortgage executed by a wife to secure the forbearance of a debt owing by her husband, where there had been an actual forbearance in compliance, with a request to forbear, held that forbearance, under these circumstances, furnished a consideration for the promise. It is worthy of note in this case that the collateral promise was payable on demand. Certain provisions therein, however, indicated that there was to be an extension of the original debt for some time. It was held that the fact that the debt was payable on demand under these circumstances was not in conflict with the provision of the bond, which was found to contemplate an extension of time from its date. While the question was not considered in the Strong Case, yet the facts in that case also show that the collateral agreement was either a demand agreement or an agreement to pay within a reasonable time. (This case involves the validity of a promise under seal, and is only used because of its support of the doctrine enunciated in the Strong Case.)

In Crears v. Hunter, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 341, the collateral promise did not in terms provide for any delay in payment, but the court said that it did, nevertheless, indicate on its face, that the parties contemplated that the note might not be sued on for some time. It was therefore said not to be inconsistent with the theory that the promise was made in consideration of an extension of time. This is an interesting case also upon the question here under consideration. In this case the promisor joined with the original debtor in a note which, as stated, did not provide for delayed payment. It did, however, provide for payment of interest half yearly. There was an actual forbearance for some time after the giving of the note, although there was no evidence of any request in express terms by the promisor of the promisee to forbear suit on the original indebtedness. It was, however, held that the request to forbear need not be express, but that it might be inferred from the circumstances, and it was said that the circumstances detailed authorized the jury to infer an understanding between the promisor and promisee that, if the promisee would give time to the original debtor, the promisor would make himself responsible. The jury found in favor of the promisee under an instruction by the trial court in substance to the effect that, if the note was signed by the promisor in order that the plaintiff might give time to his father, and plaintiff did give time, there would be a good consideration for the making of the note by the promisor; and he left it to the jury to say whether there was such a consideration. The verdict of the jury in favor of the promisee was set aside by the divisional court on the ground that there was no evidence of consideration, and judgment was entered for the defendant. On appeal, this judgment was set aside for the reasons already stated. As to the effect of an actual forbearance in compliance with a request to forbear, Lord Esher, M. R., said: "It may be true that there was no evidence of any request in express terms by the son that the plaintiff would forbear to sue the father, but what was the substance of the transaction contemplated in the minds of the parties? Was not the understanding obviously that, if the plaintiff would forbear to sue the father, the defendant would become liable on the note? I take it to be undoubted law that the mere fact of forbearance would not be a consideration for a person's becoming surety for a debt. It is quite clear, on the other hand, that a binding promise to forbear would be a good consideration for a guaranty. The question is whether, if the guarantor requests the creditor to forbear from suing, and the creditor, on such request, although he does not, at the time, bind himself to forbear, does in fact afterwards forbear to sue, there is a good consideration for the guaranty. . . . If, at the request of the guarantor, the creditor does in fact forbear, there is a sufficient consideration to bind the guarantor, who has promised to pay the debt. . . . The question whether the request is express or is to be inferred from the circumstances is a mere question of evidence. If a request is to be implied from the circumstances, it is the same as if there were an express request."

But the fact that a promisor had requested a forbearance of the promise, which was complied with, has not always been held sufficient to authorize an implied promise to forbear. Thus, in Manter v. Churchill, 127 Mass. 31, a mere promise to pay an account of a third person, which induced the promisee to forbear suit, was held not to be founded upon a sufficient consideration, and was therefore said to be a mere nudum pactum. Although the forbearance was at the request of the promisor, the finding of the lower court was to the effect that this request, followed by actual forbearance, did not, under the circumstances, constitute an agreement upon the part of the promisee to forbear. And on appeal the finding was treated as one of fact, and the decision is based thereon. The doctrine is recognized, however, that the agreement to forbear need not be express, but may be implied from the circumstances.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS

v.

ROBERT PIGG et al., Appts.

Intoxicating liquors — Manhattan cocktail — judicial notice.

A Manhattan cocktail is generally and popularly known as an intoxicating liquor, and no proof of its intoxicating character is necessary in prosecutions under the prohibitory law.

Headnote by PORTER, J.

Case Note. — Judicial notice of intoxicating character of mixed drink.

An extensive search has revealed but one other case in which this question has arisen. That case is United States v. Ash, 75 Fed. 651, in which the court said that it would "neither stultify itself nor impeach its own APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County convicting them of unlawful sales of intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. R. McNary, F. J. Lynch, George Hayden, R. F. Hayden, E. D. Woodburn, F. T. Woodburn, and A. E. Crane, for appellants:

To support a conviction the state must not only show that there was a sale made to the parties of a liquor known as cocktails, but what composed the same, and whether or not it had any intoxicating effect upon those who drank it.

Intoxicating-Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751; 37 Am. Rep. 284; Topeka v. Zufall, 40 Kan. 47, 1 L.R.A. 387, 19 Pac. 359.

Messrs F. S. Jackson, Attorney General, J. S. Dawson, and J. J. Schenck for the State.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The information in this case charged the defendant with a number of unlawful sales of intoxicating liquor, and also with keeping and maintaining a common nuisance under the prohibitory law. The jury returned a verdict finding defendant guilty of three sales, as charged in the eighth, ninth, and tenth counts of the information, and guilty of maintaining a nuisance, as charged in the eighteenth count, and not guilty on the other counts.

There is nothing substantial in the claim of error in the admission of testimony. In prosecutions of this kind certified copies of the records of the collector of internal revenue are admissible. State v. Nippert, 74 Kan. 371, 86 Pac. 478; State v. Schaeffer, 74 Kan. 390, 86 Pac. 477; State v. Shook, 75 Kan. 807, 90 Pac. 234. The objection to the question asked of Leona Larson was properly overruled. The question was asked in rebuttal of something first brought out by the cross-examination, and, besides, could not have prejudiced the defendant.

We find no error in the refusal to give the instructions asked. The abstract contains no reference to any evidence tending to show that Grant Richards was a "spotter." In State v. Blackman, 32 Kan. 615, 5 Pac. 173, it was held that a judgment of conviction in a criminal case cannot be reversed for any

In the instructions given the jury were charged that every material fact and allegation necessary to constitute the crime must be proved to their satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, and were also instructed that, if they found the defendant was the proprietor of the place where intoxicating liquors were sold, and that such liquor was in his possession and control as proprietor, and was sold with his knowledge and consent, he would be guilty of a sale, although he might not have performed the physical act of handing out the liquor to the customer himself. This instruction, taken in connection with the evidence, was sufficient. Sheriff Wilkerson testified as to this particular sale, and that at the moment it was made he was standing with the defendant in a doorway leading into another room. The jury found that the defendant was the proprietor of the place, upon evidence sufficient to support such a finding, and the testimony was that this sale was made by someone, not while the proprietor was absent, but while he was present, and when he might have seen all that the sheriff saw. Being the proprietor of the place, the sale was made by some one presumably in his employ.

On the tenth count the state elected to rely upon a sale of two Manhattan cocktails to Leona Larson and Kitty Edie. The precise question raised is that there was no evidence to show that a Manhattan cocktail is intoxicating, and the evidence can hardly be said to have established this fact. The Century Dictionary defines a cocktail as "an American drink, strong, stimulating, and cold, made of spirits, bitters, and a little sugar, with various aromatic and stimulating additions." The particular kind of cocktail under discussion is popularly understood to have taken its name from the island whose inhabitants first became addicted to its use. While its characteristics are not so widely known as those of whisky, brandy, or gin, it is our understanding that a Manhattan cocktail is generally and popularly known to be intoxicating. Apparently the jury held the same view. It has been said by this court: "Whatever is generally and popularly known as intoxicating liquor, such as whisky, brandy, gin, etc., is within the prohibitions and regulations of the statute, and may be so declared as matter of law by the courts." Intoxicating-Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 37 Am. Rep. 284.

A further contention is that the verdict is insufficient and indefinite, and not in the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

form required by law. The verdict, omitting the caption, is as follows :

We, the jury impaneled and sworn in the above-entitled case, do, upon our oaths, find the defendant Robert Pigg guilty on the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth count, as charged in the information, and not guilty on the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eleventh count, as charged in the information.

Geo. A. Anderson, Foreman.

It is insisted that the verdict should contain a separate finding on each count of the information, and that the court, in construing it, has no power to add thereto anything which the jury has omitted. But it is unnecessary to add anything to this verdict in order to understand definitely the jury's finding. It is plain from the language that the jury found the defendant guilty on four of the counts, and not guilty on all the others.

The judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

MARY AMIS QUINLAN, Exrx., etc., of L.
G. Quinlan, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GREEN COUNTY.

County bonds — conditions — construction.

1. The exoneration of a county from its former subscription to the stock of another corporation is a condition precedent to the issuance of bonds in aid of a subscription to railroad stock, where the order for the election contained the condition that bonds

Case Note. — Failure of railroad to comply with conditions on which railroad aid bonds were issued as a defense to them in the hands of a bona fide holder.

This note presupposes that the municipal corporation had authority to issue the bonds in question, apart from any question as to compliance with condition precedent on the part of the railroad company.

It will be noticed that the decision in QUINLAN v. GREEN COUNTY, that bonds issued by a county in aid of a railroad company are not invalidated in the hands of a bona fide holder for value by the failure of the company to comply with certain conditions on which they were issued, depended upon the question whether or not they were conditions precedent, and was reached by in aid of the subscription should not be issued until the county was fully and completely exonerated from the payment of the capital stock voted and authorized to be issued to the former company.

Evidence — stock subscription — lapse of time.

2. The fact that several times the length of time required by the statute of limitations to bar an obligation on a contract to subscribe to the stock of a railroad company has elapsed since the contract was made, without any step being taken to perfect the subscription, may be considered in support of the presumption raised by other facts in the case, that the obligation to subscribe for the stock has been terminated.

County bonds — condition precedent — construction of road.

3. The construction of the road upon a certain route through the county, and the expenditure of the subscription therein, is not a condition precedent to the issuance of county bonds in aid of a railroad under a vote upon a submission of the question whether or not bonds in aid of the subscription should be issued upon condition that the company so locate and construct the road and expend the money.

Same — bona fide purchaser — breach of condition.

4. Bonds issued by a county in aid of a railroad company are not invalidated in the hands of a bona fide holder for value by the failure of the company to comply with a condition on which they were issued, that the road should be located and constructed upon a certain route through the county, and that the money received from the bonds should be expended therein.

In Eagle v. Kohn, 84 Ill. 292, a statute permitting the issuing of bonds in aid of a railroad company provided that the municipal corporation might prescribe the conditions upon which such bonds or subscriptions should be made, and that they should not be valid and binding until such conditions precedent had been complied with. Pursuant to this statute a town voted to subscribe for a certain amount of stock for which bonds were issued, to be subject, however, to several conditions in regard to the building of the railroad, imposed upon the railway company. The conditions were never complied with, and the bonds fell into the hands of bona fide purchasers. In an effort by the latter to collect the interest on these bonds, it was held that, by the wording of the statute, they were precluded from recovering, the court saying: "True, there is nothing of illegality in the bonds in question, nor does the statute declare them void. But illegality is not the circumstance which avoids negotiable securities in the hands of a bona fide holder, as it is seen that illegality of consideration, in the absence of express declaration by the legislature that the securities shall be void, will be no defense against a bona fide holder, without notice of the illegality. It is by force of the peremptory words of the statute declaring them void that they are held to be void in the hands of an innocent indorsee without notice. The words of the statute in question, though not that the bonds shall be void, are, that they shall not be valid and binding until the conditions are complied with. They are equally imperative to the degree named, as language declaring securities void. The bonds are not declared to be, to their whole extent, not valid and binding, but are declared to be, to a certain extent, not valid and binding; that is, until the conditions are complied with." It was recognized in this case that the conditions named were not prerequisite to the making of the subscription and issuing of the bonds, and that it was not necessary that they be complied with before the subscription could be made or the bonds issued, and therefore that, aside from the statute, innocent purchasers for value would enjoy the protection accorded to bona fide holders of negotiable paper, and would not be affected by noncompliance with such conditions. A similar case and holding to the same effect is Parker v. Smith, 3 Ill. App. 356.

In Green County v. Shortell, 116 Ky. 108, 75 S. W. 251, also, a proposition in regard to the issuing of railroad bonds conditional upon the construction of the road through the county and within one mile of a certain town, and upon the further condition that the bonds should not be issued until the county should be exonerated from the payment of the capital stock subscribed to another railroad, was submitted to the inhabitants of the county for their approval. Pursuant to an election favoring the proposition, the bonds were issued and fell into the hands of bona fide purchasers. The conditions, however, were not complied with. In an action on these bonds it was urged that, although the condition in regard to the exoneration of the issue in favor of the other railroad was a condition precedent, the rest of the condition, to the effect that the road should be built in a certain place, was not, but was only an obligation imposed upon the railroad company, for the performance of which the county only looked to it. It was also insisted that it was shown by the record that the subscription to the other railroad was void. The court, after saying that it could not concur in either of these conclusions, and then, after evidently assuming that, even if the latter were true, said: "The meaning of the contract, taken as a whole, is that the subscription is upon the condition that the company shall locate and construct its railroad through Green county, and within one mile of Greensburg, and expend the amount subscribed in the limits of Green county; and the further condition is added that the bonds are not to be issued, or anything paid on account of the subscription, until the county is exonerated from its former subscription to Same — presumption of regularity.

5. Railroad aid bonds issued by a corporation, which contain no recitals as to compliance with the conditions upon which they are to be issued, are entitled to the same presumption, in the hands of bona fide holders for value, as to compliance with such conditions, where proof is made that the proceedings were in fact regular, as though the recitals had been incorporated in them.

Trial — finding — jurisdiction.

6. A finding by a Federal court that one suing on county aid bonds was a citizen of another state and the "bona fide holder for value of the bonds sued on, and fully entitled to sue the defendant thereon in this court," is not a finding on the question of jurisdiction, but on plaintiff's right to recover on the merits.

Bonds — holder — bona fide purchaser.

7. The holder of negotiable county aid bonds lawfully issued is, by presumption, clothed with the character of a bona fide holder for value.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to enforce payment of certain bonds. Reversed.

Statement by Severens, Circuit Judge:
This is an action brought by the plain-the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad. In other words, the bonds are not to be issued until this release is made; and after the release is made the bonds may be issued, but they are to be subject to the condition that the company should locate and construct its road as above set out. The railroad authorities, in applying to the county court for a vote on this subject, intended by their petition for the people of the county to understand that, before any liability was created, the old subscription to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad was to be out of the way entirely; and that, after this was done, the promise of the county to pay was to be conditioned on the location and construction of the road through Green county, and within one mile of the town of Greensburg. . . . The railroad company intended the people to understand, and the people understood, from the paper, when they voted on the subscription, that they were to get a railroad through the county, and that, if they did not get it, their subscriptions, being 'conditioned and to be paid as above stated,' would not be binding upon the county."

In Grattan Twp. v. Chilton, 38 C. O. A. 84, 97 Fed. 145, although, by the recitals in the bonds, the township was estopped from denying their validity in the hands of bona fide purchasers, it was held further, that a proposition adopted by the voters of a township authorizing the issuance of bonds in aid of the construction of a railroad passing through the township and a certain city therein, the proceeds to be given to the railroad when it should complete a line and have cars running thereon to the city on or before a date named, does not require, as a condition precedent to the issuance of such bonds, that the railroad should be constructed entirely through the township, but their issuance was authorized on the completion of the road and the running of cars thereon to the city within the time prescribed.

The following cases, however, depend upon the doctrine of estoppel for their decision:

105 U. S. 323, 26 L. ed. 1121, where a city having authority to make an unconditional subscription to the stock of a railroad company delivered bonds representing on their face that they conformed to the statutory requirements, and that the city's liability thereon was complete, it was held that the city was estopped from showing that it had imposed certain conditions upon its liability, although a statute declared that, in such an event, the bonds should not be binding until such conditions were performed. The court, in distinguishing Eagle v. Kohn, supra, said: "Had the town of Eagle represented, in express words, upon the face of the bonds, that no conditions whatever were prescribed by the people, or that the subscription was unconditional, the state court would not, we suppose, adjudge that the town, as against a bona fide holder, could take shelter behind the statutory provision in question."

Without attempting to exhaust the cases of this nature, the following are also of that class where, by the recitals in the bonds, the municipal corporation was held estopped from asserting its nonliability on the ground that conditions precedent had not been complied with: Oregon v. Jennings, 119 U. S. 74, 30 L. ed. 323, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124; Graves v. Saline County, 161 U. S. 359, 40 L. ed. 732, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526; Keane v. Ft. Scott, Fed. Cas. No. 7,631; Eminence v. Grasser, 81 Ky. 52.

In Provident Life & T. Co. v. Mercer County, 170 U. S. 593, 42 L. ed. 1156, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788, an act authorizing the subscription of aid to a railroad company provided that the bonds should not be binding or valid obligations until the railway had been completed through the county and a train of cars had passed over the same. The railroad was built, but there was some question whether it had complied with the conditions upon which the bonds were issued. It was held, however, even conceding that the condition had not been complied with, the fact that the trustee with whom the bonds had been placed in escrow delivered them, believing that the conditions had been complied with, was sufficient to tiff in error to recover the contents of certain bonds and coupons alleged to have been issued by the defendant in error in 1872, in payment, with other like bonds, for shares of stock of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company. The plaintiff claims to be the holder for value and owner of the bonds and coupons which are the subject of the controversy. By stipulation, the case was tried by the court without a jury. The court made a finding of facts, and declared its conclusion of law thereon. The result of its conclusion was that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff thereupon sued out this writ of error.

By an act of the legislature of Kentucky, passed February 24, 1869, the above-named railroad company was incorporated and authorized to construct a railroad from a point on the Ohio river to a point on the boundary line between Kentucky and Tennessee. Acts of Kentucky 1869, vol. 1, p.

463, chap. 1578. In the course of its authorized route was Green county, the defendant in this suit. With a view, apparently, to enable the counties along its route to aid the railroad company in the construction of its road, authority for that purpose was conferred by the act as follows: "Sec. 15. That any city, town, or county through which said proposed road shall pass is hereby authorized to subscribe stock in said railroad company in any amount any such city, town, or county may desire; and that the county court of any such county is authorized to issue the bonds of their respective counties in such amount as the county court may direct; and the chairman and board of trustees, or mayor and aldermen of any town, and the mayor and aldermen or council of any city, are hereby authorized to issue the bonds of their respective towns or cities in like manner. All said bonds shall be payable to bearer, with coupons attached, make them valid in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value and before maturity, nothing appearing in the bonds to the contrary.

In Jefferson v. Jennings Bkg. & T. Co. 35 Tex. Civ. App. 74, 79 S. W. 876, it was held that one who purchased municipal bonds issued to aid in the construction of a railroad, and who knew nothing about the bonds except what appeared on their face, was an innocent purchaser for value, whose right to recover on the same could not be defeated by the alleged fact that land acquired by the city in exchange for the bonds, which was to be used for depot purposes, was not so used.

In Graves v. Saline County, supra, it was held that the issuing of funding bonds of a county in pursuance of statute, on a vote by the people of the county, to take up other bonds issued by it on a subscription to railroad stock, which were invalid because a condition of such subscription was not complied with, was a declaration by the people that there was a substantial compliance with the original condition; and such funding bonds will be valid in the hands of a bona fide holder, where the original subscription might have been unconditional.

In Brooklyn v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 99 U. S. 362, 25 L. ed. 416, notices for an election in regard to the issuing of railroad aid bonds expressly stated that no bonds in payment of any subscription should be issued, draw interest, or be delivered to the company until the railroad was completed and cars running through the town; these conditions were afterwards repeated in the formal subscriptions; subsequently it was rumored that the railroad would not be built through the town, and the authorities then notified the railroad company that unless the railroad were built and completed as promised the bonds would not be issued; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

thereupon the railroad company assured the town and citizens that they intended to complete the railroad as promised; relying upon such promise the bonds were issued, falling finally into the hands of bona fide purchasers; the railroad, however, was never built. In an action by one of these bona fide purchasers upon certain interest coupons detached from these bonds, the court said: "These assurances were credited, and, in reliance upon them, the supervisor and clerk executed and delivered the bonds, knowing, at the time, that the conditions imposed by popular vote as well as by the terms of the subscription had not been complied with. Thus was faith in the promises of a railroad company substituted for a contract which, had the town stood upon it, would either have secured the construction of the road, as contemplated, or guarded its people against a burden which has been imposed upon them through the fraudulent conduct of railroad officials, and the violation, by its own officers, of the trust committed to them. By the act of the town's constituted authorities, who, by the statute, had the right, under certain circumstances, to execute and deliver the bonds and coupons, the railroad company was enabled to put them upon the money market in advance of the construction of the road. It is now too late for the town to claim exemption, as against bona fide purchasers, upon the ground that the railroad company disregarded its promise to construct the road, or upon the ground that its own officers delivered the bonds in violation of special conditions, of which the purchasers had no knowledge or notice, either from the statute or otherwise. The remedy of the city is against the railroad company and its own unfaithful officers who, it is alleged, were in fraudulent combination with the company."

bearing any rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually in the city of New York, payable at such times as they may designate, not exceeding thirty years from date; but before any such subscription on the part of the city, town, or county shall be valid or binding on the same, the mayor and aldermen, or chairman and board of trustees of any town, the mayor and aldermen or council of any city, and the county court of any county having jurisdiction, shall submit the question of any such subscription to the qualified voters of such city, town, or county in which the proposed subscription is made, at such time or times as said chairman and board of trustees, or mayor and aldermen of any city, or the county court of any county, as aforesaid, may, by order, direct; and should a majority of the qualified voters voting at any such election vote in favor of subscribing said stock in said railroad company, it shall be the duty of such county court, trustees, or other authorities aforesaid, to make the subscription in the name of their respective cities, towns, or counties, as the case may be, and proceed to have issued the bonds to the amount of such subscription as hereinbefore directed." And it was further provided that the application for such proceedings might be made to the judge of the county court instead of the court; whereupon he was vested with the same power. And the railroad company was authorized to "receive subscriptions of stock to their company by individuals, towns, cities, counties, or other corporations, whether payable in money or other things, with such terms and times of payment, conditions annexed, and kind of payment that may be set forth in the subscription."

On June 17, 1869, upon the request of the commissioners of the railroad company, above named, the judge of the county court entered the order following:

"Present, Thos. R. Barnett, Judge.

"Whereas the commissioners of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, by virtue of the authority delegated to them by the charter of said company, have requested the county court of Green county to order an election in the said county of Green, and to submit to the qualified voters of said county the question whether said county court shall subscribe for and on behalf of said county, $250,000 to the capital stock of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, and payable in the bonds of said county, having twenty years to run, and bearing 6 per cent interest from date, and upon condition that said company shall locate and construct said railroad through the said county of Green, and within one mile of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the town of Greensburg, in said county, and shall expend the amount so subscribed within the limits of Green county; and also upon the further condition that said bonds shall not be issued or said county pay any part of the principal or interest on said amount subscribed to said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, until said county of Green is fully and completely exonerated from the payment of the capital stock voted by said county, and authorized to be subscribed by said Green county court to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad or any part of the interest thereon. It is therefore ordered by the court that an election by the qualified voters of Green county, at the voting places in said county, be held and conducted by the several officers as prescribed by law for holding elections on the 3d day of July, 1869, to vote on the question as to whether or not the said county court shall, for and on behalf of said county, subscribe $250,000 to the capital stock of the said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad, conditioned and to be paid, as above stated."

The election was held. The vote was in favor of the proposition and was so properly certified. Thereafterwards, and on June 3, 1870, the county judge made an order, wherein, after reciting the proceedings above recited, he says: "I . . . do hereby subscribe for $250,000 of the capital stock of the said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company for and on behalf of said county of Green, which subscription is to be paid in the bonds of said county as prescribed in said order of submission, and this subscription is made with the conditions set out in the order of this court ordering said election and now of record in the office of this county." On October 12, 1871, the county judge ordered the bonds to be printed. The bonds, of which these in suit were a part, were issued and delivered to the railroad company during the succeeding year, 1872, the bulk of them on or about August 15th, on which day the county judge made the following order:

"Present, Thos. R. Barnett, Judge.

"Application was this day made to the presiding judge of the county court of Green county, by the president and board of directors of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, to issue the balance of the bonds of said county to the amount of the subscription of said county of Green to said Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, and the court being sufficiently advised, it is ordered by the court that the balance of said bonds be and they are hereby ordered to be issued, the same to be signed by the judge of said county court of Green county, and countersigned by the clerk of said court, as required by the charter of said company."

Thereupon the $250,000 of the capital stock of the railroad company was delivered to the county, which has since been retained and owned by it. For a time the county raised by tax and paid the interest accruing on the bonds, but thereafter it refused to recognize their validity, and refused to make further payment. The plaintiff is the bona fide holder for value of the bonds and coupons in suit, but had notice that the railroad had not been built further than from the north line of said county to Greensburg, which is about one quarter of the way through the county. As to this latter fact, it may be noted in this connection that only $150,000 of the proceeds of the bonds had been expended by the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company in the construction of the road, and this was on that part of the road north of Greensburg. This expenditure did not complete that portion of the road, but it was completed by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company under the stipulation in a lease to it of its road by the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company, but at what cost does not appear. In respect to the conditions of the subscription for stock to pay which these bonds were voted, the facts were these: In 1868, at an election in Green county, it had been voted to subscribe for $300,000 of the stock of the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company, to be paid for in the bonds of the county. Upon making a record of this election the county court made the following order: "It is now therefore ordered that the clerk of this court, for and on behalf of the county of Green, make said subscription on the terms specified in the order submitting the question to a vote, as aforesaid." But nothing further was ever done in regard to such a subscription, either by the county or the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company. No stock was issued to the county or bonds issued to the railroad company. Some further incidental facts will be hereafter mentioned in the opinion in the discussion of the questions involved in the controversy. The bonds in suit, except the numbers given to each bond and the amount therein specified, were in the form following:

United States of America, county of Green,
$500. State of Kentucky.

For the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad.

Twenty years after date, the county of Green, in the state of Kentucky, will pay to the holder of this bond the sum of five hundred dollars with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable semiannually upon the presentation of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

proper coupons hereto attached, for the principal and interest being payable at the bank of America, in the city of New York.

In testimony whereof, the judge of said county of Green has hereunto set his hand and affixed the seal of said county, on the first day of April, A. D. 1871, and caused the same to be attested by the county clerk, who has also signed the coupons hereto attached.

[Green County seal.]

T. R. Barnett, Judge.

D. T. Towles, Clerk.

The conclusion of law by the court below was "that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, because the conditions upon which the subscription for the capital stock of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company was made, and upon which the bonds sued on were issued, have not been performed or complied with."

Argued before Lurton, Severens, and Richards, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. John J. McHenry, John C. Doolan, and Attila Cox, Jr., with Messrs. Edmund F. Trabue and George DuRelle, for plaintiff in error:

The bona fide holder has a right to presume the bonds were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority.

Mr. Ernest Macpherson for defendant in error.

Severens, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions to be decided upon the facts found, the substance of which has been stated, and the proper inferences to be drawn therefrom, are these: First, whether it should be held that the county of Green had been exonerated from the payment of the subscription for the capital stock of the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company; and, second, whether these bonds are invalid in the hands of the plaintiff by reason of the fact that only $150,000 of the proceeds of the bonds have been expended in the construction of the road in Green county, or by reason of the fact that the same has not been built through the county. These questions turn largely upon the proper interpretation of the so-called conditions upon which the county authorized these bonds to be issued.

Upon our conference after the original argument in this court, we were in doubt upon some of the questions presented for decision, and certified them to the Supreme Court for its opinion. One,—the first of the questions,—as that court thought, involved too many points. But we requested that, if that question should be deemed too broad, then that the court should advise us whether, “assuming the facts to be as found, was a bona fide purchaser before maturity of these bonds and coupons, for value, entitled to assume in his purchase that Green county had, before their issuance, been fully and completely exonerated from the payment of the capital stock subscribed for by the county court of said county for and in behalf of said county to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company?” The Supreme Court answered this question as follows: “Construing the second question to inquire, not whether there is conclusive presumption, but whether, on the facts found, there is any presumption at all, that the county had been exonerated from its former subscription to another railroad, we answer it ‘Yes.’” Quinlan v. Green County, 205 U. S. 410, 51 L. ed. 860, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 505. On receiving this answer, we heard further argument upon the consequences of the opinion given by the Supreme Court as well as upon the question of the character of the other so-called conditions about which the Supreme Court expressed no opinion.

We agree that the exoneration of Green county from any liability on account of its former subscription to another railroad was a condition precedent to the issuance of the bonds, and that, without the accomplishment of this condition, the plaintiff cannot recover. We concede this, although we cannot help thinking that there is room for the belief that the legislature of Kentucky intended that the county judge should determine when and whether the condition had been accomplished, and that to hold otherwise is to suppose that these bonds, although they were, by the terms of the statute, to be negotiable coupon bonds, would, although issued and put upon the market, yet be clogged with doubt of their validity,—a doubt which even now might be and still is urged against them. Such bonds would not be marketable, and their purpose would be utterly defeated. For this reason it has sometimes been held that, although the statute does not expressly nominate any officer who is to pass upon the execution of the condition precedent to the issue of such bonds, yet that, in view of the consequences, an implication might arise that the legislature intended that the officer of the municipality in whose behalf he was acting, and who was charged with the custody and the issuance of the bonds, should, before delivering them, ascertain and determine whether the condition had been complied with. Especially would this be so when the question whether there had been a compliance is one which calls for the exercise of judgment upon facts with which he would be most conversant. It is true that, in most of these cases, perhaps in all, there were recitals in the bonds of the regularity of the anterior proceedings or the fulfilment of conditions precedent; but it would seem that, for other reasons, if it is intended by the statute that the determination of the fact is committed to the official who issues the bonds, such determination ought to settle the fact. If, in such conditions, the bonds should be issued without such determination, the question would be open. But here the county judge acted advisedly. In the order that the bonds be issued, he recites that he was sufficiently advised,—borrowing an expression from legal procedure to denote that he had taken notice of and considered the question whether the conditions existed which authorized the issuance of the bonds; in other words, that he had exercised the function devolved upon him. Granting what must be regarded as settled by authority, that when the condition consists of a distinct and indubitable fact, and nothing is left to the judgment of the official charged with the delivery of the bonds, his delivery of them without the occurrence of the condition would be unauthorized and the bonds be void, yet it would seem, upon principle, that if the question whether the condition has been accomplished is one of doubt and uncertainty, and it is apparent that the officer who has charge of the issuance of the bonds is to determine the fact of compliance with the condition, his determination would conclude the question, and, if in the affirmative, bind the county. This is, as we understand, the doctrine on which the judgment of the Supreme Court in Provident Life & T. Co. v. Mercer County, 170 U. S. 593, 604, 42 L. ed. 1156, 1161, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788, was finally rested. But, without pursuing that subject further, we are of opinion that, upon other grounds, the question whether Green county was exonerated from the obligations of the former vote should be determined in the affirmative. We may say in passing that there seem to be grave reasons for doubting whether Green county ever came under an obligation to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company. The subscription was voted, and the county court ordered its clerk to subscribe for the stock. But that was all. The clerk did not subscribe. No bonds were ever issued, and no stock was ever delivered or tendered to the county. In Bates County v. Winters, 112 U. S. 325, 28 L. ed. 744, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 157, Chief Justice Waite, after referring to previous cases, summed up the rule as follows: "That rule may be stated thus: An actual manual subscription on the books of a railroad company is not indispensably necessary to bind a municipality as a subscriber to the capital stock. If the body or agency having authority to make such a subscription passes an ordinance or resolution to the effect that it does thereby, in the name and on behalf of the municipality, subscribe a specified amount of stock, and presents a copy of that ordinance or resolution to the company for acceptance as a subscription, and the company does, in fact, accept, and notifies the municipality, or its proper agent, to that effect, the contract of subscription is complete, and binds the parties according to its terms."

This is a careful and undoubtedly correct statement of the law upon the subject. See also Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 61, 134; Greene v. Sigua Iron Co. 31 C. C. A. 458, 88 Fed. 203. The county judge might well have thought that, as there had been no complete subscription by an actual subscription, and by the acceptance and notification of the railroad company, the county was exonerated from its vote to authorize the proposed subscription. The language of the condition is that the county shall be "exonerated from the payment of the capital stock voted by said county and authorized to be subscribed by said Green county court to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad." This does not import that a completed subscription had been made, but only that a subscription had been authorized by the former vote; and the county would be exonerated if the subscription which it had authorized was not completed so as to bind the county. These bonds were not issued until four years after the vote of the county authorizing the subscription for stock of the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company had been taken and recorded. Meantime, this latter company had given no token of its acceptance, and the county had taken no further step after the direction of the county court to its clerk to make the subscription upon the terms specified in the order submitting the question to a vote. And the subscription was never completed. What more complete exonerated from its former vote could the county of Green have? But, to return to the line of reasoning which we were intending to pursue, we are advised by the answer of the Supreme Court that there was, upon the facts found, a presumption in favor of the bonds that the county had been exonerated from the vote to subscribe to the other railroad stock; not a conclusive presumption, but one that might be controverted. But there is nothing in the facts found which controvert it. On the contrary, the facts confirm the presumption. A long time has elapsed since the vote of the county authorized a subscription to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company's stock, several times the length of time required by any statute of limitations, even supposing there had been a complete agreement for the subscription, and no step had been taken. If it be said that the condition must have existed when the bonds were issued in order to make them valid, and that the lapse of time since is immaterial, the answer is that though, in one sense, this is true, yet, in another sense, it is important, for the fact that nothing had since been done by either party upon the footing of the vote is pregnant evidence to show that, when these bonds were issued, neither the county nor the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company regarded itself as under any contract relations with the other. It may be that, if a formal release was necessary, there might be some weight in the suggestion that the trial court has found that no such release was ever given, and that this would controvert the presumption that the county had been exonerated. But, as the Supreme Court said in its opinion, "no formal release was necessary. "It [the condition] was completely fulfilled if, from any circumstance, it should appear that the county had been effectively relieved from any liability on account of the vote in aid of the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad."

We come, then, to the question whether the other provisions of the vote on which the bonds in suit were issued, namely, "that said company shall locate and construct said railroad through said county of Green . . . and shall expend the amount so subscribed within the limits of Green county," were conditions precedent to the issue of the bonds, or were stipulations imposed upon the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company by its acceptance of the subscription. The acceptance of a contract or an obligation which also in terms imposes obligations upon the obligee, and whereupon the latter seeks and obtains the benefit of the contract, binds the latter for their performance, although he may not have expressly undertaken to be bound. Bishop, Contr. 2d ed. § 203; 1 Parsons, Contr. 9th ed. § 13, note 1; Storm v. United States, 94 U. S. 76, 24 L. ed. 42.

The question whether the performance of a stipulation in a contract is a condition precedent to the performance of other stipulations in it depends upon the order in which the parties intend the several stipulations to be performed. The calling of a provision or stipulation a condition is not conclusive, and if, from the contract or other circumstances, it is seen that it was not the intention of the parties that its performance should be a condition precedent, it will not be held to be such. Stanley v. Colt, 5 Wall. 119, 18 L. ed. 502; Union Stockyards Co. v. Nashville Packing Co. 72 C. C. A. 195, 140 Fed. 701, 704; Sohier v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1; Greene v. O'Connor, 18 R. I. 56, 19 L.R.A. 262, 25 Atl. 692; Scovill v. McMahon, 62 Conn. 378, 21 L.R.A. 58, 36 Am. St. Rep. 350, 26 Atl. 479; Hartung v. Witte, 59 Wis. 285, 18 N. W. 175. "Conditions have no idiom," said Virgin, Judge, in Bucksport & B. R. Co. v. Brewer, 87 Me. 295. "Whether they be precedent or subsequent is a question purely of intent, and the intention must be determined by considering not only the words of the particular clause, but also the language of the whole contract, as well as the nature of the act required and the subject-matter to which it relates." Conditions are not favored, and a provision will not be construed as such unless the intention is clear. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 502; Clapham v. Moyle, 1 Lev. 155; Shep. Touch. 122; Huff v. Nickerson, 27 Me. 106. "Where the language of an agreement can be resolved into a covenant," said Bell, Judge, in Paschall v. Passmore, 15 Pa. 295, 307, "the judicial inclination is so to construe it; and hence it has resulted that certain features have ever been held essential to the constitution of a condition. In the absence of any of these, it is not permitted to work the destructive effect the law otherwise attributes to it."

The question we are now considering was mentioned, but not passed upon, by the Supreme Court, because it was not included in our request for its opinion. But we think it apparent, for many reasons, that the performance of these conditions, so called, was not intended to be required before the delivery of the bonds. The subscription for the stock of a railroad company by a municipality, and the issue of negotiable bonds in payment therefor for the purpose of providing means to assist in the construction of a railroad within its limits, is a transaction familiar to everyone. It is not a transaction whereby the municipality contracts with the company to build a road, but is intended to provide means to assist the company in building it, in consideration of acquiring a part of its stock, and of the expected advantages of the road to the community. The statute of Kentucky under which these bonds were 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) issued indicates very clearly, as we think, that the bonds authorized were expected to be negotiated for the means to use in the construction of the road. It is provided that they shall be payable to the bearer, that they shall have interest coupons attached payable semiannually in the city of New York, and that the bonds shall be payable at a designated time, which may be as long as thirty years after their date. They were thus required to possess the attributes of commercial paper adapted to sale in public markets. And the proposition on which the electors of Green county voted followed in all particulars the provisions of the statute. And when it was provided that the company "shall expend the amount so subscribed within Green county," we cannot doubt that what was meant was that the proceeds of those bonds should be so used, and not, as has been suggested, that the company should have expended some other money equal in amount to the bonds. Such a construction as would lead to the result suggested would leave the company without the ready means to build the road which it was the purpose to provide for. Moreover, there is a plain distinction made in the proposition voted in the very terms employed. In regard to the requirements we have been last considering, the question was whether the county would subscribe for the stock and pay for it in county bonds, upon condition that the company should construct its road as mentioned; but where the proposition comes to the matter of the exoneration from the vote to the other railroad, that was expressly made a condition to the issuance of the bonds or the payment of any part of them. The failure to append this condition to the preceding provisions, and the introduction of the positive inhibition here employed, are persuasive evidence that a distinction was contemplated in the vote. To bear the construction that the former were intended to be conditions precedent, we should need to have the inhibition located in those clauses also. The abrupt change is significant of a difference in purpose.

Other reasons are also suggested by counsel; but we cannot doubt that, for those we have mentioned, the proper construction to be given to the proposition submitted to, and authorized by, the electors of Green county, is that the railroad company should, upon its acceptance of the subscription, and the delivery of the stock by one, and of the bonds of the other, come under an obligation to comply with those terms of the proposition voted. And we reach this conclusion without regard to the question of an estoppel arising upon the fact that the county accepted the stock, and has continued to retain it. If the question of the intention were in doubt, the interpretation given by the county to its vote by paying the interest would be persuasive of its understanding at the time of the transaction. We think the bonds were lawfully issued, and that the fact that the company has not performed the stipulations of the agreement which it made as a consideration for the bonds does not invalidate them, when, as appears, the delivery of the bonds was final, and they have passed into the hands of other parties for value, as it was the evident intention of the statute that they would do. We need not inquire whether the county could have made a partial defense against these bonds upon the ground that there had been a partial failure of consideration if the railroad company had held them and were now bringing suit upon them. The holder of negotiable paper is entitled to the benefit of the presumption prima facie that he or some previous holder whose title he has acquired is a purchaser in good faith and for value before maturity, in the usual course of business, and without notice of any circumstances impeaching its validity; and that he is the owner thereof, if it is payable to bearer. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 812. Nothing is here shown to contravene these presumptions. Of course, it must always appear that the obligor was competent in law to incur the obligation, and had in fact attempted to incur it. We do not understand that the absence of a recital in municipal bonds that the conditions to their issue have been complied with deprives them of their character of negotiable instruments or of the ordinary presumptions which attend such instruments. Recitals of that character relate to the regularity of the proceedings precedent to their issue, and, if the recitals cover the necessary facts, conclusively establish it. But when, in a case where there are no such recitals, proof is made that the proceedings were in fact regular, the bonds are entitled to the same presumptions in their subsequent negotiation as if they had contained such recitals.

It is suggested that the finding of the court "that the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of New York, and was so when this action was instituted on the 28th day of March, 1899, and that the plaintiff was the bona fide holder for value of the bonds and coupons sued on, and fully entitled to sue the defendant thereon in this court," was intended only to say that the citizenship of the plaintiff was such as to entitle him to sue in the Federal court. But this court, in its question to the Supreme Court, construed this finding to be also a finding that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder for value, and the Supreme Court certainly so construed it, as is shown in the statement of facts, and, we have no doubt, correctly. That part of the finding of facts had no relevancy to the question of jurisdiction. If she was a citizen of New York, and was the holder of the bonds, she was entitled to sue. The question of whether she was a bona fide holder for value was a question upon the merits of the case. The phrase which the court below employed was one peculiar to the law of negotiable instruments, and ought to be construed in the sense in which it is there employed. But it really is not material. If, as we hold, the bonds were lawfully issued, the presumptions of law would clothe the plaintiff, if she was the holder, with the character of a bona fide holder for value.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the bonds and coupons, with interest on the coupons from the time they severally fell due, and interest on the principal of the bonds from the date when the latest coupons thereon severally fell due.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

I must in this case, and contrary to the usual practice of this court, express openly the grounds for my dissent to the conclusions reached in this case.

The county has not obtained a road constructed by the company to whose stock it proposed to subscribe. Its money has been thrown away. This suit involves its probable liability upon an issue of bonds aggregating $250,000. This series of bonds, with interest already past due, aggregate three fourths of a million. For this the county will obtain nothing. To prevent just such a possible result the legislature provided that subscriptions by counties might be voted conditionally. The conditions which the county demanded were intended to absolutely secure the building of the road. By subtlety of construction, upon which I express no opinion, two of these conditions are said now to be only covenants, and, therefore, worthless against an insolvent and nonexistent railway company. For at least thirty years the county has denied its liability, and refused payment of interest. When this denial had been so long acquiesced in that the bonds were purchaseable for little more than the value of wall paper, as stated at the bar, they are acquired by speculators, who now urge that, during all this long, long period of repudiation, the defense of the county has been growing weaker and weaker, and that time, which usually only fortifies a defensive position, has all this time been making bonds valid which were invalid when issued. I will not willingly aid in the destruction of the settled principles which tend to the security of commercial paper. Neither will I agree to strain a finding of facts to hold a county upon obligations which, in my judgment, were never binding either in the forum of law or conscience.

The principal grounds upon which I find myself unable to agree with the court are these:

1. The opinion and conclusion conflicts with the settled views of the Supreme Court in respect to the most important ground upon which it rests. Assuming that the mere fact of issuing these bonds by the county judge was a determination that the conditions had been complied with which authorized their issuance, that determination only raised a presumption in favor of one who should take the bonds before maturity, for value, and without actual notice of the real facts of the case at the date of issuance. This is so because the bonds were without recital. This much was the plain ruling of the Supreme Court in Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278, 26 L. ed. 138, and Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Perry County, 156 U. S. 692, 39 L. ed. 585, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 547. In this very case we certified the question as to the presumption upon which a purchaser before maturity for value might act in purchasing bonds without recital. Referring to the tendency of some of the earlier cases to deny to bonds in the hands of innocent holders any other defense than want of power, the court said that tendency had been "arrested" by the cases I have cited above, which cases, it is said, held "that the mere facts of the subscription to stock and issue of bonds containing no recital left it open to the obligor to show that a condition precedent had not been fulfilled." "But," added the court, "these cases in no way conflict with the view expressed by Mr. Justice Strong in Pendleton County v. Amy, 13 Wall. 297, 20 L. ed. 579, and by Mr. Justice Bradley in Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484, 23 L. ed. 579, that a presumption arises from the mere fact of subscription and issue, though not a conclusive one. Independent of authority such a presumption exists, and is but an instance of the broader presumption that officers charged with the performance of a public duty perform it correctly." My Brethren do not, as I read the opinion of the court, accept this as an applicable rule of law or an authoritative decision in this case. It is, in conclusion of an argument in favor of the conclusiveness of facts determined by the county judge, refusing the delivery of the bonds here in question, said: "His delivery of them without the occurrence of the conditions would be unauthorized and the bonds be void; yet it would seem upon principle that if the question whether the conditions had been accomplished is one of doubt and uncertainty, and it is apparent that the officers who had charge of the issuance of the bonds are to determine the fact of compliance with the condition, his determination would conclude the question, and, if in the affirmative, bind the county."

It is evident that the error of the court in the matter I have referred to is, after all, the real ground of the conclusion reached and its judgment colored by the view before expressed.

2. The conclusion is next placed upon the theory that no subscription had ever been made to the capital stock of the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company, although one was authorized. It is stated in the opinion that, although the subscription was voted, and the county court ordered its clerk to subscribe for the stock, "the clerk did not so subscribe." It is also said, that, when the bonds here involved were issued, the said Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company had given no token of its acceptance, and the county had taken no further step after the direction of the county court to its clerk to make the subscription upon the terms specified. Both in this court and in the Supreme Court this case has proceeded upon the theory that a subscription had been made as authorized. The condition precedent presupposes a subscription had been made from which the county was to be released. The defense has been that it was invalid, because the authority had been delegated to the clerk, and that the case of Mercer County Ct. v. Kentucky River Nav. Co. 8 Bush, 300, was an express authority supporting the county judge's assumption that a subscription so made was void as a delegation of power which could not be delegated. The subsequent case of Green County v. Shortell, 116 Ky. 108, 75 S. W. 251, was an action upon some of the same series of bonds here in issue, and the Kentucky court there, assuming that the subscription had been made, distinguished the former case upon the ground that, in the former case, the clerk or commissioner had a discretion to exercise, while in the case before it he had none, the terms and conditions being settled already. There is no finding that no subscription had ever, in fact, been made by the clerk, as directed. The presumption that the clerk, as a public official, correctly discharged his duty, ought to stand as well when the presumption operates in favor of the county as it does when its effect is detrimental. The only finding of fact which bears upon the question is the seventeenth. That reads as follows: "That no formal or express exoneration of said county from the payment of said last-named subscription was ever made or attempted, but nothing further has, up to this date, ever been done in respect to it, and neither bonds by the county nor stock by the said last-named railroad company have ever been issued or delivered in execution of said orders or under the terms of said subscription."

This finding plainly assumes that there had been a subscription, not a mere authority to subscribe. What is said as to nothing further having been done evidently refers to acts subsequent to the subscription. But it is not important that no formal subscription was made by the clerk. He was commended to do a purely administrative act, and he could have been coerced to do it by writ of mandamus. The liability of the county upon the vote and the order of the county court was the gist of the matter, and fastened a liability upon the county from which it required exoneration as a condition precedent to another liability.

3. I disagree as to the effect of the lapse of time since these bonds were issued upon their validity. I cannot agree that the liability to this plaintiff rested upon any better foundation when he started this suit in 1899 than if he had sued at date of the earliest maturing coupon. The authority to make a subscription at all depended upon the performance of the antecedent condition of exoneration from liability on account of the former subscription to a different company. Yet, within thirteen months after the order of the court, directing a subscription by its clerk to the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad Company, we find the county judge making the subscription here involved. If the condition precedent had not been performed then, the act was without authority. In payment of this subscription he issued the bonds in suit in batches, beginning in January, 1872, and completing the issue in April of the same year. The bonds bear date of April 1, 1871. Now, neither at the date of the subscription, June, 1869, nor at the date of the bonds, April, 1871, nor at the date of their issuance, between January and April, 1872, had there been any compliance with the condition in respect of exoneration from the prior liability by the execution of any release, exoneration, or through the judgment of any court. The only finding of fact in respect of this condition is the seventeenth finding of fact, set out above. That there had been "no formal or express exoneration" is expressly found. Then, upon what facts are we to predicate an exoneration? None are found except the vague statement that "nothing further up to this date [has] ever been done in respect to it, and neither bonds by the county nor stock by the last-named railroad company has ever been issued or delivered in execution of said orders or under the terms of said subscription." The plain meaning is that neither the county nor the railroad company took any further step in pursuance of the subscription. Why? Many reasons may be conjectured. After years of effort to obtain subscriptions enough to carry out the project, the promoters may have become disheartened, and, finding themselves unable to comply with the conditions, made no issue of shares and no demand of payment of this subscription. But, if the lapse of time without demand for payment or tender of stock at the date of the issuance of these bonds was not such as to raise a legal presumption of abandonment or release, the bonds when issued were illegal, as having been issued before there had been any release or exoneration, formal or informal, express or implied. If then illegal, when did they become good? If the county could not have defended itself when the bonds were issued against its liability upon the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad subscription, would there have been any pretense that this condition precedent had been complied with? Twenty years went by after the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad subscription was made before this suit was brought. How does it happen that, from mere lapse of time, a defense, good when these bonds were unlawfully issued and put upon the market, has become ineffectual and the bonds valid, although the applicable evidence then and now is identical? I have given attention to what is said upon this subject by Mr. Justice Moody, who, referring to the determination of the county judge when he issued these bonds that this condition of exoneration had been complied with, said that "the fact that for thirty-eight years no one has made any claim against the county on account of its supposed liability to subscribe to the stock of the Elizabethtown & Tennessee Railroad shows conclusively that he was right." But I am unable to regard this as an authoritative point of the opinion. The single question which was answered related only to whether "on the facts found" there was "any presumption" at all that the county had been exonerated. This was answered in the affirmative. It is evident that the court did not mean that a rebuttable presumption of exoneration had become conclusive by lapse of time after the fact of issuance. The effect of the fact that the railroad company had done nothing must, in reason, be limited to the date of the issue of the bonds. If the inquiry is, indeed, whether at this date, thirty-eight years after the subscription, the county can now be regarded as relieved from liability, I should say "Yes." The lapse of time without an action brought to enforce liability would, undoubtedly, raise a presumption of a release or abandonment. Indeed, the positive statutory limitation of actions would justify a holding that there was no longer an existing liability on account of that subscription. But, if the subsequent lapse of time is to be given effect, then I insist that the conduct of the plaintiff and his predecessors in title, as well as that of the county, must be taken into account. These bonds were dated April, 1871. They matured in 1891. This suit was brought in 1899. The coupons which matured in 1878 and for each year subsequent are sued upon. Thus for more than twenty-one years the county has refused to pay interest, and for all that time this plaintiff and those from whom he took the bonds have acquiesced in the attitude of the county. Has time been steadily strengthening the claim of the holder and destroying the defense of the county?

4. The question certified assumed that the plaintiff took these bonds before maturity. But the only finding in respect to the status of the plaintiff is the first, in these words: "The court finds that the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of New York, and was so when this action was instituted on the 28th day of March, 1899, and that the plaintiff was then the bona fide holder for value of the bonds and coupons sued on, and fully entitled to sue the defendant thereon in this court."

That finding, I think, should be interpreted as applying to the plea to the jurisdiction. That plea was, by agreement, submitted with the other defenses. It pleaded that the plaintiff was not the bona fide owner of these bonds when this suit was brought, March 28, 1899, but that the same bonds and coupons had before been in suit in the same court, and the suit abated because the then plaintiff, Herman H. Heaton, was a fictitious plaintiff, the real owners being citizens of Kentucky, and that Quinlan had acquired the bonds thereafter only for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the circuit court, the beneficial plaintiffs being citizens of Kentucky. Issue was taken upon this plea as to whether the plaintiff was the real owner or only a fictitious plaintiff. The very terms of the finding indicate that the finding was a response to this plea to the jurisdiction. But, if the finding be construed as both a finding in respect to the issue upon jurisdiction and as to the status of the plaintiff as the holder of negotiable paper, it will be most unjust to infer from that finding that the plaintiff acquired these bonds before maturity, as implied by the second interrogatory, or without notice of the defenses of the county. This finding is "that on March 28, 1899," plaintiff was the bona fide holder for value of the bonds and coupons sued upon. That date is the date of the bringing of this suit, and the finding was enough to support his claim of right to sue in a United States court, there being diversity of citizenship.

5. But, if the judgment of the circuit court, holding that the conditions precedent had not been complied with and that the bonds were invalid, is to be reversed, I think common justice requires that there should be no judgment upon these findings against the county, but a new trial awarded. The findings of fact do not cover all of the issues, and upon those to which they are a response are not definite or full enough to justify a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. If it is of any moment whether the plaintiff is constructively chargeable with knowledge of the situation when these bonds were issued, then it is important to know whether he took these bonds before maturity, or, if not, whether he has acquired the title of one who did. That he was, on March 28, 1899, the bona fide holder for value, is too indefinite to justify a judgment for him. The same is true in respect to the defense of the statute of limitations. There is no finding upon this, and it is not permissible to piece out defective findings. An examination of the pleadings will show that a large proportion of the coupons in suit matured prior to 1884. Obviously the defense of the statute of limitation was a good defense to all such coupons, unless the plaintiff can in some way show that it ought not to apply to him. But there is no finding as to this defense. Why shall the county be cut off from the benefit of this defense by refusing to award a new trial and the direction of a judgment upon the bonds and coupons in suit?

When a jury has been waived, and a judgment rendered upon a special finding of facts, this court, if it find that the judgment was erroneous, has the power to direct such judgment to be entered as the special findings require, instead of awarding a new trial. Ft. Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 150, 28 L. ed. 636, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 56. But, if the findings are doubtful, obscure, or defective, it is within the power of the court, and its high duty, whenever justice seems to require such action, to reverse and remand for a new trial. Graham v. Bayne, 18 How. 60, 15 L. ed. 265; Flanders v.

Tweed, 9 Wall. 425, 19 L. ed. 678, 680; St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 104, 37 L. ed. 380, 385, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485; Ward v. Cochran, 150 U. S. 597, 608, 37 L. ed. 1195, 1198, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 230. No judgment ought to be rendered when the findings are silent as to a fact which is essential to a judgment. An imperfect finding, like an imperfect special verdict, cannot be pieced out. The burden is upon him who asks a judgment to produce a finding of every fact necessary to support it. Hodges v. Easton, 106 U. S. 408, 27 L. ed. 169, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307. In Ward v. Cochran, cited above, there was a special verdict in an action of ejectment reversed and a new trial awarded, because there was no finding that the defendant's possession was adverse and exclusive, although there was a finding that the defendant and his grantors had entered into possession of the land in controversy under a claim of ownership, and that he remained in the open, continued, notorious, and adverse possession thereof for the period of sixteen years. Without comment we adopted this course in Anderson v. Messinger, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094, 77 C. C. A. 179, 146 Fed. 929. In Barber v. Coit, 55 C. C. A. 145, 118 Fed. 272, we remanded an appeal for further evidence, upon our own motion, "because great injustice might be done if the case is to be decided upon the present record."

When the findings of fact do not support a judgment against the plaintiff, there can be no judgment for the defendant, upon a writ of error sued out by the plaintiff, where there is an issue made by the defendant, material in character, upon which there is no finding of fact. Exchange Nat. Bank v. Third Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 276, 293, 28 L. ed. 722, 728, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141. When the trial court makes no finding upon an issue made by the pleadings, because it was deemed unimportant, a court of review will remand for a finding upon the facts bearing upon that issue, if found to be material to a judgment, although all of the evidence relating to the question is in the record. In Abilene v. Cornell University, 55 C. C. A. 205, 118 Fed. 379, 382, the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit said of such a situation: "We might possibly look into the rejected record and the rejected depositions, and determine the issue arising on the plea, but, by so doing, we would be trying on appeal an issue that was not tried below."

Where an omission to make a specific finding of fact is due to the fact that the circuit court made a ruling upon a matter of law which rendered such a finding unimportant, it is the duty of the court, that justice may be done, to reverse and remand, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under § 701, Rev. Stat., for such further proceedings to be had in the inferior court as justice may require. Little Miami & C. & X. R. Co. v. United States, 108 U. S. 277, 280, 27 L. ed. 724, 725, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627.

SAME.

Libel — judicial proceeding — privilege.

1. The publication of a fair report of a judicial proceeding without malice is privileged if the court has acted upon the bill so far as to make a special order that defendant appear and show cause why an injunction should not be issued against him.

Same — corporate meeting.

2. The publication by a newspaper of a report of a meeting of a private corporation, which contains libelous statements made by stockholders against the officers, is not privileged.

Same — different proceedings — separation.

3. The one publishing in a newspaper a report of a meeting of a private corporation and of a bill in equity, in each of which the same libelous matter appears, cannot avoid liability for the former publication on the theory that the latter is privileged, and that it is impossible to separate the injury done by one publication from that done by the other.

Case Note. — Report of meeting of private corporation as subject of privilege.

The foregoing case makes a very clear distinction between the publication of reports of meetings of private corporations and reports of public corporations and quasi corporations, such as church associations, medical societies, etc., which are in-

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiffs to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of actions brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of certain libels which resulted in verdict in defendants' favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. N. Allin and Bert E. Kemp for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Elder & Whitman and James Thomas Pugh, for defendants:

Fair reports of judicial proceedings, even if preliminary or ex parte, are privileged if made without actual malice.

Conner v. Standard Pub. Co. 183 Mass. 474, 67 N. E. 596; Barrows v. Bell, 7 Gray, 301, 66 Am. Dec. 479; Metcalf v. Times Pub. Co. 20 R. I. 674, 78 Am. St. Rep. 900, 40 Atl. 864; Stuart v. Press Pub. Co. 83 App. Div. 467, 82 N. Y. Supp. 401; Ackerman v. Jones, 5 Jones & S. 43; Usill v. Hales, L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 319; Kimber v. Press Asso. [1893] 1 Q. B. 65.

An accurate report of a portion of a judicial proceeding will still be privileged if it does not purport to be a report of the whole.

Odgers, Libel & Slander, 2d ed. p. 258; Turner v. Sullivan, 6 L. T. N. S. 130; Millisich v. Lloyds, 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 404.

The report of the stockholders' meeting was privileged.

Barrows v. Bell, supra; Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322; Connor v. Standard Pub. Co. supra; Lawless v. Anglo-Egyptian Cotton & Oil Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 262; Ponsford v. Financial Times, 16 Times L. R. 248.

If either report is privileged, the action cannot be maintained.

Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East, 1.

Hammond, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The articles of which the plaintiffs complain contained reports of certain proceedings in court and also of a meeting of stockholders of a corporation called the Burrows Lighting & Heating Company.

So far as respects the report of the court proceedings, the articles were privileged. This case differs materially from Cowley v. Pulsifer, 137 Mass. 392, 50 Am. Rep. 318. In that case there had been no action by the court. Here the bill had been presented to the court and the court had acted upon it so far as to make a special order that the defendants therein should appear and show cause why they should not be enjoined. This act of the court was a judicial proceeding, and, whatever might formerly have been the rule, it was a subject for a privileged report, although the cause had not yet been finished. It was an act begun in a case, and in the end there must be a final decision. The words of Esher, M. R., in Kimber v. Press Asso. [1893] 1 Q. B. 65, 71, seem to us to be a true statement of the law on this subject: "I am, therefore, of opinion that, where the proceedings are such as will result in a final decision being given, a fair and accurate report, made bona fide, of those proceedings, is privileged, although it be published before the final decision." And in that case the rule was applied to the proceedings upon an ex parte application for the issue of a summons on a charge of perjury. If this were not so then, in the language of Lord Esher, "the ridiculous result would follow that, where the trial of a case of the greatest public interest lasted fifty days, no report could be published until the case was ended." Kimber v. Press Asso. supra, and cases cited; Metcalf v. Times Pub. Co. 20 R. I. 674, 78 Am. St. Rep. 900, 40 Atl. 864, and cases cited; McBee v. Fulton, 47 Md. 403, 28 Am. Rep. 465; Ackerman v. Jones, 5 Jones & S. 43; Stuart v. Press Pub. Co. 83 App. Div. 467, 82 N. Y. Supp. 401. See also the instructive case of Usill v. Hales, L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 319, vested with certain powers and duties immediately affecting the public. As indicated in the title, this note will be confined to reports of private corporations.

There is but little authority upon this subject.

In Parsons v. Surgey, 4 Fost. & F. 247, it was held that words spoken by a shareholder in a meeting of the shareholders of a railroad corporation to which reporters and the public had been invited did not constitute a privileged communication. The court said: "The matter was certainly one of great interest and importance to the shareholders, and the discussion or publication of the results to them would have been excused. It could not, however, be a privileged communication because others besides the shareholders were invited to attend the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

meeting; and it was particularly stated that the representatives of the public press would be there." There would appear to be no question but that a court which held that words spoken by a shareholder to the public were not privileged would hold that a report of such a meeting was also not privileged.

In Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 16 L. ed. 73, it was held that the communication by the directors of a corporation to the stockholders of evidence collected by them as to the conduct of their officers and agents and their conclusions upon the evidence was a privileged communication in the absence of malice or bad faith; but the privilege did not extend to the preservation of the report and evidence in the permanent form of a book for distribution.

The articles in question contained, among others, the following statements: "At the office of C. Henry Kimball, 97 Haverhill street, officers, stockholders, and lawyers interested in the Burrows Lighting & Heating Company met this morning. The affairs of the Burrows Lighting & Heating Company have been before the public for a considerable time, and are apparently in a badly tangled condition. An order of notice was recently issued by the superior court against C. Henry Kimball, William Galletly and the Burrows Lighting & Heating Company, ordering them to appear in court on Thursday of this week to show cause why they should not be restrained from holding any meeting. The charges were that the holders of a majority of the capital stock of the company had fraudulently secured control over 416,000 shares of stock."

By an inspection of the bill in equity and of the order of the court, it appears that the statement in the articles was a fair report of the court proceedings. And we are further of opinion that the ruling that the evidence did not warrant a finding of malice was correct. So far, therefore, as the plaintiff attempted to hold the defendants as to so much of the articles as related to the proceedings in court, they failed to make out a case.

But there was something more in the articles than the report of the proceedings in court. There was a report of the meeting of the stockholders of a private corporation; and, unless this part of the report is also privileged, the defense, so far as resting upon that ground, must fail. It is argued by the defendants that "the public is interested and concerned in a meeting of stockholders of a corporation such as is described in the" articles in question, and that reports of such meetings are privileged if fair and made without malice. But the difficulty with this argument is that, unless modified by statutory provision, the law in England and in this commonwealth always has been otherwise. It is to be noted that we are not dealing with what is said at the meeting, nor with the person who said it. No doubt a stockholder at such a meeting, speaking to stockholders, may with impunity say things derogatory to an officer or the manager of the company, provided that what he says be pertinent to the matter in hand and he speaks in good faith and without malice. His justification rests upon the fact that he is speaking to the stockholders upon a subject in which he and they have an interest.

On the contrary, we are dealing with a report in the nature of a repetition of the defamatory remarks, which report is made by a stranger, having no interest in the question, to other strangers, called the public, equally without interest. It is manifest that the grounds for the privilege under which the original speaker, the stockholder, is protected cannot serve the publisher of the report. Davidson v. Duncan, 7 El. & Bl. 231; De Crespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing. 402. The privilege of the publisher, if any he has, must rest upon other grounds.

It is stated by some authorities that, by the common law of England, reports of judicial and parliamentary proceedings alone were privileged. While it is said by Shaw, Ch. J., in Barrows v. Bell, 7 Gray, 301, 66 Am. Dec. 479, that this statement, unqualified, is too broad, still subsequent decisions seem to show clearly that in England the principle of privilege is confined to reports of judicial or quasi judicial bodies. No privilege was attached to the report of other public unofficial meetings. Hence, if in such a case a report containing any defamatory statement of fact was printed in a newspaper, the proprietor's only defense was that the statement was true. Purcell v. Sowler, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 781, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 215. See also Odgers, Libel & Slander, 4th ed. Appx. B, and the authorities therein cited. Since the decision in this last case, the law has been somewhat modified so far as respects official and other public meetings. But these statutes have been somewhat strictly construed, and even now a fair report is not always safe. Ponsford v. Financial Times, 16 Times L. R. 248.

The subject was quite freely discussed by Shaw, Ch. J., in Barrows v. Bell, ubi supra, and the following language was used (7 Gray, 313): "Whatever may be the rule as adopted and practised on in England, we think that a somewhat larger liberty may be claimed in this country and in this commonwealth, both for the proceedings before all public bodies, and for the publication of those proceedings for the necessary information of the people. So many municipal, parochial, and other public corporations, and so many large voluntary associations formed for almost every lawful purpose of benevolence, business, or interest, are constantly holding meetings, in their nature public, and so usual is it that their proceedings are published for general use and information, that the law, to adapt itself to this necessary condition of society, must of necessity admit of these public proceedings, and a just and proper publication of them, as far as it can be done consistently with private rights. This view of the law of libel in Massachusetts is recognized, and to some extent sanctioned, by the case of Com. v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, 3 Am. Dec. 212, and many other cases."

And it was held that the publication by a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society of a true account of the proceedings of that society in the expulsion of another member for a cause within its jurisdiction, and of the result of certain suits subsequently brought by him against the society and its members on account of such expulsion, is privileged.

The above language of the court, however liberal its construction, is not to be understood as applying to strictly private meetings. It applies at the most only to meetings public in their nature, or where the proceedings concern the public. In that case it was said that the charter of the Massachusetts Medical Society "invested the society, their members and licentiates, with large powers and privileges, in regulating the important public interest of the practice of medicine and surgery, enabled them to prescribe a course of studies, to examine candidates in regard to their qualifications for practice, and give letters testimonial to those who might be found duly qualified." It was also stated that it appeared by the acts incorporating this society that it was regarded by the legislature "as a public institution, by the action of which the public would be deeply affected in one of its important public interests, the health of the people." It was further said that the proceedings of which the report was made "might be rightly characterized, as in the case of Farnsworth v. Storrs, 5 Cush. 412, as quasi judicial." And it was upon the latter ground that the communication was adjudged to be privileged.

The case before us is entirely different. The meeting was simply that of a private corporation invested with no privileges and owing no special duties to the public. It was an ordinary business meeting. Whether any member was in fraudulent possession of stock, or had mismanaged the affairs of the corporation, or whether the plaintiffs were unfit to continue as officers, or the corporation had been made bankrupt, were matters with which the public were in no way concerned. The meeting was for the stockholders alone. Only they or their duly constituted agents were entitled to be present. The meeting was neither public nor for the public purpose. As well might it be said that a private conference between the members of a partnership on partnership matters was a public meeting. For the purposes of the meeting it might have been necessary for charges to be made by one stockholder against another stockholder or an officer, and that the charges should be discussed and their truth or falsity determined; and so far the actors were well within the privilege.

They had a duty to perform in a matter in which all were interested. But, for obvious reasons hereinbefore stated, the mantle of protection cannot cover him who, having no interest, repeats the defamatory words to others also without interest. And in this matter the conductor of a newspaper stands no better than any other person. As was said in Sheckell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. 25-27, in reply to a contention that conductors of the public press are entitled to peculiar indulgence and have especial rights and privileges, "the law recognizes no such peculiar rights, privileges, or claims to indulgence. They have no rights but such as are common to all. They have just the same rights that the rest of the community have, and no more." These words, although spoken more than half a century ago, state the law as it exists to-day, except so far as it has been modified by statute, and there has been no statute material to the question before us. The result is that the articles were not privileged so far as they reported the proceedings of the corporation.

It is argued by the defendants that, inasmuch as the charge in the bill in equity was the same as that made at the meeting, namely, that the majority of the stock was in the fraudulent possession of the plaintiffs, it will be impossible for the plaintiffs to contend that any alleged damage was suffered from the one rather than from the other; and therefore if one report is privileged the action cannot be maintained. This is untenable. Even if the charge in substance is the same, it is evident that a charge made in a bill in equity filed in court may not be regarded as so serious a matter as a charge made by one's business associates in a business meeting. The difficulty of separating the damages gives no immunity to the defendants.

Exceptions sustained.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

J. HOWARD STILES et al., Selectmen of Amesbury,

v.

CITIZENS' ELECTRIC STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

Remedy — retroactive — validity.

1. A statute giving a right to resort to the courts in case of discontinuance of the operation of a railway does not change existing rights, but applies to proceedings begun after its passage, which relate to acts done previously.

Same — application of statute.

2. A statute giving a right to resort to the courts if a railway discontinues the use of any track applies to past as well as future discontinuances.

Street railway — discontinuance.

3. A street railway company having only the right or license to operate its tracks in a public street until revoked or terminated by the public authorities may cease to use the permission granted, and discontinue the operation of the whole track covered by a particular location under which it was built, at its pleasure, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary.

Same — legislative control.

4. The legislature may make the right of a street railway company to discontinue the use of a portion of its tracks subject to control by the railroad commissioners if the public welfare requires their continued operation.

Case Note. — Right of street railway company to discontinue line in absence of statutory or contractual provision to the contrary.

The decision in STILES v. CITIZENS' ELECTRIC STREET R. Co. would seem to throw the balance of authority in favor of the proposition that, where a street railway company has only the right or license to operate its tracks in a public street, it may, in the absence of statutory or contractual provision to the contrary, discontinue such line; and mandamus to compel its operation will not lie.

In San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State, 90 Tex. 520, 35 L.R.A. 662, 59 Am. St. Rep. 834, 39 S. W. 926, it was held that a street railway company cannot be compelled by mandamus to operate an abandoned portion of its line, which has been built under a mere privilege to construct and operate it, and where its charter does not in express terms or by fair implication forbid it to discontinue the enterprise. A similar case, holding to the same effect, is State ex rel. Knight v. Helena Power & Light Co. 22 Mont. 391, 44 L.R.A. 692, 56 Pac. 685.

In McCann v. South Nashville Street R. Co. 2 Tenn. Ch. 773, it was recognized that, if a street railway company has only agreed to build a track, it cannot be compelled to run cars over it.

So, where a change in the terminus of a route is demanded because of public convenience and safety, necessitating the abandonment of a short distance of the track, an action to discontinue the abandonment cannot be maintained. Moore v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 108 N. Y. 98, 15 N. E. 191.

However, in State ex rel. Bridgeton v. Bridgeton & M. Traction Co. 62 N. J. L. 592, 45 L.R.A. 837, 43 Atl. 715, it was held that a street railway company, incorporated under the laws of the state, the route of its road and the location of its tracks having been established by municipal ordinances accepted by it, and the road having been con-

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Essex County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition by the selectmen of Amesbury to compel the resumption of the operation of a portion of its railway tracks by the defendant company. Petition dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Anthony W. Reddy and Thomas H. Hoyt for petitioners.

Mr. Guy W. Cox, for respondent:

The statute was not retroactive.

Garfield v. Bemis, 2 Allen, 445.

An order of location granted by the selectmen of a town to a street railway company is not a contract.

Springfield v. Springfield Street R. Co. 182 Mass. 41, 64 N. E. 577; French v. Jones, 191 Mass. 522, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 525, 78 N. E. 118; Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 94 Va. 291, 26 S. E. 943.

structed and being in operation, cannot, at its mere will and discretion, cease and abandon the operation of any portion thereof; the court saying: "The grant being exclusive, they must be held to a good faith in the performance and fulfilment of their duties. I cannot perceive any excuse whatever by which the respondent company can be permitted to abandon the operation of any part of it. That a portion is unprofitable, or that a portion is more difficult to operate, are not valid reasons for abandonment. Its application to the city was for the location of its tracks over the whole route. The terms and conditions of the ordinance, and the ordinance, passed on the faith of the duty of the company to operate its road over the entire route located. In view of this ordinance, it must be conclusively said that, if one part was to be operated, and that another part might be abandoned at the discretion of the company, the terms and conditions of the ordinance would have been different. This must be conclusively assumed in a case of this character. It appears clear from the statute and the ordinance that it is the duty of such company organized under the statutes to operate the roads mentioned in its certificate of incorporation for the benefit of the public, in consideration that it shall have the franchise of transporting the passengers, and taking the tolls from them; and that it cannot escape the performance of this duty as a public agent."

A similar case is State ex rel. Grinsfelder v. Spokane Street R. Co. 19 Wash. 518, 41 L.R.A. 516, 67 Am. St. Rep. 739, 53 Pac. 719, where it was held that the operation of a street railway can be enforced by mandamus where a company which has acquired the right and commenced to perform the service attempts to discontinue the operation of a part of a line.

It will be noticed that the two cases immediately preceding are distinguished in STILES v. CITIZENS' ELECTRIC STREET R. Co. on the ground that they are cases in which the company sought to retain a part of its franchise, or of some particular location, while abandoning the rest of it, while in the STILES CASE the company discontinued its use of the whole of the tracks covered by the locations under which they were built. So far as the right to a writ of mandamus to compel the operation of the road is concerned, this distinction does not seem to be recognized in San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State, supra, although the court does hold that for a failure on the part of the company to operate part of a line, the remedy is to forfeit the franchise to operate the whole line.

In Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. 51 Kan. 609, 37 Am. St. Rep. 312, 33 Pac. 309, it was held that, where a street railway company, by ordinance, is granted the right to construct and operate a line along a certain avenue for a certain term of years, and the terms of the ordinance are accepted and the road constructed, it or its vendee cannot at will abandon such line, but may be compelled by mandamus to operate it in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance under which it was constructed. In reviewing this case, the court, in San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State, supra, said: "The court may have intended to hold broadly that a company which has accepted a mere privilege to build a street railway, and has constructed and operated it, may be compelled by the writ of mandamus to continue its operation. The opinion admits of that construction; but the important question whether the mere grant of a privilege imposes a duty is not discussed. The ordinance under which the company acted, however, contained a requirement that the 'said railway shall be so operated that a car shall pass any given point each way on the route at least every twenty minutes for twelve hours, and at least once every thirty minutes for four hours, during that part of the day the road shall be operated.' These are words of command, and may be construed as making it the duty of the company, in case it should construct and operate its road, to continue to operate every part of its line. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This petition is brought under Stat. 1906, chap. 339, p. 302, now Stat. 1906, chap. 463, pt. 3, p. 614. § 76, to compel the respondent to resume the operation of a certain part of its railway, called the Pleasant Valley line. The defendant had abandoned and discontinued the operation of this line in January, 1905; and the first question is whether the petition can be maintained under a statute passed more than a year thereafter.

This statute in no way affected the rights of the parties; it expressly provided that nothing therein contained should be "deemed a legislative construction of any existing law or an impairment of any existing right of a street railway company to discontinue the use of tracks." It simply provided a new remedy for any unlawful discontinuance by giving a direct resort to the courts.

The opinion, we think, might have been safely placed upon this requirement. But whether such was or was not the intention of the court we cannot say from the opinion."

The right of a street railway company to abandon its route on a certain street without the consent of the state was also denied in Paige v. Schenectady R. Co. 178 N. Y. 102, 70 N. E. 213, and Thompson v. Schenectady R. Co. 65 C. C. A. 325, 131 Fed. 577.

In Re Loader, 14 Misc. 208, 35 N. Y. Supp. 996, 999, it was held that a street railroad company cannot stop part of its cars to the detriment of the public because of its inability to get employees to accept its terms. The court said: "The duty of the company now before the court is to carry passengers through certain streets of Brooklyn, and to furnish, man, and run cars enough to fully accommodate the public. It may not lawfully cease to perform that duty for even one hour. The directors of a private business company may, actuated by private greed or motives of private gain, stop business, and refuse to employ labor at all, unless labor come down to their conditions, however distressing; for such are the existing legal, industrial, and social conditions. But the directors of a railroad corporation may not do the like. . . . They have duties to the public to perform, and they must perform them. If they cannot get labor to perform such duties at what they offer to pay, then they must pay more, and as much as is necessary to get it. Likewise, if the conditions in respect of hours or otherwise which they impose repel labor, they must adopt more lenient or just conditions. They may not stop their cars for one hour, much less one week or one year, to thereby beat or coerce the price or conditions of labor down to the price or conditions they offer. For them to do so would be a defiance of law and of government, which, becoming general, would inevitably, by force of example, lead to general disquiet, to the disintegration of the social order, and even the downfall of government itself."

It furnished a new remedy; but it impaired or affected no contractual obligations and disturbed no vested rights. As it was purely remedial in its character, and did not change any existing rights, it naturally would be applicable to proceedings begun after its passage, though relating to acts done previously thereto. This is the doctrine which was declared in Foster v. Essex Bank, 16 Mass. 245, 273, 8 Am. Dec. 135. It has been applied in the construction of many similar statutes, so as to make a new remedy available for the protection of a prior right or for the redress of formerly existing grievances. Bemis v. Clark, 11 Pick. 452, 454; Simmons v. Hanover, 23 Pick. 188, 194; Wood v. Westborough, 140 Mass. 403, 409, 5 N. E. 613; Rogers v. Nichols, 186 Mass. 440, 71 N. E. 950. It was the plain intention of the statute to provide a remedy for a case like this by giving redress for a wrongful discontinuance already existing, as well as for any that might occur in the future. It cannot be held that the words "if a street railway . . . discontinues the use of any track" apply merely to a future discontinuance. A somewhat similar contention was considered and rejected in Com. v. Dracut, 8 Gray, 455, and Brown v. Pendergast, 7 Allen, 427. In the former case the court relied on "the long-established rule of construing statutes according to the manifest intent of the legislature, though apt words to express that intent may not be used, or though such construction may not accord with the letter of the statute." And in the latter case the court said: "We apply an old and unshaken rule in the construction of statutes, to wit, that the intention of a remedial statute will always prevail over the literal sense of its terms, and therefore, when the expression is special or particular, but the reason is general, the expression should be deemed general." The rule of cases like Garfield v. Bemis, 2 Allen, 445, where the giving of a new remedy would result in the revival of a former right which has absolutely lapsed, is not to be applied here. This petition can be maintained if the respondent's discontinuance of its Pleasant Valley line was without right.

When the respondent company purchased these lines of railway in 1899, it had, under Stat. 1899, chap. 304, p. 264, authority to complete the railway and its equipment, and to maintain and operate the same. But there was nothing compulsory in these provisions; and the respondent would not have lost its property rights in the rails and materials, or in any other real or personal estate which it had acquired, if it had entirely failed to operate the railroad. French v.

Jones, 191 Mass. 522, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 525, 78 N. E. 118. But it did assume control of all the routes which it had bought, including this Pleasant Valley line, and continued to operate them all until it discontinued the use of this line in January, 1905.

The respondent, like all street railway companies, and like the lighting company spoken of in Weld v. Gas & Electric Light Comrs. 197 Mass. 556, 84 N. E. 101, is a quasi public corporation, organized for the exercise of an important public franchise, and bound to exercise that franchise for the benefit of the public, and not merely for its own profit. Shaw, Ch. J., in Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69, 76. But it has not, like steam railroads, an exclusive control and a vested right of property in the soil upon which its tracks are laid. In the original charter given to this company's predecessor, the Newburyport & Amesbury Horse Railroad Company (Stat. 1864, chap. 53, p. 30), its right to lay its tracks upon the public streets was made subject to the determination of the mayor and aldermen or selectmen of the respective cities or towns, and those officers, after one year from the opening of its track for use, might, at their pleasure, revoke the location thereof, and the tracks thereupon must be taken up. Similar provisions were either contained in other street railway charters, or were afterwards supplied by amendments thereto. Accordingly, this court said, in Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 517, 518, 28 Am. Rep. 264, that "the peculiar privilege given [to street railway companies] is the right, not to acquire land or an easement in land, but only the right, as long as permitted by certain municipal authorities, to lay tracks in streets already appropriated to the uses of public travel." So in Springfield v. Springfield Street R. Co. 182 Mass. 41, 48, 64 N. E. 577, 580, it was said that grants to street railway companies of locations in the public ways are in the nature of a privilege or permit to use the public ways given by cities and towns by virtue of authority from the legislature. And the court added: "They are analogous to licenses given to run omnibuses along certain routes, although of course to make the analogy complete the omnibuses would have to be built so as to run on rails laid in the streets. . . . They convey no exclusive rights in the highways or streets in which they are granted, but are to be used in common with others having occasion to use the public ways. The public authorities retain in the main full control over the streets or ways in which they exist, and may revoke the locations or alter or discontinue the ways without liability to damages therefor, and subject only to such limitations, if any, as the legislature may see fit to impose." See, to the same effect, Union R. Co. v. Cambridge, 11 Allen, 287. And, as a bare license may at any time be revoked or terminated by the licensor, so the licensee is at liberty at any time to cease wholly to avail himself of the permission given and to discontinue his action thereunder, unless there has been some agreement to the contrary. This was the doctrine maintained in Montana and Texas in cases not unlike the one before us. State ex rel. Knight v. Helena Power & Light Co. 22 Mont. 391, 44 L.R.A. 692, 56 Pac. 685; San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State, 90 Tex. 520, 35 L.R.A. 662, 59 Am. St. Rep. 834, 39 S. W. 926, reversing 10 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 30 S. W. 266, and 38 S. W. 54. To the same effect is York & N. M. R. Co. v. R. 1 El. & Bl. 858. But there is nothing either in the respondent's charter, or in that of its predecessor, or in any other statute before 1891, or in the grant of any location, to the effect that the line in question shall be continued in operation. And the view that, just as these locations might be revoked by the municipal authorities (Medford & C. R. Co. v. Somerville, 111 Mass. 232), so they might be abandoned or their use discontinued by the railway company, finds support in legislation. The first general street railway enactment was Stat. 1864, chap. 229, p. 155; and § 19 of this act provided that, "if a street railway company voluntarily discontinues the use of any part of its tracks for a period of six months, the streets or highways occupied by the same shall, upon the order of the board of aldermen of the city or the selectmen of the town forthwith, at the expense of said company, be cleared of said tracks, and put in as good condition for the public travel as they were in immediately before being so occupied." After the passage of this statute, the commissioners appointed under chapter 86, p. 333, of the resolves of 1864, in their report to the legislature of 1865 (House Docs. 1865, No. 15), called the attention of the legislature to this subject by saying: "It does not seem to us that any further legislative provision in regard to allowing railway corporations to discontinue the use of their track in any street is demanded. As their rights in the streets are of the most precarious nature, we suppose it cannot fairly be claimed that the companies have incurred any duty or obligation to continue the transportation of passengers longer than it proves remunerative." The fact that after the legislature had received this report the provisions of Stat. 1864, chap. 229, p. 160, § 19, were substantially re-enacted in later codifications certain tains tends to show that the legislature considered that, subject to the provisions of their charters and other statutes, street railway companies might voluntarily discontinue in whole or in part the use of their tracks. See Stat. 1871, chap. 381, p. 735, § 25; Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 113, § 25; Rev. Laws, chap. 112, § 36; Stat. 1906, chap. 463, pt. 3, p. 614, § 76.

Some limitations have, indeed, been put by later statutes upon the formerly unrestrained power of location by municipal officers, and the power of final action has been conferred upon other public officers. Stat. 1898, chap. 578, p. 745, § 17; Rev. Laws, chap. 112, § 32; Stat. 1906, chap. 463, pt. 3, p. 610, § 66. But it still remains true that an ordinary street railway company holds its location upon the public ways without having any estate of its own in the lands.

But this right was, of course, subject to legislative control. Brownell v. Old Colony R. Co. 164 Mass. 29, 29 L.R.A. 169, 49 Am. St. Rep. 442, 41 N. E. 107. In 1891 it was enacted that, "whenever, in the opinion of the railroad commissioners, additional accommodations for the traveling public are required upon any street railway, they may, after due notice to the street railway company and hearing thereon, make such order requiring additional accommodations to be provided as they think justice to all parties concerned requires, and they may alter, revoke, and renew the same. . . . Any street railway corporation which neglects to comply with any such order for more than one week after it receives notice thereof in writing shall forfeit" a sum stated. Stat. 1891, chap. 216, p. 794, re-enacted with slight verbal changes in Stat. 1906, chap. 463, pt. 3, p. 619, § 97. After the enactment of this statute, and under the provisions of Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 112, §§ 14, 17, either the municipal officers, or twenty or more legal voters, of a city or town within which part of any street railway was located, could, if the public accommodation so required, obtain an order from the board that the railway company should furnish such additional accommodations as were needed. upon its railway, including, of course, any part thereof of which the company had chosen to discontinue the operation; for we cannot doubt that, so long at least, as the tracks remained in the street, they were still a part of the company's street railway. One effect accordingly of this statute was to make the company's discontinuance of the use of any portion of its tracks subject to the investigation and control of the board of railroad commissioners in the manner provided for; but otherwise the power of the company remained unaffected. In this case the board has made no order.

In passing upon this question we have not found much assistance from the decisions of the courts of other states, either as to railroad or street railway companies, which have been called to our attention by the industry of the petitioners' counsel. Many of them turned upon the mandatory language of the charters or other statutes, or of the ordinances which were before the courts. Union P. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 428; State v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538; New York v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 133 N. Y. 104, 28 Am. St. Rep. 609, 30 N. E. 563; Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Rich, 91 Mich. 293, 51 N. W. 1001; Potwin Place v. Topeka R. Co. 51 Kan. 609, 37 Am. St. Rep. 312, 33 Pac. 309; People ex rel. Cantrell v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 176 Ill. 512, 35 L.R.A. 656, 45 N. E. 824, 52 N. E. 292. Undoubtedly a valid requirement in an order of location would be enforced (Selectmen of Gardner v. Templeton Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 294, 68 N. E. 340), but no such question is before us. Other cases relied on by the petitioners were decided upon the ground that the property of a railroad company is charged with the public duty and held subject to the trust to carry out the objects of its charter. Gates v. Boston & N. Y. Air Line R. Co. 53 Conn. 333, 5 Atl. 695; Pierce v. Emery, 82 N. H. 484; State ex rel. Naylor v. Dodge City, M. & T. R. Co. 53 Kan. 377, 42 Am. St. Rep. 295, 36 Pac. 747. Others were cases in which a company sought to retain a part of its franchise, or of some particular location, while abandoning the rest of it. People v. Albany & V. R. Co. 19 How. Pr. 523, and 24 N. Y. 261, 82 Am. Dec. 295; State ex rel. Bridgeton v. Bridgeton & M. Traction Co. 62 N. J. L. 592, 45 L.R.A. 837, 43 Atl. 715; People ex rel. Walker v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 120 Ill. 48, 10 N. E. 657; State ex rel. Grinsfelder v. Spokane Street R. Co. 19 Wash. 518, 41 L.R.A. 515, 67 Am. St. Rep. 739, 53 Pac. 719. But here the respondent has discontinued its use of the whole of the tracks covered by the locations under which they were built. And San Antonio Street R. Co. v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 38 S. W. 54, Id. 10 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 30 S. W. 266, has, as we have already seen, been reversed in 90 Tex. 520, 35 L.R.A. 662, 59 Am. St. Rep. 834, 39 S. W. 926.

We may add that it would be difficult, in the absence of statutory requirement, to reach the conclusion that a street railway company with so small a capital and resources so limited as those shown here should be required to operate a branch line which is not an integral part of its main system, and which has not sufficient patronage to meet its running expenses. If it were a steam railroad, it would not be required, under the decision in Com. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 12 Gray, 180, to run passenger trains on such a branch; but in the case of a street railway, which does not carry freight, this means the complete disuse of its tracks. Substantially this rule was affirmed in Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 94 Va. 291, 26 S. E. 943, and in Jack v. Williams (C. C.) 113 Fed. 823. See also Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 120 Ill. 200, 11 N. E. 347; People v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 95, 8 N. E. 369. The general rule for such cases was stated by Gray, J., in Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington, 142 U. S. 492, 499, 35 L. ed. 1092, 1095, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283, 285: "If, as in Union P. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 428, the character of a railroad corporation expressly requires it to maintain its railroad as a continuous line, it may be compelled to do so by mandamus. So, if the charter requires the corporation to construct its road and to run its cars to a certain point on tidewater (as was held to be the case in State v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538), and it had so constructed its road and used it for years, it may be compelled to continue to do so. And mandamus will lie to compel a railroad corporation to build a bridge in compliance with an express requirement of statute. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 112 U. S. 12, 28 L. ed. 619, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 19; People ex rel. Kimball v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569. But, if the charter of a railroad corporation simply authorizes the corporation, without requiring it, to construct and maintain a railroad to a certain point, it has been held that it cannot be compelled by mandamus to complete or maintain its road to that point when it would not be remunerative. York & N. M. R. Co. v. R. 1 El. & Bl. 858; Great Western R. Co. v. R. 1 El. & Bl. 874; Com. v. Fitchburg R. Co. supra; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Southern Minnesota R. Co. 18 Minn. 40, Gil. 21."

We cannot say that the respondent's discontinuance of this line was "without right or lawful excuse" within the meaning of the statute; and it is not necessary to consider the exceptions taken by the respondent to the master's report. The petition must be dismissed.

So ordered.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

PATRICK J. BANAGHAN, Appt.,
v.

MARY A. MALANEY.

Specific performance — refusal — discretion.

1. Specific performance of a contract for sale of property may be refused where it was obtained by a person of superior mental ability from an aged, inexperienced, and ignorant woman, who was persuaded to refrain from consulting an adviser, and whose racial prejudices were appealed to for present execution of the contract, while circumstances which might enhance the value of the property were not disclosed to her

Same — retention of bill — damages.

2. Upon refusal of specific performance of a contract to sell real estate because of inequitable conduct on the part of complainant, the bill need not be retained for the assessment of damages, but may be dismissed, and complainant left to his remedy at law.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Superior Court for Worcester County dismissing a bill filed to secure specific performance of a contract to sell real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Burton W. Potter and Paul Potter, for appellant:

Specific performance should be ordered because the plaintiff has not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law.

Jones v. Newhall, 115 Mass. 248, 15 Am. Rep. 97; Old Colony R. Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25, 66 Am. Dec. 394.

The bill should be retained for the purpose of giving the plaintiff relief in damages, even if specific performance is not ordered.

Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 232; Rev. Laws, chap. 159, § 6.

Messrs. Earle Brown and Charles A. McDonough, for respondent:

Specific performance is not a matter of strict right, but is founded on the sound discretion of the court, exercised under the guidance of equitable principles.

Curran v. Holyoke Water Power Co. 116 Mass. 90; Western R. Corp. v. Babcock, 6 Met. 346; Story, Eq. Jur. § 742; St. John v. Benedict, 6 Johns. Ch. 117; Aldrich, Eq. Pl. & Pr. p. 254.

Note. — As to the right of a complainant whose claim to relief in equity is defeated by want of equity, to a money judgment, see case note to Johnston & G. Bros. v. Bunn, post, 1064.

A court of equity will not decree specific performance of a contract in favor of a party merely because he is not guilty of sufficient fraud or deceit to constitute a legal defense to the contract.

Cuff v. Dorland, 50 Barb. 438.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judge had a right, upon his findings, to refuse to give the plaintiff a decree for specific performance of his agreement with the defendant. It is true that the agreement was good and sufficient upon its face; the defendant was legally competent to make it; and it was not obtained by such fraud or misrepresentation as would give the defendant a right to avoid it. But this is not enough to entitle the plaintiff, as a matter of right, to enforce specific performance. His right to this remedy is not an absolute one. It rests in the sound discretion of the court. It may be refused to one who has been guilty of any unfair conduct, or has taken any inequitable advantage of the other party to the agreement, even though there is no sufficient ground for the rescission of the agreement. Curran v. Holyoke Water Power Co. 116 Mass. 90; Western R. Corp. v. Babcock, 6 Met. 346, 352. This rule has been recognized in the later decisions of this court. O'Brien v. Boland, 166 Mass. 481, 44 N. E. 602; Thaxter v. Sprague, 169 Mass. 397, 34 N. E. 541. And see the cases collected in 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 62 et seq. 67.

The defendant was an aged, inexperienced, and ignorant woman. The mental ability of the plaintiff's agent was superior to hers; he persuaded her to refrain from consulting the adviser upon whom she was disposed to rely, and wrought upon her racial prejudices to persuade her to make the agreement at once upon the terms which he offered. After having thus kept her from obtaining the independent advice which she desired, he did not disclose to her the circumstances which led him to believe that a higher price could be obtained for the property. He was not, of course, under any fiduciary obligations to her; but this conduct on his part does not entitle him to favorable consideration in a court of equity. He took an inequitable advantage of the defendant.

The plaintiff further contends that his bill, instead of being dismissed, should have been retained for the purpose of giving him relief in damages. Undoubtedly this might have been done. It was done in Rosenberg v. Heffernan, 197 Mass. 151, 83 N. E. 316. Presumably it would have been done here if the plaintiff had so requested. But the court was not bound to adopt this course; it might leave the plaintiff wholly to his remedy at law, as was done in Curran v. Holyoke Water Power Co. supra. In Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 232, relied on by the plaintiff, as in Tobin v. Larkin, 183 Mass. 389, 67 N. E. 340, Lexington Print Works v. Canton, 171 Mass. 414, 50 N. E. 931, and similar cases, the plaintiff had lost his right to purely equitable relief without fault on his part. The rule of those cases is not applicable here. The plaintiff has not asked for leave to change his bill by amendment into an action at law for damages, as in Merrill v. Beckwith, 168 Mass. 72, 46 N. E. 400.

Decree affirmed.

SAMUEL MEISNER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

DETROIT, BELLE ISLE, & WINDSOR FERRY COMPANY.

(— Mich. —, 118 N. W. 14.)

Private carrier — pleasure resort.

A ferry company which maintains a pleasure resort on its own property for a particular class of persons whose patronage it invites and for whose accommodation it runs a boat devoted exclusively to their transportation is not, so far as that enterprise is concerned, a common carrier; and it may exclude from the boat persons who will be undesirable to its patrons, or destroy the success of its undertaking.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor for a less sum than was demanded in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful exclusion from defendant's boat. Affirmed.

Note. — The above decision seems to be one of first impression upon the question whether an amusement company operating a boat as a means of transportation to its pleasure grounds is a public carrier or not, the answer to which would, of course, determine whether such company had the right to exclude undesirable persons from its boat, as an extensive search has failed to disclose any other case in which the question is discussed. But attention may be called to People v. Mago, 69 Hun, 559, 23 N. Y. Supp. 938, in which it was held that the owner of a yacht conveying passengers for hire, mainly on Sundays and holidays, to a place of public resort and back again, was not maintaining a ferry within the meaning of a criminal statute, the provisions of which do not appear in the report of the case. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Statement by Grant, Ch. J.:

The defendant is organized under chapter 175, §§ 6646-6659, Comp. Laws. Its articles of association declare its purpose to be "to own and operate ferries on an island in the river, between the city of Detroit, and the towns of Walkerville, Windsor, and Sandwich, Province of Ontario, and the Belle Isle, and such other places on the Detroit river and St. Clair river as the business and interests of the public and said corporation may from time to time require." Belle Isle is a public park, comprising an island in the river, and owned by the city. Between the places mentioned it runs ferries, and, as to traffic between those places, is a public common carrier of passengers. The defendant purchased Bois Blanc island, situated in Canadian waters, near the mouth of the Detroit river, opposite to and about a quarter of a mile from Amherstburg, Canada. It owns the entire island, except a tract reserved for lighthouse purposes and three small cottage lots. Upon its property defendant has erected a café, dance hall, cottage for women, shelters and amusement buildings of various kinds, laid out walks, drives, bicycle paths, baseball and athletic grounds, bathing beaches, etc. Upon these it has expended about $200,000. It owns and runs a boat from Detroit to its park on Bois Blanc island twice daily. This boat, the steamer Columbia, will carry from 3,000 to 3,500 passengers. A smaller boat, the Papoose, licensed to carry 160 passengers, runs between Amherstburg and Bois Blanc. The island being located in Canadian territory, defendant's boat, the Columbia, is required to stop at Amherstburg, going and coming, to take on a custom's inspector. It caters largely to women and children. It owns its own docks used on this route. No liquor is allowed to be sold on the island or on the boats. It provides special policemen to patrol the island, to prevent all conduct and disturbances which would annoy its patrons. Its boat, the Columbia, carries excursions of various societies to the island, selling tickets at a reduced rate to such societies, which make a profit by reselling them at the regular rate. During the season of 1906, there were about 176 of such special excursions. Plaintiff was refused passage from the city of Detroit to Bois Blanc on two occasions. He had purchased tickets for these trips from societies which gave these excursions. The contracts between the defendant and these organizations contained the following provision: "The party of the first part reserves the right to refuse to accept tickets sold or furnished to any persons whom they believe to be possible objectionable passengers. Tickets sold or furnished in violation of this contract will not be accepted." The tickets also contained the following provision: "This ticket is sold subject to the agreement between the Detroit, Belle Isle, & Windsor Ferry Company and the above organization, and must be exchanged for the excursion ticket at wharf on date of the excursion." On attempting to pass the gate onto the steamer, plaintiff was refused admission. The reason given on each occasion was that on a former occasion he had engaged in a disturbance upon the boat to the annoyance of passengers and crew. He brought this suit to recover damages for refusal to carry him as a passenger. The action is in tort, alleging a breach of defendant's duty as a common carrier of passengers. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, except as to the price of the ticket which plaintiff had purchased. He was permitted to recover for this amount, with interest.

Messrs. Sloman & Sloman, for plaintiff in error:

The company's object was to own and operate a ferry such as the business and interests of the public and the corporation might require, and it therefore constituted a public ferry company with duties and obligations of a common carrier.

Grant, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Is the defendant, in its business between Detroit and its park on Bois Blanc island, a public common carrier of passengers, obliged by law to accept any person who offers himself as a passenger? This is the important question in this suit. If it be answered in the affirmative, it follows that no person or corporation can own a private park, private docks, its own means of transportation, and control its pleasure grounds, and means of transportation thereto, without becoming a common carrier, obliged to transport anyone who presents himself as a passenger. The sole business in which the defendant is engaged with these two boats is carrying passengers to and from its private pleasure grounds. It caters to a particular class of people. It desires to keep out those whom, for reasons of its own, it deems objectionable. Unless it did this, it would not secure the class of patrons it desires. If it secures the better class of people, which its managers probably believe would make the enterprise a success, beneficial financially to themselves and attractive to respectable people, it must exclude the rough, boisterous, and rowdyish element from its boats and grounds. It is not engaged in the general carriage of passengers for business and pleasure. It invites such persons and parties as it chooses, and upon such terms as it chooses to make, to visit its own grounds, provided, as above stated, with the means of entertainment, amusement, and sport. It is in all essentials as private an enterprise as that of a theater, a circus, or a race track.

Counsel do not disagree as to the law of common carriers of passengers. Anyone, no matter what his character is or has been, presenting himself for transportation to such carrier is, upon paying his fare, entitled to be transported, provided there is nothing in his condition or conduct when he presents himself to justify his exclusion. This rule does not apply to the owners of theaters, circuses, race tracks, private parks, and the like, unless there be some statute regulating their business, and providing the terms and conditions under which that company's business may be carried on. It appears to be settled by the authorities that these are private enterprises, under the control of private parties, and that they may license whomever they will to enter, and refuse admission to whomsoever they will. Their own interests prompt fair and just treatment to those whom they invite to their places of pleasure. The right given to enter such places is a mere license, and after the right to enter is granted, it may be revoked. So, also, the right to enter may be refused to anyone. People ex rel. Burnham v. Flynn, 189 N. Y. 180, 82 N. E. 169; Collister v. Hayman, 183 N. Y. 250, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1188, 111 Am. St. Rep. 740, 76 N. E. 20, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 344; Pearce v. Spalding, 12 Mo. App. 141; Purcell v. Daly, 19 Abb. N. C. 301; Burton v. Scherpf, 1 Allen, 133, 79 Am. Dec. 717; McCrea v. Marsh, 12 Gray, 211, 71 Am. Dec. 745; Horney v. Nixon, 213 Pa. 20, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1184, 110 Am. St. Rep. 520, 61 Atl. 1088, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 349; Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 Mees. & W. 838. Wood v. Leadbitter, supra, is very similar in its facts to this case. It is cited with approval in several of the above-cited cases. Pleasure grounds of this character are not necessities of life, any more than are theaters and race tracks; and, unless restrained by some provisions of their charters, their owners can impose any terms of admission they choose. No such restraints are imposed upon the defendant in this case. The defendant can exact an entrance fee at the park, or it can compensate itself by charging for transportation to it and admit its patrons otherwise free to the park. The ride upon the boat and the use of the grounds are part of the same scheme for pleasure furnished by the defendant to those whom it may choose to carry. It is perhaps due to the plaintiff to say that he denies the improper conduct charged against him, but his rights in no sense depend upon the reason given for his exclusion.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMAS S. SPRAGUE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

JAMES R. HOSIE.

(— Mich. —, 118 N. W. 497.)

Statute of frauds — shares of stock — sale.

1. Issued shares in a corporation are goods within the meaning of the statute of frauds, and oral contracts for their sale which do not comply with the terms of that statute are invalid.

Pleading — sufficiency — valid contract.

2. A declaration in an action to recover damages for breach of contract to sell shares of stock is not insufficient because it does not allege facts to show whether or not the contract was obnoxious to the statute of frauds, if the existence of a valid contract is asserted.

Burden of proof — general issue — validity of contract.

3. The burden of proving a contract valid under the statute of frauds may be cast on plaintiff by the plea of the general issue, in an action to recover damages for breach of contract to sell shares of stock in which the declaration alleges the existence of a valid contract.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) damages for breach of contract to sell corporate stock. Affirmed.

Statement by Ostrander, J.:

The suit is brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the refusal of defendant to perform his contract to sell plaintiff 20 shares of bank stock at $154 a share. The declaration contains the common counts in assumpsit and a special count in which the said contract and a breach thereof are averred. The plea is the general issue. Defendant offered no testimony. A verdict for defendant was directed by the court, and judgment on the verdict was entered. Plaintiff is a dealer in stocks and bonds. He testified, however, that he desired to purchase this stock for himself, and not for any client. In a letter written by him to defendant of date August 22, 1906, is the following: "I have a client who may purchase a limited amount of Michigan Savings Bank stock. . . . If you decide to offer the stock to me, please make the price to hold good until September 1st as my client is hard to find at times and it may take two or three days to hear from him." In reply defendant of date August 30th wrote: "Replying to above, I have only 20 shares Mich. Sav. Bank stock and will sell same for 155 or 3,100.00 net. This is the best price I can make. Have refused an offer of 150; on account of vacations your letter has been neglected

Case Note. — Contract for the sale of corporate stock as one for the sale of "goods," etc., within statute of frauds.

This note does not include cases of parol subscription to corporate stock, or of agreements of a vendor thereof to repurchase shares of stock from a vendee on certain contingencies.

The doctrine that a contract for the sale of corporate stock is one for the sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise," within the statute of fraud, is almost unanimously recognized by the courts of this country. Mayer v. Child, 47 Cal. 142; North v. Forest, 15 Conn. 400; Ayres v. French, 41 Conn. 142; Pray v. Mitchell, 60 Me. 430; Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9; Thompson v. Alger, 12 Met. 428; Eastern R. Co. v. Benedict, 10 Gray, 212; Boardman v. Cutter, 128 Mass. 388; Meehan v. Sharp, 151 Mass. 564, 24 N. E. 907; Berwin v. Bolles, 183 Mass. 340, 67 N. E. 323; McIlroy v. Richards, 148 Mich. 604, 112 N. W. 489; Fine v. Hornsby, 2 Mo. App. 61; Bernhardt v. Walls, 29 Mo. App. 206; Orr v. Hall, 75 Neb. 548, 106 N. W. 656; Baltzen v. Nicolay, 53 N. Y. 467, reversing 3 Jones & S. 203; Tompkins v. Sheehan, 158 N. Y. 617, 53 N. E. 502; Ryers v. Tuska, 39 N. Y. S. R. 103, 14 N. Y. Supp. 926; Nichols v. Clark, 40 Misc. 107, 81 N. Y. Supp. 262; Morse v. Douglass, 112 App. Div. 798, 99 N. Y. Supp. 392; Tomlinson v. Miller, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. till now." Of date November 5, 1906, plaintiff again wrote to defendant, saying: "If you wish to sell your 20 shares of Michigan Savings Bank stock at this time at $149.00 per share net to you, I think I can make sale of the same,"—concluding the letter as follows: "If you desire to let me offer the stock for sale at this price, please make price good for this week, as to-morrow is a holiday and it may take a day or two after that to accomplish anything." The reply, dated November 7th, was: "I have an offer of 160 Jan. 1, 1907. In the meantime I will get a dividend of 4 to 5 per cent. Would not sell for less than 164 net at this time." Plaintiff on November 12th again wrote defendant: "Replying to your favor of the 7th inst. regarding 20 shares of Michigan Savings Bank stock, which you offered to sell at 154 net to you, if you will sell 5 shares at 153. I will take it, if I am not supplied when I hear from you. Please advise me at once. I purchased some of this stock at a much less price since writing you and my client is willing to pay 153 for 5 shares to even up the block, if the matter is closed at once. I have no doubt I can get it for less money by looking around, but he told me to make you this offer to close the matter without delay. I do not see how you expect to get 4 to 5 per cent dividend January 1st, as the bank is only paying 7 per cent per annum, which would make the accrued dividend about 2.60 per cent at this date." To this defendant made no reply. The plaintiff testified that, on November 17th, by telephone, he advised defendant that he would take 20 shares at $154 a share, and told defendant to send the certificate with draft attached to the savings bank, and that defendant said he would send the stock, but that it might be two or three days before he could do so; that immediately thereafter, on the same day, he sent to defendant a letter confirming the offer made by telephone. This letter was not produced. A motion to strike out the testimony of the oral communication was granted, and plaintiff excepted. Later, on December 7th, plaintiff demanded the stock, saying he was ready to pay for it, but defendant refused to deliver the stock claiming he had never bargained for its sale. Later, a tender, in the form of a cashier's check for $3,080, was made to defendant and was refused. On December 7th the market value of the stock was $180 per share, plus a dividend of $3.50 per share. It is claimed on the part of appellant, first, that the letters make a complete and binding contract; second, that bank stock, ownership of which is usually evidenced by certificates, is not goods, wares, or merchandise within the meaning of the statute of frauds; third, that the defense that the contract, if resting in parol, was void under the statute of frauds, was waived because no notice of such defense was given with defendant's plea.

Mr. Frederic T. Harward, for plaintiff in error:

Stock does not constitute "goods, wares,

In Hightower v. Ansley, 126 Ga. 8, 54 S. E. 939, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 927, this doctrine was adopted, the court refusing to follow the contrary holding in Rogers v. Burr, 105 Ga. 432, 70 Am. St. Rep. 50, 31 S. E. 438.

So, a contract for the sale of corporate stock is one for the sale of "personal property," within the Florida statute of frauds, which uses that expression instead of "goods, wares, and merchandise." Southern Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359.

And such rule is not affected by a by-law of a stock exchange rendering oral contracts for the sale of stock binding. Ryers v. Tuska, supra.

But a parol contract for the sale of shares of a proposed issue of an increase of corporate stock, which the vendor, as an original shareholder, will be entitled to, is not a contract for the sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise," as the subject-matter of the contract was not in existence when it was entered into. Gadsden v. Lance, McMull. Eq. 87, 37 Am. Dec. 548.

While the cases of Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, and Colvin v. Williams, 3 Harr. & J. 38, 5 Am. Dec. 417, apparently hold that corporate stock is not within the statute of frauds, yet this is dictum. See comment upon the latter case in Webb v. Baltimore & E. S. R. Co. 77 Md. 92, 39 Am. St. Rep. 396, 26 Atl. 113.

According to the later English authorities, shares of corporate stock are not "goods, wares, and merchandise," within the statute of frauds. Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 6 Mees. & W. 200; *Knight v. Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. There was no continuing offer to sell the stock at the price of $154 a share. Defendant's letter of November 7th, if it can be said to contain an offer to then sell the stock, was not a continuing offer. Moreover, whether it be treated as a present or a continuing offer to sell, it was refused and was 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not thereafter renewed. The bargain, if one was made, rests in parol.

2. Whether stock in an incorporated company, the shares of which have been actually issued, is goods, wares, or merchandise, within the meaning of the statute of frauds (Comp. Laws, § 9516), is a question which has been answered differently in different jurisdictions. In essentials our statute is a copy of the 17th section of the statute of Charles II., and was adopted in this jurisdiction in 1819 from the laws of the state of New York. The English courts, to a period as late as 1839, had not apparently determined conclusively that such shares were or were not within the statute. Mussey v. Cooke, Prec. in Ch. 533; Crull v. Dodson, Cas. t. King, 41. Lord Denman in Humble v. Mitchell, 11 Ad. & El. 205, a case decided in 1839, held with the concurrence of his associates that "shares in a joint-stock company like this [a bank] are mere choses in action, incapable of delivery, and not within the scope of the 17th section. A contract in writing was therefore unnecessary." It is stated in the opinion that no case had been found directly in point. Humble v. Mitchell, has apparently been since followed in England. See 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 961; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 244; Beach, Modern Law of Contr. § 558. See also note to Weightman v. Caldwell, 4 Wheat. 85-89, 4 L. ed. 520-522. In 1838, in Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9 (Humble v. Mitchell not being cited by counsel), the precise converse of the modern English rule was laid down; it being decided that the words "goods" and "merchandise," are broad enough in meaning to include stocks or shares in incorporated companies. The rule is affirmed in Boardman v. Cutter, 128 Mass. 388. To the same effect are North v. Forest, 15 Conn. 400; Pray v. Mitchell, 60 Me. 430; Spear v. Bach, 82 Wis. 192, 52 N. W. 97; Johnson v. Mulvy, 51 N. Y. 634. It must be admitted that at the common law shares of an incorporated company occupied much the same position as promissory notes and other mere choses in action. Indeed, it is held in Massachusetts that a promissory note is within the statute. Baldwin v. Williams, 3 Met. 365. To the contrary is Vawter v. Griffin, 40 Ind. 593, which approves the rule of Humble v. Mitchell. Such shares have, however, come to be subjects of common barter and sale, are usually evidenced by certificates which, in the absence of statute provisions, operate by assignment and delivery to transfer title to the shares as between the parties. They are in this state by statute subject to levy and sale on execution. In many other respects they are treated as something more than mere choses in action. It was said by this court in Weston v. McDowell, 20 Mich.

3. The declaration alleged no facts to show whether the contract sued upon was or was not obnoxious to the statute. It was nevertheless a good pleading. Dayton v. Williams, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 31; Harris Photographing Supply Co. v. Fisher, 81 Mich. 136, 45 N. W. 661; Stearns v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 112 Mich. 651, 71 N. W. 148; Kroll v. Diamond Match Co. 106 Mich. 127, 63 N. W. 983. See also 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 700; Seaman v. O'Hara, 29 Mich. 66, 67. The language of the statute in question here is: "No contract for the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise, for the price of $50 or more, shall be valid, unless," etc. It is clear that such a contract may be valid and enforceable, although no note or memorandum in writing of the bargain be made and signed by the party to be charged therewith. The plaintiff in his declaration asserts the existence of a valid contract and upon the motion or objection of the defendant must prove such an one. The scope of the plea of the general issue is as a general rule a denial of every material averment of fact in the declaration. The precise question presented was answered adversely to plaintiff's contention in Third Nat. Bank v. Steel, 129 Mich. 434, 64 L.R.A. 119, 88 N. W. 1050.

It follows that the judgment must be, and it is, affirmed.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Resp.,

v.

ERNEST R. TAYLOR, Appt.

(— Minn. —, 118 N. W. 1012.)

medicine and surgery" under the statutes of the state cannot, by virtue thereof, "practise dentistry" without securing a license as a dentist, as required by chap. 117, p. 127, Gen. Laws 1907.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Municipal Court of Minneapolis denying a new trial after defendant's conviction for having practised dentistry without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mead & Robertson, for appellant:

The reason for requiring a license to practise dentistry when such license is applied for by a layman does not apply to the practice of dentistry by regular physicians and surgeons.

State v. Beck, 21 R. I. 288, 45 L.R.A. 269, 43 Atl. 366; McCann v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 111, 48 S. W. 512; State v. Vandersluis, 42 Minn. 134, 6 L.R.A. 119, 43 N. W. 789.

Messrs. Frank Healy and Clyde R. White, for respondent:

The acts constitute a violation of the law unless physicians are exempt from the operation of the law.

State v. Sexton, 37 Wash. 110, 79 Pac. 634; State v. Thompson, 48 Wash. 683, 94 Pac. 667.

The statute makes no exception in favor of physicians.

Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 363; Rochester v. Upman, 19 Minn. 108, Gil. 78; State v. Cron, 23 Minn. 140; State v. Orth, 38 Minn. 150, 36 N. W. 103; State v. Benz, 41 Minn. 30, 42 N. W. 547; State v. Cooke, 24 Minn. 247, 31 Am. Rep. 344; State v. McGinnis, 30 Minn. 48, 14 N. W. 256.

ELLIOTT, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Dr. Taylor, the appellant, was convicted of the offense of practising dentistry without a license, in violation of chap. 117, p. 127, Gen. Laws 1907. He was at the time a licensed physician and surgeon, and claims that such license entitles him to engage in the incidental practice of dentistry on his own patients. Dr. Taylor extracted two teeth for one of his patients and took an impression in wax of the mouth and cavities. He sent this impression to a dental laboratory, where artificial teeth were made and returned to Dr. Taylor, who delivered them to his patient and received a fee of some $38 for his services. It is conceded that Dr. Taylor did not hold a certificate from the state board of dental examiners authorizing him to practise dentistry in this state, and that what he did comes within the terms of the statute which defines the practice of dentistry. He was therefore properly convicted, unless protected by his license as a physician and surgeon.

The statute provides that a person shall be regarded as practising medicine "who shall append the letters 'M. D.' or 'M. B.' to his name, or for a fee prescribe, direct, or recommend for the use of any person any drug, or medicine, or other agency, for the treatment or relief of any wound, fracture, or bodily injury, infirmity, or disease: Provided that this section shall not apply to dentists." Rev. Laws 1905, § 2300. It is true, as appellant contends, that the practice of medicine and surgery in its broad and comprehensive sense includes the practice of dentistry, which "is medical, surgical, or prosthetic. In so far as it is a direction of medical science to the prevention, modification, or removal, by medicinal and hygienic remedies, of the causes and effects of disease in the dental organs, it forms part of the physician's practice, just as does the treatment of cerebral, cardiac, or pulmonary diseases. In so far as it is an application of surgical skill to the fractures or to staphylocoraphy, it is simply oral surgery, involving only such knowledge and skill in the use of instruments as every surgeon must possess." Harris, Principles & Practice of Dentistry, p. xxxiii.

In the absence of any legislative declaration to the contrary, a certificate authorizing the holder to practise medicine and surgery would therefore entitle him to practise dentistry. But, for reasons of public policy, with which we have no particular concern, the legislature adopted the policy of dividing the field of medicine and surgery, and making a separate profession of a part thereof. State v. Vandersluis, 42 Minn. 129, 6 L.R.A. 119, 43 N. W. 789. It was thought that men who engage in the treatment of diseases of the dental organs should receive special preparation and be specially licensed to practise that particular branch or department of medicine and surgery. A state board of dental examiners was created, and authorized to determine who should be licensed and entitled to practise dentistry in the state. Rev. Laws 1905, §§ 2313-19; Gen. Laws 1907, chap. 117, p. 127. A department of dental surgery was also established at the university, with a course of study, the satisfactory completion of which would entitle the student to a special degree of dental surgeon. An examination of this course shows 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that it includes a considerable part of the work required in the medical school, but it also includes studies which relate particularly to diseases of the dental organs and others designed to insure efficiency in the mechanical work connected with the treatment. The statute now in force provides that "no person shall practise dentistry in the state without having complied with the provisions of this subdivision. . . . Any person who shall . . . violate any provision of this subdivision shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." And: "All persons shall be said to be practising dentistry, within the meaning of this section, . . . who shall for a fee, salary, or other reward paid or to be paid either to himself or to another person . . . replace lost teeth by artificial ones." Rev. Laws 1905, §§ 2315, 2319, as amended by chap. 117, p. 127, Gen. Laws 1907.

The legislature has thus defined both the practice of medicine and the practice of dentistry, and made of them two distinct professions. This statute relating to dentistry makes no exception in favor of one who holds a certificate entitling him to practise as a physician and surgeon. We can find no implied exceptions in this statute. The words "no person," in a criminal statute, are to be given their literal meaning. From an examination of the statutes of other states relating to the practice of dentistry, we learn that many contain express exceptions in favor of physicians and surgeons. Probably the most of them permit physicians to extract teeth or perform such other comparatively simple work. In the absence of any such exceptions, we must conclude that the legislature intended to restrict the scope of the practice of the physician and surgeon, and require him, if he desires to practise dentistry, to obtain a license from the state board of dental examiners in addition to his other certificate. What was said in State v. Vandersluis, supra, to the effect that the statute then under consideration would not limit the right of surgeon under his license, was dicta, and is not controlling.

In State v. Beck, 21 R. I. 288, 45 L.R.A. 269, 43 Atl. 366, it appeared that the law regulating the practice of dentistry was passed in 1888 (Laws 1888, chap. 712, p. 1), at a time when there was no law regulating the practice of medicine. Such a law was enacted in 1895 (Laws 1895, chap. 1353, p. 25), and in 1897 (Laws 1897, chap. 470, p. 205) the dentistry act was re-enacted in substantially its original form. It was held that a person who was authorized to practise medicine under the act of 1895 was entitled to practise dentistry as a branch of surgery, without complying with the dental act of 1897. The reasoning does not carry conviction to our minds, and we cannot regard the case as an authority which should be followed. The recent cases recognize the two professions, as separate and distinct. In State ex rel. Flickinger v. Fisher, 119 Mo. 344, 22 L.R.A. 799, 24 S. W. 167, a dentist was unsuccessful in his claim of exemption from jury duty under a statute which exempted a "practitioner of medicine," and in People v. DeFrance, 104 Mich. 563, 28 L.R.A. 139, 62 N. W. 709, it was held that dentists were not within a provision relating to privileged communications to one practising medicine and surgery. In Cherokee v. Perkins, 118 Iowa, 407, 92 N. W. 68, it was held that the power to tax "itinerant doctors, physicians, and surgeons," did not include itinerant dentists.

The order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

JOHN FLINNER, Appt.,

v.

W. B. McVAY, Resp't.

Contract — assignment — sufficiency.

1. Delivery of a power of attorney and the land contract to which it related, by the one upon whom it is conferred, to the intended assignee of the contract without executing it, is not sufficient to transfer the contract.

Same — writing.

2. An assignment of a land contract must be evidenced by writing where a writing is necessary to transfer an interest in real estate.

Case Note. — Applicability of statute of frauds to assignment or surrender of purchaser's interest under land contract.

The doctrine that the interest of the purchaser under a land contract is an interest in lands, within the meaning of the statute of frauds, and that accordingly a transfer thereof must be evidenced by writing, seems to be thoroughly established, and finds various expression in the following cases:

In Dougherty v. Catlett, 129 Ill. 431, 21 N. E. 932, it is said that the purchaser's interest under a land contract was an interest in or concerning lands within the meaning of the statute, it being well settled that the statute of frauds embraces equitable as well as legal interests in land; and that therefore, where such purchaser agreed by parol to sell and surrender to his vendor a portion of said premises, such 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Gallatin County in defendant's favor and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action to recover the purchase price of an assignment of a contract to sell land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. B. Law and Walter Aitken, for appellant:

The contract assignment was an assignment of a chose in action, and a writing was unnecessary.

Cross v. Sacramento Sav. Bank, 66 Cal. 462, 6 Pac. 94; Hutchings v. Low, 13 N. J. L. 247; Macklin v. Kinealy, 141 Mo. 113, 41 S. W. 893; 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 37, 44; Mitchell v. Taylor, 27 Or. 377, 41 Pac. 119; Pom. Code Remedies, § 147.

The assignment of this contract was not an attempt to convey any interest in real estate, for at law an executory contract of sale is a mere agreement which does not affect the title.

Messrs. Hartman & Hartman, for respondent:

The contract could not be assigned or transferred by parol and delivery merely.

20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 219.

Brantly, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is alleged in the complaint herein, that on August 7, 1906, the plaintiff and one W. P. Knowlton entered into a contract, of which the following is a copy:

Belgrade, Mont., Aug. 7th, 1906.

This agreement made this day and date be-agreement furnished no basis for the recovery of the consideration therefor.

And in Connor v. Tippet, 57 Miss. 594, it was held that the delivery of a bond for title, without a written assignment, will not pass the interest of the vendee in the land, under the statute of frauds.

The verbal assignment of an interest in an equitable estate in lands is as much within the operation of the statute of frauds as a transfer of a legal interest. Morgart v. Smouse, 103 Md. 463, 115 Am. St. Rep. 367, 63 Atl. 1070, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1140.

A parol contract to assign as security a contract for a deed is within the statute of frauds. Hackett v. Watts, 138 Mo. 502, 40 S. W. 113.

The assignment of a purchaser's interest under a land contract must be in writing to be effectual. Wilkie v. Womble, 90 N. C. 254.

And it has also been held that school-land certificates are contracts for the sale tween W. P. Knowlton, of Belgrade, Mont., party of the first part, and John Flinner, of Leav., Kans., party of the second part: W. P. Knowlton, party of the first part, agrees to sell and convey to John Flinner, party of the second part, all right and title to S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of sec. 16, 80a; S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of sec. 15, 160a; S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of sec. 15, 320a; N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ sec. 22, 160a; and the West $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 22, 80a,—all located in Town. 2 N., R. 5 E., in Gallatin Co., Mont. Also all horses, cattle, harness, farm machinery, and all other articles (except house furniture) upon above-named land for the sum of (\$25,000) twenty-five thousand dollars. W. P. Knowlton, party of the first part, agrees to accept (\$100) one hundred dollars as part payment, balance of (\$24,900) twenty-four thousand nine hundred dollars to be paid on or before Nov. 1st, 1906, at which time W. P. Knowlton agrees to transfer to John Flinner a warranted deed and abstract with clear title to said land, also a clear title to all stock, etc.

W. P. Knowlton.

John Flinner.

It is further alleged that, upon the signing and delivery of this contract, plaintiff paid to Knowlton $100 in cash; that thereafter, on October 29, 1906, plaintiff, with the knowledge and consent of Knowlton, sold and delivered the contract and assigned all of his rights thereunder to defendant for a consideration of $350, which the defendant agreed to pay; that, relying upon the said sale and assignment of the contract and the promise of defendant, the plaintiff refrained from asserting any rights thereunder; that, under and by virtue of the assignment, the land and other property to be conveyed by said Knowlton to plaintiff as in the contract specified was, by him, conveyed to defendant, who thereby received the benefits which had accrued to plaintiff under the contract; and that defendant having failed to pay the said sum of $350, there is now due and owing to plaintiff from him said amount. Judgment is demanded for the same. The answer denies that the assignment was made as alleged, that the plaintiff by reason of it refrained from asserting his rights under the contract, that the defendant obtained a conveyance to himself of the property mentioned, and that there is due plaintiff, in consideration of the assignment, the sum of $350 or any other sum.

At the close of plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, and judgment was entered for the defendant. Plaintiff has appealed from the of real estate, and can only be sold and transferred like any real-estate contract, by an assignment in writing. Smith v. Clarke, 7 Wis. 551; Whitney v. State Bank, 7 Wis. 620.

Where the vendee's interest has been transferred by written assignment, it is incompetent by parol evidence to show that the parties subsequently agreed to convert the assignment into a conditional one, as such an agreement would be void under the statute of frauds. Richardson v. Johnsen, 41 Wis. 100, 22 Am. Rep. 712.

A verbal agreement among the purchasers at a judicial sale, by which the plaintiff claimed to be considered as a joint purchaser of a fractional interest, was held to be void under the statute of frauds in Arden v. Brown, 4 Cranch, C. C. 121, Fed. Cas. No. 510.

A contract for the sale of an equitable estate in lands, whether it is under a contract for the conveyance by a third person, or otherwise, is clearly a sale of an interest in the lands, within the statute of frauds. Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sumn. 345, Fed. Cas. No. 13,019.

A parol agreement to substitute a purchaser relates to lands and an interest therein, and is within the statute of frauds. Reams v. Thompson (Ga. App.) 62 S. E. 1014; Brown v. Jones, 46 Barb. 400; Love v. Cobb, 63 N. C. 324.

The case of Currier v. Howard, 14 Gray, 511, sometimes cited as authority for the proposition that a purchaser's interest under a land contract may be assigned by parol, is in fact not at variance with the doctrine of the foregoing cases, as it simply recognized such parol assignment as effectual after it had become executed by the acts of the parties thereto, holding that a contract to convey land might be specifically enforced by one to whom it had been assigned by verbal agreement. The statement therein made, that no assignment in writing is necessary, has reference to the contention that an obligation of record or under seal could only be assigned by an instrument of as solemn a nature.

The question whether the interest of a purchaser under a land contract is of such a character as to require an assignment thereof to be in writing also frequently arises where a parol rescission or surrender of the contract has been attempted; and the doctrine of the cases is that a parol contract to surrender or to rescind a contract for the sale of land, which is wholly executory and under which nothing has been done, is a contract for the sale and transfer of an interest in land within the statute of frauds, and cannot be enforced any more than any other agreement concerning an interest in real property may be. Carr v. Williams, 17 Kan. 575; McEwan v. Ortman, 34 Mich. 325; Grover v. Buck, 34 Mich. 519; Grunow v. Salter, 118 Mich. 148, 76 N. W. 325; Stewart v. McLaughlin, 126 Mich. 1, 85 N. W. 266, 87 N. W. 218; McCulloch v. Tapp, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 678; Goucher v. Martin, 9 Watts, 106; judgment and an order denying him a new trial. The grounds of the motion for nonsuit are, substantially: (1) That the evidence does not show that the plaintiff ever assigned his rights under the contract to defendant; (2) that the contract could not be assigned without the written consent of Knowlton, and the evidence does not show that such consent was given; (3) that, on November 2d, subsequent to the date of the alleged assignment, the plaintiff received the contract back from defendant and attempted to enforce it in his own behalf, and that the assignment, if made, was revoked; and (4) that there is no evidence tending to show that defendant obtained any conveyance from Knowlton of the property described in the contract. While the question presented by each of the grounds of the motion is submitted for decision, the principal contention is as to whether the facts show an assignment to defendant by plaintiff of his right under the contract. A solution of this question is, in our opinion, determinative of these appeals.

The plaintiff resides in the state of Kansas. The defendant and Knowlton reside in Gallatin county, some miles from Bozeman, the county seat. On October 21st, a few days before the final payment was to be made under the contract, the defendant, having knowledge of it, approached plaintiff's son, William A. Flinner, who also resides in Gallatin county, and asked him if his father intended to take the Knowlton farm. Flinner replied that his father had not said much about the matter in his last letter, but that in a prior letter he had said that he had made arrangements for the money to enable him to do so. Then inquiry was made by defendant whether the father would sell his interest in the farm. This question Flinner could not answer. Thereupon defendant asked him to write to his father to conclude the purchase and to state to him that defendant would give him $250 for his bargain. Flinner then said he did not think his father would be willing to send out to Montana $24,900 to make final payment and then sell for so small a profit. An easier way, he said, would be for the defendant to buy the contract and have the conveyance made, directly to himself. To this plan the defendant assented, offering to pay $250 besides the $100 already paid by the plaintiff. On the evening of the same day Flinner wrote to plaintiff to ascertain his wishes, as follows:

Belgrade, Mont., October, 1906.

Dear Father:

Mr. Boyd McVay was here to day. He Cravener v. Bowser, 4 Pa. 259, s. c. on subsequent appeal, 56 Pa. 132; Wells v. Wayman, 1 Lack. Leg. Record, 485, 3 Brightly Dig. (Pa.) p. 3880; Dial v. Crain, 10 Tex. 444; Sanborn v. Murphy, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 509, 25 S. W. 459; Cutright v. Union Sav. & Invest. Co. 33 Utah, 486, 94 Pac. 984.

An opposite conclusion seems to have been reached, however, in Proctor v. Thompson, 13 Abb. N. C. 340, where it is held that a written contract which is within the statute of frauds may be abandoned or wholly rescinded by a subsequent oral agreement, upon the ground that the statute of frauds goes no further than to require the contract to be in writing and subscribed by the party by whom the sale is made, leaving the contract after it is made to be governed by the rules which governed other written contracts, only requiring that the terms of the contract should at all times be sought within the writing. The court said: "It says nothing about its abandonment, or dissolution, or rescission. These are not required to be in writing. The statute is not concerned with the contract after it has been made, and to require an abandonment of it to be in writing would be to add to the statute a provision which it does not now contain; the contract which must be in writing is the contract for the sale. When that is put in writing and signed by the seller the statute is satisfied. A dissolution of the contract comes after this. It is no part of the original, nor does it add a new term to it. It is something subsequently existing by the acts of the parties by reason of which the former contract has ceased to be enforceable as a contract, and it does not in any way come within the statute."

In Sutton v. Sears, 10 Ind. 223, it was held that a verbal agreement to rescind a contract for the sale of lands is not within the provisions of a statute which provided that parol contracts for the sale of land cannot be enforced, and omitted the clause in relation to "any interest in or concerning" lands, it not being a contract for the sale of lands, as the title is already in the person to whom the surrender is made.

But where the agreement to rescind has become executed, a parol rescission is recognized as valid by the courts, the acts of the parties operating as an estoppel in pais to transfer the vendee's interest "by operation of law," and in that manner satisfying the statute of frauds. See Arrington v. Porter, 47 Ala. 714; Beach v. Covillard, 4 Cal. 315; Washington v. M'Gee, 7 T. B. Mon. 131; Miller v. Pierce, 104 N. C. 389, 10 S. E. 554; Elliott v. Bozorth (Or.) 97 Pac. 632; Raffensberger v. Cullison, 28 Pa. 426; Moseley v. Witt, 79 S. C. 141, 60 S. E. 520; Bullion v. Campbell, 27 Tex. 653; Telford v. Frost, 76 Wis. 172, 44 N. W. 835; Cutright v. Union Sav. & Invest. Co. supra.

wants to buy the contract you have with Perry Knowlton for his farm. He offers $250 and your $100 back, making $350 in all. Now, if you want to sell for that small amount you can send me the contract and necessary papers and I will turn them over to Mr. McVay. Now you can do as you please about this, but my advice would be not to take this, and go ahead and buy the place yourself, because you can make more money out of it. Mr. McVay is very anxious for the place, and you might sell to him later on for a better price, but you will have to act pretty quick one way or the other as the time is getting close. . . .

From Will.

To this letter the father replied:

Leavenworth, Kan., Oct. 26th 1906.

Dear Son:

Being I have sent the agreement and not signing it I hereby send power of attorney for you to execute in my place. I can get the $10,000 from the Wulfekhuler Bank any time, but if Mr. McVay will do as you say, namely the $100 and $250, he may have the Knowlton farm. Yours respectfully,

John Flinner.

On receipt of this letter Flinner went to the home of the defendant, and, finding him there, went with him to see Knowlton. Flinner told Knowlton that his father had sold his interest to defendant, showing his father's letter and power of attorney. After reading them over, Knowlton said to defendant, "All right; I'll meet you at Bozeman on Thursday," that day being November 1st. After leaving Knowlton, Flinner delivered the contract, his father's letter, and power of attorney to defendant. On the morning of November 1st defendant, while on his way to Bozeman to meet Knowlton, met Flinner and inquired of him if he was going to Bozeman. Flinner told him that he was not unless it was necessary. Defendant said he did not think it necessary. Flinner then said that he would be in Belgrade (a village near by) until 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and that, if wanted, he could be reached by telephone. Flinner heard nothing from the defendant until the next morning. Defendant then informed him that Knowlton refused to make the conveyance, giving no reason other than that "he did not have to." He thereupon returned the papers to Flinner, saying to him that he had better indorse his assignment on the contract, which he did, retaining it thereafter. During the conversation and after the papers had been returned to the possession of Flinner, the defendant told Flinner that if Knowlton would make the conveyance he would still pay the plaintiff $350, as he had agreed.

The foregoing is the substance of the statement of William Flinner on his examination in chief. Upon his cross-examination he stated, in substance, that defendant's proposition to him was to pay for the contract, if he could get the place. Elsewhere he stated that defendant was to pay his father $250 for his interest in the land; that he offered this for the bargain. Being asked directly: "Do you say now that you sold him the contract and it was understood distinctly between you that he was to buy the contract and paying $350 irrespective of whether Perry Knowlton would make the deed to him or not?" he replied, "Just as I said before; he said he would pay $350 if he got the place." The foregoing is all the testimony touching the terms of the contract.

It appears from other evidence that later in November the defendant entered into negotiations with Knowlton for a purchase of a portion of his lands. These negotiations resulted in a sale by him (Knowlton) to defendant of about 700 acres of land, including a portion of the lands described in the contract between the plaintiff and Knowlton, but no personal property. The power of attorney referred to was properly executed and acknowledged, and authorized William A. Flinner, for and on behalf of John Flinner "to sell, assign, and deliver the contract for purchase of land from Perry Knowlton." It is difficult to gather from the statements of this witness whether defendant was to take an assignment of the contract at the price of $350, with the proviso that payment should be made only in case he obtained a conveyance from Knowlton, or whether he was to pay $350 absolutely for an assignment of Flinner's rights under the contract. Taking the most favorable view of the evidence and adopting the latter as the understanding and purpose of the parties, it fails to make out a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff. Assuming that Knowlton's written assent to the assignment was not necessary in order to substitute defendant to all the plaintiff's rights, still the substitution was not legally made, because William A. Flinner did not execute the power granted by his father, so as to make it effective. The interest acquired by the plaintiff under the contract was a right to have a conveyance of the land to himself. It was an equity in the land—a valuable right. The grant, assignment, or transfer of this character of interest, by whatever name the act of the parties may be called, is a act of an interest in real property, and is not valid unless made in conformity with the requirements of the statute. Civil Code 1895, § 2185. The plaintiff, by tendering the final payment, would have been in position to demand and enforce a conveyance from Knowlton. William A. Flinner was armed with authority by the plaintiff to substitute defendant to this right, and thus clothe him with plaintiff's equity; yet, by failing to make the transfer in writing, he failed to put defendant in such a position that he could tender the payment and demand a conveyance. The verbal transfer, accompanied by a delivery of the contract, did not accomplish this purpose. Defendant, therefore, got nothing, even though it be conceded that both William A. Flinner and defendant were of the opinion—which no doubt was the fact—that the requirements of the law had been fully met.

While there is some diversity of opinion among the courts of the different states as to whether the statute applies to assignments of such contracts, it is the general rule, based, as we think, upon correct reasoning, that where the creation of an interest must be evidenced by a writing, the transfer of that interest must likewise be evidenced by writing. Arden v. Brown, 4 Cranch, C. C. 121, Fed. Cas. No. 510; Smith v. Clarke, 7 Wis. 551; Whitney v. State Bank, 7 Wis. 620; Abbott v. Baldwin, 62 N. H. 583; Wilkie v. Womble, 90 N. C. 254; Love v. Cobb, 63 N. C. 324; Bowser v. Cravener, 56 Pa. 132; Connor v. Tippet, 57 Miss. 594; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 219; Smith, Fr. § 367. Counsel have devoted considerable space in their brief to a discussion of the assignable character of the contract. It is argued that it was assignable, and, since this is so, it could be assigned by mere delivery. The question here is not whether such contracts are assignable. That things in action, or rights arising out of obligations, are assignable, is the general rule. Civil Code 1895, § 1351. Nonassignability is the exception. The transfer may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute. Civil Code 1895, § 1450. But § 2185, supra, is such express requirement, applicable to the right here involved.

We have assumed that the evidence justifies the conclusion that the result of the transaction was an attempted absolute sale, by the plaintiff to defendant, of his rights under the contract. There is a strong presumption, however, that the understanding was, that the stipulated price for the transfer was to be paid only upon the condition that the defendant secured the conveyance. This conclusion is justified by the fact that William A. Flinner stated on his cross-examination that this was the contract, and the fact that when the papers were delivered to the defendant, payment was not demanded. It also finds support in the fact that, when the defendant ascertained that Knowlton would not make the conveyance to him, he delivered the papers to William A. Flinner, who received them without objection. The fact that, after the lapse of the contract, defendant purchased from Knowlton a part of the lands covered by it is of no significance. Having failed to gain substitution to the rights of the plaintiff under the assignment, and after the contract of plaintiff with Knowlton had lapsed, defendant was at liberty to negotiate a purchase of the lands described in the contract, or any portion of them. We are of the opinion that the court's action in sustaining the motion for nonsuit is justified upon the first ground. Such being the case, it is not necessary to discuss the questions raised by the other grounds.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WILLIAM H. RICHARDS et al., Appts.

(— Neb. —, 116 N. W. 677.)

Party wall — easement — termination of rights.

1. Where a wall is entirely upon the property of one party, the right of an adjoining owner to have support therefrom, whether derived from contract or acquired by prescription, is in the nature of an ease-

Headnotes by CALKINS, C.

Case Note. — Effect of destruction of building to terminate adjoining owner's easement of support.

Where a wall is erected half upon each side of the line dividing two properties, and used as a party wall, there exists in such wall, in favor of the respective owners, an easement of support in the half of the wall on the other's land. This easement continues so long as the buildings stand, but ceases at the moment of their accidental destruction because of the termination of the necessity which gave rise to the easement.

In Sherred v. Cisco, 4 Sandf. 480, two buildings on adjoining lots, supported by a common wall erected half on each lot, were entirely destroyed by fire, together with the party wall. One of the owners, upon building a new wall upon the old foundation, sought contribution to its cost from the ad-ment, which is terminated upon the destruction of the building by fire.

Same — rights of purchaser — constructive notice.

2. The fact that the owner of a building used a will upon the land of an adjoining proprietor for the support of his building before the same was destroyed by fire is not such notice as charges a purchaser of the property upon which the wall is situated with knowledge of a stipulation in an unrecorded written contract that the owner of such building might renew the use of such wall in case it should be destroyed and rebuilt.

Appeal — sufficiency of facts.

3. Where the judgment of the district court is proper upon the undisputed facts shown by the record, it will be affirmed without considering whether the reasons given by the trial judge for his conclusion were competent and adequate to support the same.

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Gage County in plaintiff's favor in an action to restrain the defendants from interfering with or using the wall of a building as a party wall. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. L. M. Pemberton, W. H. Richards, and F. N. Prout for appellants.

Messrs. Sackett & Brewster for appellee.

joining owner on the theory that the new wall was likewise a party wall, but the court took the view that the casual destruction of the original party wall terminated all rights which the parties had therein.

The Cisco Case has been cited with approval in the following cases: Duncan v. Rodecker, 90 Wis. 1, 62 N. W. 533; Bonney v. Greenwood, 96 Me. 335, 52 Atl. 786; Moore v. Shoemaker, 10 App. D. C. 6; Huck v. Flentye, 80 Ill. 258.

Again, it was held in New York that the accidental destruction by fire of a party wall, as to the maintenance of which there had been no grant of a perpetual right, destroyed all right in either party to claim an easement in the property of the other for the further support of a party wall; and this notwithstanding a portion of the foundation of the old wall remained standing. Heartt v. Kruger, 121 N. Y. 386, 9 L.R.A. 135, 18 Am. St. Rep. 829, 24 N. E. 841.

In Antomarchi v. Russell, 63 Ala. 356, 35 Am. Rep. 40, contribution to the cost of reconstructing what had been a party wall was demanded from the adjoining owner, upon whose property half of the new wall was constructed as before, and recovery was denied on the authority of the holding in Sherred v. Cisco, supra, to the effect that the destruction of a party wall terminates

Calkins, C., filed the following opinion:

In 1894 one Fouke was the owner of lot No. 2 in the town of Liberty, upon which there was a one-story brick building. The south wall of this building practically coincided with the south line of the lot. Fouke, on October 17, 1894, made a contract with one Gifford that the latter might join this wall with a good and substantial brick or stone building on the south side of the building owned by Fouke. It was stipulated in this agreement that the floor joists should not be attached to the wall on lot 2, but that it might be used to support the roof or ceiling joists. This contract contained the following clause: "It is fully understood that, so long as the present wall stands, it may be used by said Gifford as a party wall, and, in the event of the falling or breaking down of the said wall at any time, and in the event that a wall should be rebuilt where the present wall stands, then said Gifford shall have the right to join said wall; and it shall become a party wall as is the one for which this contract is made." It appears that Gifford was the owner of lot numbered 3, which adjoined lot numbered 2 on the south; but neither the ownership of this lot by Gifford nor its location was in any manner referred to in the written contract. Soon after the making of this contract Gifford erected a building, using the south wall as stipulated. The contract was never recorded. Both buildings were destroyed by fire in March, 1906, leaving whatever easement the adjoining owners had therein.

In Hoffman v. Kuhn, 57 Miss. 746, 34 Am. Rep. 491, fire destroyed adjoining buildings, but left standing the party wall, which had been erected partly upon the land of each owner. After citing the Cisco Case, supra, and Partridge v. Gilbert, infra, on the effect of the destruction of the wall itself, the court says: "It must be equally so where the wall alone remains. A wall is but a portion of a house, and the one is valueless without the other. To hold that, so long as the wall stands, the owner whose house has been destroyed is compelled to lose the use of his lot or to replace the destroyed building with another of exactly the same pattern is to sacrifice the greater to the less, and to impose in perpetuity a servitude which was assumed only for a specific purpose."

In Bowhay v. Richards it will be noted that the wall was wholly upon the land of the owner of the servient estate, and that, while both buildings were destroyed, the theory of the decision is that the easement terminated because of the destruction of the building in favor of which the right existed, viz., the dominant estate. However, in a New York case decided some years before the Cisco Case, it was held that the destruction of the servient estate leaving the com-standing, however, a portion of the wall in question. On the 2d day of May, 1906, the plaintiff purchased lot 2, and afterwards erected a building thereon, in the construction of which he rebuilt and used the wall in question. After the completion of said wall and building on lot 2 by plaintiff the defendant, who had purchased lot 3, began the construction of a building thereon, and sought to use the south wall for the support of the ceiling and roof joists of such building. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, alleging sole ownership of lot 2, and asking that defendant be restrained from interfering with or using the south wall of the building. To this petition the defendant answered, alleging ownership of lot 3, adverse possession of the wall, the making of the written contract, the assignment of the same to the defendant, and that the plaintiff bought said lot 2 with full knowledge of the existence of said written contract. There was a reply denying these allegations of the answer, and alleging the destruction of the building by fire and the consequent termination of any easement in the wall by the defendants or their grantors. Upon these issues, there was a trial to the court, who found, first, the execution of the contract; second, the construction by the defendants' grantors of a building on lot 3, and the joining the same to the wall in question in pursuance of the contract referred to; third, the destruction of the buildings by fire; fourth, that after the fire the plaintiff purchased lot 2, and the defendant entered into a contract for the purchase of lot 3; fifth, that the contract was not filed for record nor recorded, but that plaintiff knew of the possession of the party wall and its use by the grantors of the defendants Richards, and had such notice of the rights of the defendants as to put him upon inquiry which would have disclosed full knowledge of all the terms and conditions of the contract and the rights of the parties thereunder; sixth, that the wall used by the two buildings was damaged by fire to such an extent that it could not be used again without repairs, and that the plaintiff made all such necessary repairs at his own expense, and at a cost of $200; seventh, that the defendant claimed the right to join on said wall without paying any part of such repairs, and refused to pay or in any way be bound to contribute to such repairs made necessary by the fire of March, 1906. Upon these findings, the court concluded as a matter of law that the defendant had no right to join his building to the wall of the plaintiff until he had first paid his proportionate share of the repairs to the wall made necessary by the fire, and rendered a judgment making the temporary injunction which had been granted at the commencement of the suit perpetual. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

1. The defendant finds no fault with the first five findings of the district court, but very strongly insists that findings 6 and 7 mon wall standing and supporting the adjoining building did not put an end to the easement existing in favor of the remaining structure, although the wall was wholly upon the land of the owner of the servient estate. Brondage v. Warner, 2 Hill, 145.

In Partridge v. Gilbert, 15 N. Y. 601, 69 Am. Dec. 632, the doctrine of Sherred v. Cisco, supra, is cited with approval by Judge Denio, and, although a dictum, the following from his opinion is worthy of note in this discussion: "My view of the rights of these parties is this: Each had a title to the soil to the division line which was the center of the arch and wall; but this title was qualified by the easement which each owner had of supporting his building by means of the common wall. As the half of the wall, standing on the land of the owner, would not alone afford the requisite support, because the whole of the arch and the entire thickness of the wall was required for that purpose, the law gave him an interest, in the nature of an easement, in the part of the wall standing on the land of the other party. This right existed as long as the wall continued to be sufficient for that purpose and the respective buildings remained in a condition to need and to enjoy that support. . . . I do not perceive any solid distinction between 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) a total destruction of the wall and buildings and a state of things which should require the whole to be rebuilt from the foundation. In either case there is great force in saying that the mutual easements have become inapplicable, and that each proprietor may build as he pleases upon his own land without any obligation to accommodate the other."

Odd Fellows' Asso. v. Hegele, 24 Or. 16, 32 Pac. 679, was an action for the rescission and cancelation of a party-wall agreement which contained a clause granting to each party an easement of support in the common wall "so long as it shall stand." The following from the opinion of the court, although purely in the nature of dictum bears directly upon the subject of this note: "The purpose of the wall is to support the timbers of the contiguous buildings. The easements are mutual and relate to the wall only, and necessarily continue no longer than the wall remains safe and fit for the purpose it was intended to serve. As long as the wall remains fit and suitable for use, the easements of support exist; when the wall becomes unfit either from age or accident, the easement in it ceases" (citing with approval and quoting from the opinion of Judge Sandford in Sherred v. Cisco).

are neither supported by the evidence nor within the issues joined; while the plaintiff contends that the fifth finding of the court, that the plaintiff had such knowledge of the rights of the defendant in the premises as to put him upon inquiry which would have disclosed the terms and conditions of the written contract, is erroneous; and that the easement, if any, which the owners of lot 3 had in the south wall of lot 2, was terminated by the destruction of the buildings by fire. Where a party wall is situated on both sides of the division line, each party has title to the soil to the line; but his title is qualified by the easement which the other owner has of supporting his building by the common wall. Where, as in this case, the wall is entirely upon the property of one party, the right of the other to have support therefrom is in the nature of an easement only; and the general doctrine is that such easement ceases upon the destruction of the building by fire. Sherred v. Cisco, 4 Sandf. 480; Partridge v. Gilbert, 15 N. Y. 601, 69 Am. Dec. 632; Heartt v. Kruger, 121 N. Y. 391, 9 L.R.A. 135, 18 Am. St. Rep. 829, 24 N. E. 841; Hoffman v. Kuhn, 57 Miss. 746, 34 Am. Rep. 491; Bonney v. Greenwood, 96 Me. 335, 52 Atl. 786. This doctrine appears to have been first enunciated in Sherred v. Cisco, supra, and was quoted approvingly by Judge Denio in Partridge v. Gilbert, supra, and it has again been enunciated by the same court in Heartt v. Kruger, supra. It was said by Judge Denio in the opinion above referred to that, "in the changing condition of our cities and villages, it must often happen, as it did actually happen in this case, that edifices of different dimensions and an entirely different character would be required. And it might happen, too, that the views of one of the proprietors as to the value and extent of the new buildings would essentially differ from those of the other, and the division wall which would suit one of them would be inapplicable to the objects of the other." The reasons thus given are particularly applicable to conditions in our own state, and we believe the rule adopted in these cases is sound, and should be followed.

2. In this case the written contract provides: "And in the event of the falling or breaking down of said wall at any time, and in the event that a wall should be rebuilt where the present wall stands, then the said Gifford shall have the right to join said wall, and it shall become a party wall as is the one for which this contract is made." This presents the question whether the plaintiff, in purchasing said property, was chargeable with notice of the terms and conditions of this contract. There is no dispute as to the facts. There is no evidence to overcome the assertion of the plaintiff that he had no knowledge of the existence of any written contract. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the plaintiff knew of the use made by defendants' grantors, before the fire, of the wall in question. We think it may be conceded that notice to the plaintiff that the defendants' grantors used a portion of such wall for the support of their building charged the plaintiff with knowledge of the existence of an easement in the wall to that extent; but we doubt the soundness and justice of the doctrine that he was thereby put upon inquiry. It is the policy of the law to require parties claiming interests in real estate by virtue of written instruments to record the same, and thereby give notice of the extent and character of their claim. The place to inquire concerning titles or interest in the title of real estate is the office of the register of deeds for the county in which the same is situated. If it is demanded of a party purchasing real estate to make inquiry elsewhere, it should be clearly pointed out from whom and where he should seek such information. If it be said that in this case the plaintiff should have inquired of the owner of the adjoining property, the records disclose such owner to be a nonresident of the state, and therefore not easy of access. But, waiving that objection, the rule that requires the intending purchaser to make inquiry must assume that the person inquired of would not only be able to, but would be disposed to, give accurate and reliable information concerning the contents of the instrument in question. A person claiming an interest in realty by virtue of a written instrument can give notice to all the world of the extent of his claim by the registry of such instrument. Intending purchasers are entitled to notice given in this manner, and should not be bound to inquire for nor accept the statements of a person who refuses or neglects to record the written instrument under which he claims. When the plaintiff purchased this property, neither the defendant nor his grantor was making any actual use of the easement which they claimed in said wall. The only easement of the use of which the plaintiff had any notice was such as would, as we have seen, be terminated by the destruction of the buildings by fire; and it had not been exercised since the occurrence of the fire. It is plain that the actual use of an easement which is relied upon to take the place of the registration of the contract under which it is claimed must be an existing and continuous use. In any view of the case, we do not think the plaintiff was chargeable with notice of that clause in the contract which it is contended takes it out of the usual rule that an easement ends with the destruction of the property by fire.

3. The judgment of the district court being a proper one upon the grounds we have hereinbefore stated, it becomes unnecessary to inquire whether the last two findings of the court were sustained by the evidence, or were within the issues made by the pleadings.

The proper result was reached, and we recommend that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Fawcett and Root, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

ALFRED NEILSON et al., Exrs., etc., of Philo Laos Mills, Deceased, Pliffs. in Err.,

v.

GEORGE E. RUSSELL, Surrogate of Essex County, et al.

(— N. J. —, 71 Atl. 286.)

Inheritance tax — property subject.

Stock in a New Jersey corporation belonging to a testator domiciled in England is not subject to the inheritance tax imposed by the act of May 15, 1894 (P. L. p. 318), 3 Gen. Stat. 1895, p. 3339.

Headnote by SWAYZE, J.

Case Note. — Liability to pay transfer tax in respect of stock in a domestic corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident.

This note is confined to the single question whether the estate of a nonresident, or its beneficiaries, may, under any circumstances, be required to pay a transfer or succession tax in respect of stock in a domestic corporation, and is not concerned with questions which are common alike to corporate stock and other assets, assuming that the stock may be reached at all. The question whether corporate stock belonging to a nonresident may be subjected to a property tax in the state in which the corporation is chartered is also, of course, beyond the scope of this note.

Very little authority can be found in support of the decision in the foregoing case upon the specific question as to the liability 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to pay the transfer tax in respect of shares of stock in a domestic corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident, though that result would, of course, follow from the general doctrine adopted in some jurisdictions that such a tax is laid exclusively in accordance with the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam, and is therefore restricted, so far as concerns personal property, to property belonging to the estate of a person domiciled within the jurisdiction imposing the tax. Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In a case like this the temptation is strong to pass an opinion upon the fundamental and important questions which were exhaustively discussed at the bar. and in the able opinion of the supreme court. We prefer, however, to confine our discussion to the exact point presented by the case. which we think is the much narrower one of the proper interpretation of the statute. For that purpose, we assume that shares of stock in a New Jersey corporation have a situs in this state, and that succession thereto or transfer thereof may be taxed by our ing to the estate of a nonresident decedent, consisting of state loans of Pennsylvania, municipal bonds of that state, bonds and stocks of its corporations, shares of stock in national banks located in that state, and various claims against Pennsylvania debtors, were not subject to the collateral inheritance tax under the Pennsylvania act of 1826 imposing such tax "upon all estates . . . passing from any person who may die seised or possessed of such estate, being within this commonwealth either by will or under the intestate laws thereof, . . ." and the declaratory act of 1850 enacting that the words in the act of 1826, "being within this commonwealth," should be construed as relating to persons as well as to estates. It should be observed that the court made no distinction between corporate stocks and corporate bonds or other indebtedness. Assuming, as the court did, that it was the intention to lay the tax in accordance with the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam, the distinction was doubtless immaterial, but it is important when the statute imposing the tax by its terms or by judicial construction reaches all property within the jurisdiction without reference to the domicile of the decedent, since shares of stock in a domestic corporation, belonging to a nonresident, may be deemed to be property within the state (indeed, may be so regarded even for purposes of a property tax), whereas a mere indebtedness of a domestic corporation, whether evidenced by bonds or otherwise, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, is not generally, in the absence of special circumstances, regarded as property within the state,—at least for the purposes of a property tax. See case note to Monongahela River Consol. Coal & Coke Co. v. Board of Assessors, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 637.)

The court, in Re Enston (People v. Sherwood) 113 N. Y. 174, 3 L.R.A. 464, 21 N. E. 87, held that, irrespective of the situs or location of the property, no tax was imposed on property passing by will or intestacy from a nonresident of the state by the collateral inheritance tax statute of 1885 which purported to subject to the tax "all property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of the state from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while being a resident of the state, or which property shall be within this state, or any part of such property, or any interest therein or income therefrom transferred by deed, grant, sale, or gift made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor. . . ." The decision was upon the ground that the words "or which property shall be within this state" related exclusively to property transferred within the state inter vivos, and had no reference to property passing by will or intestacy.

This case in effect overruled the decision in Leavitt's Estate, 22 N. Y. S. R. 81, 4 N. Y. Supp. 179, that the act of 1885 reached stock under such circumstances.

The New York statute, however, was subsequently amended so as to impose the tax "when the transfer is by will or intestate laws of this state from a resident decedent, or when the transfer is by will or intestate law of property within the state and the decedent was a nonresident at the time of his death." Under this statute, it was held in Re Bronson, 150 N. Y. 1, 34 L.R.A. 238, 55 Am. St. Rep. 632, 44 N. E. 707, that shares of stock of a domestic corporation, although the certificates are in another state in possession of a nonresident owner, constitute "property within the state" within the meaning of the statute, and are therefore subject to the tax.

It is to be noted that the dissent by Vann and O'Brien, JJ., in this case was not from the proposition that the stock was subject to a tax, but that the bonds of a domestic corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident were not subject thereto.

In Re Whiting, 150 N. Y. 27, 34 L.R.A. 232, 55 Am. St. Rep. 640, 44 N. E. 715, which also held that shares of stock in a domestic corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent were subject to the tax, it appeared that the certificates of stock were deposited in a safe-deposit vault within the state; but it is apparent from the Bronson Case that the stock is sub-legislature, and that the tax imposed by the act of May 15, 1894 (P. L. p. 318) is either a legacy or a succession tax, and not a property tax, and therefore not in conflict with our constitutional provision. The question we have to decide is, then, simply whether the statute reaches the present case.

An examination of the act shows that it imposes a tax (1) upon all property which passes by will or the intestate laws of this state from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while being a resident of the state; (2) upon all property which shall be within this state which shall be transferred by inheritance, distribution, bequest, devise, deed, grant, sale, or gift made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the intestate, testator, grantor, or bargainor. The first class obviously affects the succession of residents of this state only. If the present tax is to be sustained, it must be because the succession sought to be taxed comes within the second class.

Our act was modeled after the New York act of 1885 (Laws 1885, chap. 483, § 1, p. 820); and, if we had made no change in that act, we should be held upon well-settled principles to have adopted with the act the construction previously placed thereon by the New York courts in the case of Re Enston (People v. Sherwood) 113 N. Y. 174, 3 L.R.A. 464, 21 N. E. 87. In fact, however, we modified the language of the New York act by inserting at the beginning of the clause the words "all property" in place of ject to the tax irrespective of the place the certificates are found.

The doctrine of the Bronson Case is recognized in Re Fitch, 160 N. Y. 87, 54 N. E. 701, which also holds that such shares belonging to the estate of a nonresident are property within the county where the property of the corporation is, so as to confer jurisdiction upon the surrogate of that county to impose the tax.

The doctrine is also followed in Re Palmer, 183 N. Y. 238, 76 N. E. 16, specifically holding that the assessment is properly computed on the value of the nonresident's interest in the whole of the corporate property as evidenced by the number of shares held by him, and not upon the proportion of its value which represents the proportion of the capital and assets employed in New York.

The doctrine was also recognized in Re Cooley, 186 N. Y. 220, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1010, 78 N. E. 939, in determining the basis of apportioning the tax on the stock of a nonresident decedent in a railroad company chartered both in New York and Massachusetts.

In Re Pullman, 46 App. Div. 574, 62 N. Y. Supp. 395, where the doctrine of the Bronson Case is also recognized and applied, it appeared that the stocks in question were actually in New York at the time of the decedent's death, but their liability to pay the tax was not based on that ground. It was further held in this case that the indebtedness of the decedent to residents of New York for which stocks and bonds of a foreign corporation, of a market value exceeding the indebtedness, were pledged, should not be deducted in assessing stock in domestic corporations for the purposes of a tax, except to the extent that such stock in domestic corporations was specifically pledged to secure New York creditors.

In Re Newcomb, 172 N. Y. 608, 64 N. E. 1123, the equitable interest of a nonresident decedent in shares of stock in a New York corporation was held subject to the transfer tax, although the certificates were not within the state and the stock stood on the books of the corporation in the name of the brokers who purchased the same for the decedent, they having indorsed the transfer on the back and sent the certificates to her.

In Re Bushnell, 172 N. Y. 649, 65 N. E. 1115, where the doctrine was applied, the specific question was as to the liability of one to whom the stock was devised subject to a bequest to another for life with power to reinvest, a point not within the scope of this note.

So, shares of stock of a nonresident in a national bank located in New York are subject to the transfer tax although the certificates are not in the state. Re Cushing, 40 Misc. 505, 82 N. Y. Supp. 795.

So, stock in a domestic corporation and in a national bank located within Massachusetts, belonging to the estate of a nonresident, is subject to a succession tax under the Massachusetts statute, which imposes that tax on all property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth and any interest therein, whether belonging to inhabitants of the commonwealth or not, and whether tangible or intangible; and it is immaterial whether the certificates are within the state or not. Greves v. Shaw, 173 Mass. 205, 53 N. E. 372.

And, upon the authority of the last case, it was held in Moody v. Shaw, 173 Mass. 375, 53 N. E. 892, that stock apparently owned by a nonresident decedent in a railroad company incorporated both in Massachusetts and New York was subject to a collateral-inheritance tax.

And to the same effect is Kingsbury v. Chapin, 196 Mass. 533, 82 N. E. 700, which adopts the rule of apportionment followed in Re Cooley, supra (see report of the latter case in 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1010).

The court, in Gardiner v. Carter, 74 N. H. 507, 69 Atl. 939, also recognizes the liability under the New Hampshire statute, which is practically identical with the Massachusetts statute, to pay the tax in respect of shares of stock owned by the estate of a nonresident in a domestic corporation or a corporation chartered both in New Hampshire and in another state, and having but a single issue of stock; and follows the basis of apportionment adopted in Re Cooley and Kingsbury v. Chapin, supra.

While, as above shown, the English legacy

the mere relative "which" and by adding the words "inheritance, distribution, bequest, devise." We are not therefore concluded by that decision.

It is clear that the legislature did not intend to tax all successions of nonresidents. If it had meant that, it would have taxed all property within this state which should be transferred from a decedent by will or intestacy. (We disregard as quite inapplicable to the present case transfers by deed, grant, sale, or gift intended to take effect after death.) Instead of using this general language, which was naturally suggested by the use of the words "by will or by the intestate laws of this state," employed in the previous clause, the act limits the taxation upon transfers of the property of nonresidents to transfers by inheritance, distribution, bequest, or devise. The words "inheritance" and "distribution" are apt and proper words to designate the succession of an heir or next of kin; the words "bequest" and "devise," that of a legatee or devisee. The only one applicable to the present case is "bequest." What is to be taxed, therefore, as far as the present case is concerned, is a transfer by bequest from Mills to his legatees, or, to use the language of Mr. Justice Holmes in Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 207, 47 L. ed. 439, 446, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, it is the singular succession of the legatee, not the universal succession of the executors. That this is the true construction of the act is indicated further by the provisions of § 6 (Gen. Stat. 1895, ¶ 268, p.

duty act does not extend to assets of a non-resident decedent, even though they are within the jurisdiction, the liability to pay the probate tax in respect of shares of stock in an English company belonging to a non-resident decedent was recognized in Atty. Gen. v. New York Breweries Co. [1899] A. C. 62, which also held that an English company which, upon the death of a testator domiciled in a foreign country and at the request of his executors, transferred to their names shares in the company, knowing that they had not obtained, and did not intend to obtain, probate in England, were liable as executors de son tort for the payment of such probate duties as would have been payable if probate had been obtained in England.

The liability to pay the tax in respect of shares in a domestic corporation belonging to the estate of a nonresident decedent is supported by an able opinion of the New Jersey supreme court, speaking through Garrison, J., in Neilson v. Russell, 69 Atl. 476, which was reversed by the court of errors and appeals in NEILSON v. RUSSELL.

The decision of the prerogative court in Re Delano (N. J.) 69 Atl. 482, to the same effect as the decision of the supreme court in the last case, is, of course, in effect overruled by the reversal of that decision. The 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

3341) authorizing the executors to deduct the tax from the legacy or property for distribution. The tax is not a general charge against the estate, but a charge upon the legacies. Wychoff v. O'Neil (N. J. Err. & App.) 67 Atl. 32. Section 10 authorizes a refund of taxes where the legatee has been obliged to refund part of this legacy to pay debts proven after distribution. Although there seems to be no provision in the statute authorizing the deduction of debts in making appraisement we can hardly doubt, in the face of § 10, that such a deduction ought to be made. It has never been thought that an insolvent estate was liable to this tax, although no machinery can be provided in this state by which the fact of solvency or insolvency can be ascertained. Such machinery is unnecessary if it is only the value of the legacy that is to be ascertained. These considerations persuade us that it is the legacy that is taxed, and not the estate. The question recurs whether the succession of the legatees in the present case was meant to be taxed.

This succession is a succession under English law by which the validity and amount of the bequest must be determined. Jenkins v. Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. 53 N. J. Eq. 194, 32 Atl. 208. By that law, as well as by her own, the title to a legacy is not complete and perfect until the executor has assented (2 Williams, Exrs. & Adms. 1372, 1373), and he ought not to assent until creditors are satisfied. This assent must of necessity be the assent of the executors doctrine of NEILSON v. RUSSELL is followed in Astor v. State (N. J.) 72 Atl. 78, where the testatrix was domiciled in a foreign country, her will having been admitted to probate in New York as that of a nonresident.

In some of the cases it is expressly stated that the liability to pay the tax in respect of stock in a domestic corporation is not dependent upon the granting of ancillary letters; and in none of the foregoing cases is the actual granting of such probate made a condition of the liability to pay the tax in respect of the stock.

Inasmuch as the state in which the decedent is domiciled has the power,—very commonly exercised,—applying the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam, to require the payment of the tax by the estate of a resident in respect of shares of stock in a foreign corporation, it follows that double taxation is inevitable if the state in which the corporation is organized asserts the right to require the payment of the tax in respect of the shares when owned by a nonresident. As shown in the case notes to Judy v. Beekwith, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 142, and Mann v. Carter, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 150, however, this species of double taxation, however objectionable from the point of logic or abstract justice, is not constitutionally objectionable.

at the domicile. They alone can ascertain whether the estate is solvent or insolvent, and it is only upon a settlement of their accounts that it can be determined whether the legatee will actually receive anything or not; and, if he is to receive only a portion of the legacy, the amount in which it shall abate can be decided by the courts of the domicile only. The succession to the legacy is complete only in a foreign jurisdiction, and it would certainly be anomalous to tax that succession here. The case differs from those arising under the New York act of 1892 (Laws 1892, chap. 399, p. 814), and statutes modeled thereon, which assume to tax the transfer of property within the jurisdiction. Under those statutes it is the situs of the property which justifies the taxation of the transfer. Our statute of 1894 does not undertake to tax all transfers of property within our jurisdiction, but only transfers by inheritance, distribution, bequest, or devise. In this respect our statute differs, also, from the Maryland act which was before the court in State v. Dallymple, 70 Md. 294, 3 L.R.A. 372, 17 Atl. 82, where the act as construed by the court imposed a tax upon all estates, real, personal, and mixed, money, and public and private securities for money of every kind, being in the state. The Massachusetts cases are not in point for a like reason. There the statute imposes a tax on "all property within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth and any interest therein, whether belonging to inhabitants of the commonwealth or not, and whether tangible or intangible." Greves v. Shaw, 173 Mass. 205, 53 N. E. 372. In short, our statute imposes a legacy duty, and not a transfer or succession tax. The view we take is the same that finally prevailed in the English courts. Thompson v. Advocate General, 12 Clark & F. 1.

We reach the same result if we disregard the technical force of the words "inheritance, distribution, bequest, and devise," and look at the tax as a succession tax. It is conceded, as it must be in view of our constitutional provision, that the tax cannot be sustained as a property tax. The ground upon which this extraordinary exaction and the exemption of small estates and the taxation by some states, and at one time by the Federal government of large estates, at a higher rate, is sustained, is, as stated in the opinion of the supreme court, that "the rights of testamentary disposition and of succession are creatures of law, upon the exercise and operation of which the law-maker may impose terms." We think it follows logically that the only law which can impose the terms is the law that creates the right. In this case it is the English law. The title to the stock passed by virtue of the will to the executors from the moment of the testator's death, and probate was operative only as the authenticated evidence, not as the foundation of the executors' title. 1 Williams, Exrs. & Adms. 293, 294, 629. The English executors were authorized without probate in this state to transfer the stock (Hutchins v. State Bank, 12 Met. 421; Luce v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 63 N. H. 588, 3 Atl. 618), and to vote at a corporate election. Re Cape May & D. B. Nav. Co. 51 N. J. L. 78, 16 Atl. 191, in which Justice Depue cited as authority the cases just referred to. However convenient it may have been to take out letters testamentary in New Jersey, such a course was not essential under our laws to vest the title in the executor. It was only of consequence as a matter of procedure, and to put the executors in a position to compel a transfer on the books of the corporation, if the corporation was unwilling to recognize the foreign letters. It is true that the New Jersey executors have a title and a right to administer (Banta v. Moore, 15 N. J. Eq. 97); but the difficulties already mentioned in dealing with the tax as a legacy duty are quite as forceful when it is looked on as a succession tax. There is the additional difficulty that the New Jersey administration is ancillary only, and the provisions of the statute authorizing the executor to collect the tax from the legatee or to deduct it from the legacy cannot be enforced. After administration here, the balance of the estate would properly be transferred to the English executors for distribution in accordance with the laws of the domicile of the testator. Our view in this respect is supported by the authorities. Wallace v. Atty. Gen. L. R. 1 Ch. 1, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 124; Re Embury, 19 App. Div. 214, 45 N. Y. Supp. 881, affirmed in 154 N. Y. 746, 49 N. E. 1096; Eidman v. Martinez, 184 U. S. 578, 46 L. ed. 697, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515.

The claim of the state is not helped by § 11 of the act. Gen. Stat. 1895, "273, p. 3342. That applies only to the case of stock which is liable to the tax, and is intended to afford a means of collection of a tax imposed by other sections not to impose a tax.

The judgment must be reversed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

I. N. EBBS, Appt.

(— N. C. —, 63 S. E. 190.)

Attorney — disbarment.

1. Conviction in another jurisdiction is not within the provision of a statute declaring that an attorney must be disbarred upon his conviction of a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and permitting his disbarment if he shall have been convicted in open court of some criminal offense showing himself unfit to be trusted.

Same — inherent power.

2. Courts have no inherent power to disbar an attorney for conviction of crime in a foreign jurisdiction where the legislature has expressly provided what convictions shall result in disbarment, which do not include those in foreign jurisdictions.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County disbarring him. Reversed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

Pursuant to the provisions of chapter 941,

Case Note. — Conviction or commission of crime or misconduct by attorney in another state as ground for disbarment.

Very few cases have been found on the question as to what effect on a disbarment proceeding for the commission of a crime, the fact has that the crime was committed, or for which he was convicted occurred, in another state; and none has been found where the question arose in a manner similar to that in STATE v. EBBS,—that is, whether or not a statute providing for the disbarment of an attorney upon his conviction of crimes punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary necessarily includes the conviction of those crimes in other states.

In Re Kirby, 10 S. D. 414, 39 L.R.A. 859, 73 N. W. 907, under a statute providing for disbarment of an attorney when he has been convicted of felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, the state court, without questioning the applicability of such statute, disbarred an attorney for having been convicted of such a crime in the United States district court situated in the same state.

In People ex rel. Hamlin v. Payson, 215 Ill. 476, 74 N. E. 383, an attorney was disbarred for various acts of unprofessional conduct. It also appeared that he had been convicted of crime in a foreign state prior to his admission to the bar in the local 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

p. 1342. Pub. Laws 1907, the committee on grievances of the North Carolina bar association, filed with the solicitor of the fifteenth judicial district an accusation stating that, upon investigation of certain charges preferred before them against I. N. Ebbs, a licensed attorney and member of the bar of the state, residing in said district, the said committee were of the opinion that said charges should be further investigated by the court, as provided by the statute. A copy of the charges and the records upon which they were founded accompanied the report. The solicitor thereupon caused the report and the records, together with an accusation preferred by himself, embodied in the report, to be served on said attorney. Hon. R. B. Peebles, judge presiding, thereupon made an order reciting the proceedings had before the committee, directing the said I. N. Ebbs to appear before him at Asheville, North Carolina, on a day named, and answer said charges. On the return day the said I. N. Ebbs duly appeared, being represented by counsel. The committee was represented by the solicitor of the district and other counsel. The accusation was founded upon certified records from the circuit court of the United States, eastern district of Louisiana, showing a bill of indictment returned by the grand jury, charging respondent with forgery in six counts. The specific acts charged con-state, in regard to which the court said: "We have been unwilling to hold, as a matter of law, that the mere fact of the conviction of crime in a foreign state, followed by a pardon and a long lapse of years, was sufficient, of itself and as a matter of law, upon which to predicate an order of disbarment. We have preferred to adopt the more modern view of locus penitentiæ. This latter view we regard as more in accord with the spirit of our institutions, as is evidenced by the various reform schools and the parole system established and obtaining in this state, on the theory that criminals may be reformed; and while, as we have said, we will not make the rule absolute upon the mere record of a conviction long anterior to the filing of the information, we do not, in the consideration of the case, ignore such conviction, but, keeping it before us, look into the life and conduct of the accused from that time on; and, if we find that there has been a reformation, and that the individual has become an honored and useful member of society, and has shown a proper regard for the duties and responsibilities of his profession, we will discharge the rule. If, on the other hand, as we are constrained to say is the case before us, it appears that the respondent is not benefited by the misfortune that his wrongful conduct brought upon him, but has persisted in his evil doing, we take into consideration the former conviction and all subsequent conduct, and attach to sisted in unlawfully, falsely, and feloniously forging and altering certain receipts, accounts, etc., with intent to defraud the United States. Upon a trial before said court, respondent was convicted upon all of the counts except the first, and sentenced to imprisonment in the parish prison of the parish of New Orleans for the term of ninety days, and to pay a fine of $1,000. Respondent demurred to the evidence as follows: "The respondent, I. N. Ebbs, with leave of court, objects to the sufficiency of the accusation preferred by the solicitor for the state as amended in the above-entitled proceeding, and says: (1) The said accusation contained no cause for the disbarment of respondent except on allegation of a conviction of the defendant of a crime alleged to be punishable in the penitentiary before and by the United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana. (2) That said accusation does not charge this respondent with having been convicted of any crime since the passage of chapter 941, p. 1342, N. C. Pub. Laws, passed in the year 1907. (3) That the only conviction alleged in said accusation is a conviction for an offense not punishable in the penitentiary by the laws of North Carolina, even if the offense had been committed within the state of North Carolina." His Honor overruled the demurrer, and rendered the following judgment: "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said I. N. Ebbs be, and he is hereby, disbarred as an attorney at law from the practice as an attorney and counselor in the courts of this state, and that the name of the said I. N. Ebbs be stricken from the roll of the practising attorneys of the courts of this state, and that he henceforth be denied any and all the rights or privileges of an attorney and counselor in the courts of the state of North Carolina. The clerk of this court is hereby ordered to send a certified copy of this judgment to the clerk of the superior court of Madison county, North Carolina, and the clerk of Madison county will enter the same in the judgment docket of his court." Respondent excepted and appealed.

Messrs Adams & Adams and J. M. Gudger, Sr., for appellant:

The presumption is that the conviction referred to by the statute is a conviction by the courts of this state of an offense which is a crime under the laws of this state, and punishable herein.

them the consequences that the law imposes."

In Re Baum, 10 Mont. 223, 25 Pac. 99, it was held that a decision of disbarment by a divided court in a foreign state, no order of disbarment being made, pending on appeal to a higher court, is insufficient as a ground for revocation of an attorney's license in the local state; the court saying that this did not lay down the rule that unprofessional conduct of lawyers of this court, committed without the limits of the state, might not be inquired into, but only that the circumstances of the case did not seem to warrant such inquiry.

And see Ex parte Quarrier, 2 W. Va. 569, sufficiently set out in STATE v. EBBS. It would seem, however, that there could be very little question about the right to disbar an attorney for the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, although the crime was committed in another state.

In Smith v. State, 1 Yerg. 228, it was held to be a good ground for disbarment that an attorney fought a duel in another state, killing his antagonist, and was there indicted for murder.

In Re Dornemon, 2 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 344, an attorney's name was stricken from the rolls for aiding and assisting the negroes of St. Domingo in outrages committed against the whites.

was held that a license to practise law will be revoked which is secured by a fraudulent concealment of the fact that the plaintiff has recently been convicted of embezzling funds from a client in another state,—especially if, since its issuance, the plaintiff has been guilty of professional misconduct evincing such lack of personal integrity and professional honor as to establish that he is unworthy to be allowed to hold it.

In People ex rel. Deneen v. Coleman, 210 Ill. 79, 71 N. E. 693, it also appeared that an attorney, previous to his application for admission to the bar, had been convicted in the courts of another state of a felonious offense involving moral turpitude, and that he had served a portion of a term of imprisonment in the penitentiary of that state, upon the expiration of which he had been pardoned. It was held, however, in an effort to have him disbarred, that, since he had lived an upright life for several years after his conviction, a motion therefor would be denied.

There are other cases in which the reason assigned for the disbarment was not so much the misconduct of the attorney, as the fact that he committed a fraud upon the court in concealing it, when asking for admission in another state; but, aside from those immediately preceding, they have been expressly excluded from this note.

not within the "full faith and credit clause" of the Constitution of the United States, and has no effect beyond the limits of the jurisdiction in which it was rendered.

Mr. Hayden Clement for the State.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Because of the novelty of the question raised by the demurrer of the respondent and the importance to the public welfare of the correct interpretation of the statute under which this proceeding was instituted, we have given the record a careful and anxious consideration. Stat. 1907 (Pub. Laws, p. 1342) chap. 941, was enacted at the instance of the state bar association for the purpose of enabling it to more effectually discharge its duty to the people of the state, the courts, and the bar by excluding from the profession unworthy members. This is the first instance in which the courts have been called upon to interpret and enforce its provisions. Section 1 provides: "That an attorney at law must be disbarred and removed for the following causes: (a) Upon his being convicted of a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. (b) When any judgment is rendered against him for money collected by him as an attorney and retained by him without any bona fide claim thereto or any part thereof." Section 2 provides that an attorney at law may be disbarred, etc., naming two causes. The motion to disbar the respondent is based upon the first section. It will be observed that among the several causes for which an attorney must or may be disbarred this is the only one in which the court is required to act upon a record, and the respondent is not permitted to offer anything by way of defense or exculpation. The court cannot inquire into his guilt. The production of the record, showing a conviction, makes it the imperative duty of the court to disbar him. Without expressing any opinion as to the wisdom of so drastic a statute, we are not permitted to enlarge its terms by construction. The respondent says that, by a recognized canon of construction, the penalty must be confined to a conviction had in the court of this state. The case was thoroughly argued before us, and the industry of counsel has afforded us much aid. Counsel for respondent rely upon the rule laid down by Mr.

Justice Gray in Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263, 307, 36 L. ed. 429, 443, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617. In that case the plaintiffs in error were indicted in the circuit court of the United States for murder and conspiracy under the provisions of an act of Congress. The indictment was found and the case tried in the state of Texas. The government introduced one Martin as a witness. It appeared that he had been convicted in the courts of North Carolina of a felony, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail. The Texas statute rendered a person convicted of a felony incompetent to testify in the courts of that state. In discussing the exception to the ruling of the court admitting the witness, it was said: "At common law and on general principles of jurisprudence, when not controlled by express statute, giving effect within the state which enacts it to a conviction and sentence in another state, such conviction and sentence can have no effect by way of penalty or of personal disability or disqualification beyond the limits of the state in which the judgment is rendered."

The question, as applied to the disability of a person offered as a witness to testify, arose in this state in State v. Candler, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 393, when it was held by a divided court that a witness convicted of an infamous crime in Tennessee was incompetent to testify in this state. The chief justice concedes that such was not the law in England, but was of the opinion that, by virtue of the "full faith and credit" clause of the Federal Constitution, the law in this country was otherwise. The court was not construing a statute in that case, but discussing a general principle of law. The question has been decided otherwise in many other states, and the decided weight of authority is against the decision in Candler's Case. Parker, Ch. J., in Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 515, writes a very able opinion, holding that "the conviction of an infamous crime in a foreign country, or in any other of the United States, does not render the subject of such conviction an incompetent witness in the courts of this state." He says: "To hold a person incompetent on account of such conviction, and to enforce the punishment and thus the penal laws of our state, would reach into others," violating well-settled principles. In Sims v. Sims, 75 N. Y. 466, it appears that, by a statute of that state, it is provided that "no person sentenced upon a conviction for felony shall be competent to testify . . . unless pardoned," etc. Rapallo, J., said: "I think it quite clear that the disqualification created by this statute is consequent only upon a conviction in this state." The conviction relied upon to exclude the witness was had in Ohio. Quoting Greenleaf on Evidence, who says that the weight of modern opinion seems to be that personal disqualifications arising, not from the laws of nature, but from positive law, especially such as are of a penal nature, are strictly territorial, and cannot be enforced in any country other than that in which they originated, he says: "I think this doctrine applicable to the question now in hand, and that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which prevents such application, or requires that the personal disabilities, such as incompetency to testify or to vote, which may be imposed upon a person convicted of crime in one state, should follow him and be enforced in all the others. If such were the operation of the constitutional provision, the qualifications of witnesses called in our courts and of voters at our elections might be made to depend upon the laws of other states instead of our own." The learned justice notices the decision in Candler's Case, and meets the argument upon which it is founded. It is insisted by the attorney general, and we think correctly, that this is not a criminal action. It is rather in the nature of a civil proceeding, and probably should be prosecuted in the name of the bar association. This, we notice, is done in several of the states, as in Maine,—Sanborn v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140. Treating it as a civil proceeding, it is clear that the record of a conviction in a criminal action in another jurisdiction would not be conclusive of guilt. Judge Rapallo says: "A record of conviction for a crime is not conclusive evidence in a civil action of the facts upon which it was based. There is a great weight of authority against its being admissible at all, except as evidence of the fact of conviction, where that fact is material." Greenl. Ev. § 537; Wharton, Conf. L. § 108; Garitee v. Bond, 102 Md. 379, 111 Am. St. Rep. 385, 62 Atl. 631, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 915. The point was presented and decided in an interesting case in 2 W. Va. 569, Ex parte Quarrier. The applicant for admission to the bar was duly licensed as an attorney in another state, and, complying with the statute in the newly made state of West Virginia, he was met with the objection that he was guilty of treason, having, in his native state, voted for the ordinance of secession and voluntarily entering the army of the Confederate states. He had received a pardon from the President. The court held that he was entitled to be admitted, saying: "Indeed, it must not be forgotten that in this case no treason against the state of West Virginia, whose courts are invoked to consider the subject, has been either proved or confessed, and the only acts stated that could amount to the crime of treason were perpetrated against the United States and for which the party has been pardoned by that government. Now, it would be straining the point too far to hold, as contended for, that the war being waged against the United States, of which the state of West Virginia was one, was therefore waged against her in the sense contemplated in the statute against treason, and that, therefore, the acts in question were treason against the state and felony within statute . . . for, while it is not intended to deny that the same act might constitute treason against the United States and also against the state, . . . it is not enough to wage war against the United States generally or collectively, or as component parts of the national Union, but it must be done directly against the state in particular. . . . An appeal has been made to the court to exclude attorneys, circumstanced as the applicant is, upon the ground of public policy, and the danger of baleful influence in a political light. But these are considerations better addressed to the legislature than the courts. Whatever may be the true policy of the lawmaking power to pursue is a question for that power to determine. The duty and true policy of the courts to pursue is to expound the law as it is, and, if it is not what it ought to be, to leave it to the legislature to change it."

In Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 291, 32 L. ed. 239, 243, 8 Sup. Rep. 1370, 1374, it is said: "The proper place for punishment is where the crime is committed, and no society takes concern in any crime but what is hurtful to itself." Kames, Eq. 3d ed. 326. When we consider the question upon the "reason of the thing" and sound state policy, the wisdom of the law, as we find it laid down with practical uniformity, is manifest. It is the natural interpretation of all statutes creating offenses and defining conduct, the doing of which is made indictable or subject to penalties, to refer them solely to the commission of such acts within this state. In respect to punishment of crimes and imposition of penalties, the states act within their own territorial limits, and the Federal government within its own sphere. No state can administer the Federal statutes, maintain prosecutions for their violations, or impose punishments or penalties. Parker, Ch. J., in Green's Case, supra, wisely says: "Whether the facts which would be here deemed an infamous crime are the same which constitute the like offense in the country from which the record comes, the court would have no means of knowing with certainty. The crime of treason is known to be different in different countries. What is felony also in one country may not be felony in another, and it is competent for the legislature of every nation to attach disabilities to the commission of offenses which by the laws of other nations may be wholly without such consequences." We know that the Federal government punishes practically all offenses with imprisonment in the penitentiary. Violations of the revenue laws, often technical and involving no moral turpitude whatever, may be so punished. Again, acts which in our state are deemed misdemeanors, punishable by fine or a short term in the county jail or house of correction, are deemed of grave character and punished by imprisonment in the state's prison in other states. Each state makes its Penal Codes, and the Federal government does the same. If any other interpretation were put upon our statute, it would logically follow that, for violation of the Federal statutes or statutes of other states, citizens of this state would forfeit their right to vote under our Constitution. Certainly the people of North Carolina never contemplated that any such construction would be put upon their laws. Care must be had to keep clearly in mind the fact that the court, in enforcing the statute, does not and cannot inquire whether, in truth, the respondent has committed the crime charged. It is restricted to the inquiry whether he has been "convicted," and for this purpose the record of conviction, by a court having jurisdiction to hear and determine the charge, is conclusive, and the court must disbar him. No provision is made for pardon or for repentance followed by a life of probity. We are of the opinion that, upon well-settled principles and sound reason, the statute is confined to a conviction in this state. It is insisted that, however this may be in regard to the act of 1907, the respondent may be disbarred by the court under the power conferred in § 211, Revisal 1905. It is suggested that this statute is by implication repealed by the act of 1907. We incline to the opinion that the last statute is not in conflict with §§ 211 and 212 of the Revisal of 1905. It is not necessary that we should decide the question because, while the language clearly restricts the power of the courts to disbar an attorney, the exceptive language, "unless he shall have been convicted in open court or confessed himself guilty of some criminal offense showing himself unfit to be trusted," etc., is to be interpreted in the same way as the word "convicted" in the act of 1907. Hence the same obstruction is met in enforcing § 211 against respondent.

The history of this legislation may be learned, and the purpose of the legislature 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

understood, by reference to Re Moore, 63 N. C. 397; Ex parte Biggs, 64 N. C. 202; Ex parte Schenck, 65 N. C. 353. The last case was argued with a wealth of learning by the most eminent members of the bar of the state. The court held that the act of 1871 (Laws 1870-71, chap. 216, p. 337, § 4; Revisal 1905, § 211) was constitutional; that it did not deprive the court of any of its "inherent powers;" that the court had no power to disbar an attorney for causes other than those prescribed by the statute. The opinion concludes: "It is a law of the land and ought to be observed." The question came before the court again in Re Haywood, 66 N. C. 1. Pearson, Ch. J., after a careful consideration of the effect of the statute upon the power of the court to disbar an attorney, said: "The act of 1871 [Revisal 1905, § 211] takes from the court this common-law power to purge the bar of unfit members, except in specified cases; and it fails to provide any other power to be used in its place. It is a disabling, and not an enabling, statute; the whole purpose seeming to be to tie the hands of the court, so, when our power is taken away, the court is not at liberty to fall back upon another which it had before adjudged to be ineffectual to accomplish the end proposed." This case, as Ex parte Schenck, was argued by Mr. Moore, Mr. Phillips, and Mr. Merrimon, counsel eminent for their learning, industry, and loyalty to their profession. The court was evidently desirous of exerting such power as had been left to it by the legislature to compel a derelict attorney to discharge a conceded duty or be disbarred. It came to the conclusion that "the legislature had tied its hand." We do not entertain any doubt that, in the absence of restrictive legislation, the courts have an inherent power to strike from their rolls names of attorneys who are found, by reason of their conduct, unfit and unworthy members. The decisions to this effect are numerous and uniform. An instructive opinion upon the question is to be found in Sanborn v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140. Dickerson, J., says: "An attorney at law is an officer of the court as appears from the terms of his oath of office, to wit: 'You will conduct yourself in the office of an attorney within the courts according to the best of your knowledge and discretion, and with all good fidelity as well to the courts as your clients.' The order of his admission to the bar is the judgment of the court that he possesses the requisite legal qualifications, and good moral character to entitle him to practise the profession of an attorney at law. From the moment of his entrance upon the duties of his office he becomes responsible to the court for his official misconduct. The tenure of his office is during good behavior, and he can only be deprived of it for misconduct ascertained and determined by the court after opportunity to be heard has been afforded. In the absence of specific provisions to the contrary, the power of removal is commensurate with the power of appointment. . . . If 'a good moral character' is indispensable to entitle one to admission to the bar, it is obvious that the necessity for its continuance becomes enhanced by the conflicts, excitements, and temptations to which the practitioner is daily liable. For his official misconduct there is no power of removal but in the court. This power is therefore at once necessary to protect the court, preserve the purity of the administration of justice, and maintain the integrity of the bar. . . . It is a mistaken view of this subject, as the foregoing authorities show, to conclude that an attorney at law can only be disbarred for acts done 'in his office as attorney' or 'within the courts' in the term of his oath of office. On the contrary, an attorney may be guilty of disreputable practices and gross immoralities in his private capacity and without the pale of the court, which render him unfit to associate with gentlemen, disqualify him for the faithful discharge of his professional duties in or out of court, and render him unworthy to minister in the forum of justice. When such a case arises from whatever acts or causes, the cardinal condition of the attorney's admission to the bar, the possession of a 'good moral character,' is forfeited, and it will become the solemn duty of the court, upon a due presentment of the case, to revoke the authority it gave the offending member as a symbol of legal fitness and moral uprightness, lest it should be exercised for evil or tarnished with shame." Whipple, (Ch. J., in Re Mills, 1 Mich. 393, says: "Should this court, after being officially advised that one of its officers has forfeited the good name he possessed when permitted to assume the duties of his office, still hold him out to the world as worthy of confidence, they would, in my opinion, fail in the performance of a duty cast upon them by the law. It is a duty they owe to themselves, to the bar, and the public to see that a power which may be wielded for good or for evil is not intrusted to incompetent or dishonest hands. The extreme judgment of expulsion is not intended as a punishment inflicted upon the individual, but as a measure necessary to the protection of the public, who have a right to demand of us that no person shall be permitted to aid in the administration of justice whose character is tainted with corruption." Ex parte Smith, 28 Ind. 47; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In State ex rel. Wolf v. Kirke, 12 Fla. 278, 95 Am. Dec. 314, Westcott, J., writes an exhaustive opinion reviewing the statutes and decisions in England and in this country. Re Percy, 36 N. Y. 651; Re Woolley, 11 Bush, 96; People ex rel. Moses v. Goodrich, 79 Ill. 148; Re Smith, 73 Kan. 743, 85 Pac. 584. These cases all hold that for dishonesty or other conduct in his official character, showing an absence of good moral character, the court has the inherent power to disbar an attorney. Some of them, as in the case from Maine, hold that, when, without reference to his official duties or relations, he is guilty of such conduct, the court may strike his name from the roll of its attorneys. In none of the cases do the courts undertake to say how far the legislature may limit this inherent and essential power. We do not deem it proper to express any opinion upon this delicate question. This court having held in the cases cited that the act of 1871 (Laws 1870-71, chap. 216, p. 337, § 4), now § 211, Revisal 1905, did not deprive it of its essential inherent powers in this respect, we do not care to disturb or draw the question into discussion. Whatever may have been the reasons for passing that statute, they no longer exist, having passed away with the conditions which brought them into action. We are sure that in re-enacting the statute in the Revisal of 1905 it was not the intention of the legislature to unduly "tie the hand" of the court in preserving the high standard of conduct and character of our bar which has been the pride of the people of the state. We have no doubt that, if it appears to the legislature that larger power in the courts is necessary to enable them to discharge their duty, it will be prompt to confer it or to withdraw any undue restrictions now existing. Even for so laudable an end as purging the bar of unworthy members, we should not exercise doubtful power or unnecessarily come into conflict with the legislature. We do not entertain any doubt that, notwithstanding the restrictions placed upon the courts by the statute, ample power exists to protect them and their suitors from indignity, fraud, dishonesty, or malpractice on the part of any of its officers in the discharge of their official duties. It is manifest, however, that for the commission of crimes which seriously affect their moral character, but have no direct connection with their practical and immediate relation to the courts, the power to disbar attorneys is restricted by the express language of the statutes to convictions of the class of crimes named in the statutes. To give any other construction to the statute would not only do violence to well-settled principles, but might lead to results not contemplated by the legislature. If, as the record shows, the respondent is guilty of the crime charged, his name should be stricken from the roll of attorneys in this state; but, as we have seen, no power now exists in the court to do so.

We were requested by the committee on grievances to express our opinion to this extent, to the end that such further legislation may be had as would enable the state bar association to aid the courts in removing from the bar unworthy members. How far it is wise to define the crimes or confine cases to the mode of punishment as the basis for compulsory action is for the consideration of the legislature. Like all legislation of general application, it is difficult to avoid danger of miscarriage in individual cases. We have been favorably impressed with the method of procedure followed in the Kimball Case, 64 Me. 140. There the accusation was made by the bar, and, upon a notice to show cause, a reference was ordered to take testimony and report to the court, whereupon, after argument, the case was disposed of upon its merits. The disposition made by us of this appeal will not prevent a further investigation of the fitness of respondent to continue to be a member of the bar if the restriction now imposed upon the court is removed. The action of the committee on grievances is in all respects to be commended. They have discharged their duty, and the failure to remove the respondent, who, as the record shows, has been convicted of forgery, is no fault of theirs. The case must be remanded to the superior court of Buncombe with direction to dismiss the proceeding unless the legislature shall confer the power to investigate and pass upon the motion to disbar for conduct showing that since he received his license from this court he has been guilty of dishonest and criminal conduct. In this he has violated his oath that he "will honestly demean himself in the practice of an attorney." In such investigation the record of his conviction will be competent evidence of his guilt. We do not hold that for the commission of a felony, or other infamous crime, "showing him to be unfit to be trusted in the discharge of the duties of his profession" committed in another state, he should not be disbarred by the court of this state. That question is not presented. It is obvious that a man who will commit forgery or perjury, or be otherwise dishonest in one state, is not a fit person to be a member of the bar of this state. We simply hold that the statute (chapter 941, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

p. 1342, Laws 1907) does not impose upon the court the duty or confer the power to disbar an attorney because he has been "convicted" in the courts of another state or the United States. We further hold that the language of § 211, Revisal. 1905, disables the court from disbaring for the conviction of crime in another jurisdiction in the exercise of its "inherent power" to deal with its attorneys. We had occasion in Re Applicants for License, 143 N. C. 1, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 288, 55 S. E. 635, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 187, to consider the question of our power to refuse to license applicants who were shown to be of bad moral character and the extent to which it was subject to legislative control. The subject was carefully considered and the opinion of a majority of the court expressed in the able and exhaustive opinion of Mr. Justice Hoke. The legislature promptly amended the statute (Revisal 1905, § 207), restoring to the court the power to pass upon the moral character of applicants. Laws 1907, chap. 70, p. 81. The long and honorable history of the bar of North Carolina, distinguished by its learning, high personal and professional standards, and its patriotic service to the state, is justly regarded by the people with pride. Prior to 1868 no court, so far as our public records show, had been called upon to exercise its power to disbar an attorney. The unfortunate conflicts of the period following the Civil War called attention to the necessity for defining more clearly the relative rights and powers of the bench and the bar. The court promptly and wisely recognized the power of the legislature and the statutes enacted by it as the "state's collected will." If new conditions bringing a necessity for restoring the "inherent powers" to the courts exist, we should, in the same spirit, obey the law with the assurance that such legislation will be enacted as will enable the bar association, with the aid of the court, to remove from the roll the names of men who are guilty of forgery, whether committed in this state or elsewhere. We do not see any good reason why, if the law be so changed as to permit it, the court in this proceeding may not investigate the serious question presented by the action of the committee on grievances, and proceed, after full hearing, to dispose of it by making such order as will preserve the integrity and purity of the bar so far as respondent is concerned. While we do not construe his demurrer to the evidence as an admission of his guilt, because, under the statute, it was not open to him to deny it, we are of the opinion that, if power is conferred upon the court by the legislature, it is due to him and the bar of the state that a full investigation be had, and that he either be relieved of the charge resting upon him, or that he be disbarred and his name stricken from the roll of attorneys. There seems to be a misconception of the plain language of the statute. In unmistakable terms it says that, upon conviction of the crime, the court must disbar. No question of the respondent's guilt is, or can be, presented. The judge did not, and could not, possibly give respondent leave to answer denying the commission of the offense. He had no power to hear or determine any such question. If the power of the court is limited, it is because the legislature has done so. The same power can remove the limitation. It is not a question whether men guilty of felony shall practise law in North Carolina, but whether the court shall exercise power of which the legislature has deprived them. It was attempted in Re Moore, Ex parte Biggs, and Ex parte Schenck, with us, and the legislature "tied the hands" of the court. Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 18 L. ed. 366. We must declare the law as we find it to be without fear of criticism. The courts of this state will exhaust their power to purge the bar of unworthy members, but dare not assume power to do so.

The cause will be remanded to the Superior Court of Buncombe, with direction to set aside the order disbarring respondent and taking such further action in the premises as may be in accordance with the law. The general assembly convenes on the first Wednesday in January, 1909, and, if it see fit, a very simple amendment to § 211 of the Revisal of 1905 will clothe the court with full power to proceed.

. Remanded.

Brown, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with my brethren in the conclusion they have reached in this proceeding. It is brought at the instance of the bar association for the purpose of depriving the respondent of his right to practise law in the courts of this state. It is not criminal in its character, but purely civil, instituted, not for the purpose of punishment, but with the wholesome object of preserving the courts of justice from the official administration of a person unfit to practise in them. This is well settled in this country, as well as in Great Britain, where the courts have exclusive control over the admission as well as the disbarment of all practitioners before them. Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 288, 27 L. ed. 561, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 569; State ex rel. McCormick v. Winton, 11 Or. 456, 50 Am. Rep. 486, 5 Pac. 342; State ex rel. State Bar Asso. v. Finn, 32 Or. 519, 67 Am. St. Rep. 550, 52 Pac. 759; Re Crum, 7 N. D. 316, 75 N. W. 257; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Scott v. State, 86 Tex. 321, 24 S. W. 789. Inasmuch as the proceeding is merely civil in its nature, the statute of 1907, under which it is brought, cannot be ex post facto in its character, and no such question can arise. Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. 110, 8 L. ed. 884; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 267, 6 L. ed. 624.

The charges preferred against the respondent of a most serious character are as follows: "(2) That the said I. N. Ebbs, on the 4th day of December, 1903, was convicted in the United States court for the eastern district of Louisiana upon a certain bill of indictment, a copy of which is attached hereto, and that the said Ebbs was duly sentenced by the said court to a term of imprisonment after the jury had returned a verdict of guilty. The crime of which he was so convicted was punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary." The offenses of which the respondent was convicted, as set out in the petition, are as follows: "Unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously uttering and publishing as true a certain receipt; (3) unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly transmitting and presenting to the General Land Office of the Department of the Interior of the United States a certain false receipt; (4) knowingly, unlawfully, and feloniously transmitting and presenting for approval and payment a certain account and claim upon and against the government of the United States; (5) unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously and with intent to defraud the United States, transmitting and presenting to the General Land Office a certain false and, fraudulent voucher; (6) knowingly, unlawfully, and feloniously and with intent to defraud the United States presenting a certain false claim in violation of §§ 5421 and 5438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3667, 3674)." The record shows that respondent was duly tried by a jury at December term, 1903, of the circuit court of the United States, at New Orleans, convicted and sentenced to pay a fine and to be imprisoned, and that he was imprisoned accordingly. The respondent, by his demurrer to the petition, admits the truth of the facts stated therein: that is, he admits that he has been convicted by a jury of the offenses charged, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary.

It is useless to discuss the character of the crimes of which the respondent has been convicted. It will be admitted by all that one who has committed them should not be permitted to practise in the courts of the state. I concur with my brethren that our courts have power to investigate such charges, and, if they are sustained, to disbar the respondent. But I differ from them in holding that any investigation is now necessary. The learned judge who heard this matter in the court below, when he overruled the respondent's demurrer, gave him leave to file an answer, which he declined to do. The respondent should have availed himself of his right to answer, and deny the truth of the allegations contained in the bill of indictment, which is made a part of the petition, and should have insisted that the court here investigate the truth of the charges preferred against him. If the judge decline to give him a trial, the respondent could have appealed. Instead of doing that, when his demurrer was overruled, he stands mute and refuses to answer. What honorable attorney, fit to practise in our courts, would stand silent in the presence of such accusations? He should have courted investigation. His refusal to answer and deny the truth of the accusations in the bill and to demand a trial upon them here is sufficient to justify his disbarment. What else could the judge do but enter the judgment that was rendered? This court has, held, as I understand the opinion, that the respondent cannot be disbarred under § 1, subsec. "a," of the statute (Pub. Laws 1907, chap. 941, p. 1342), because the acts committed are not punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary by the laws of this state; and, secondly, because the respondent has not been convicted in this state of a crime punishable in its penitentiary. I think the construction placed upon the act is too narrow entirely, and contrary to its spirit and purpose. The statute declares: "Section 1. That an attorney at law must be disbarred and removed for the following causes: (a) Upon being convicted of a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary." It must be conceded that those words are broad enough to cover a conviction and sentence to the penitentiary under the laws of any state or of the United States. That being so, I know of no canon of construction which requires a more restricted construction to be given them. One of the recognized rules of construction declares that, when possible, such construction should be given a statute as will effectuate the object sought to be accomplished. The undoubted purpose of the act was to remove from the legal profession those of its members who are unworthy of the respect and confidence of the people. The end to be attained is the protection of those who deal with members of the bar, and not punishment. The public welfare, as well as the respect due the profession of the law, requires that its practitioners enjoy the confidence of the community. "It is not enough," says the supreme court of Connecticut, "for an attorney that he be honest. He must be that and more. He must be believed to be honest. It is absolutely essential to the usefulness of an attorney that he be entitled to the confidence of the community wherein he practises." Fairfield County Bar v. Taylor, 60 Conn. 11, 13 L.R.A. 767, 22 Atl. 441. My learned brother, Justice Walker, has written most impressively of the high character which should be the standard for our profession, and of the grave consequences which must follow its debasement. I cannot hope to add anything to what he has so well said. Re Applicants for License, 143 N. C. 33, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 288, 55 S. E. 635, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 187. It must be admitted that nothing can conduce more to lower and degrade the legal profession than to permit convicted felons from other states who have served terms in their penitentiaries to practise law in our courts. A term in the penitentiaries of the United States or of one of our sister states tends as much to impair a man's character and to destroy his usefulness as a legal adviser as a term in our own penal institution. Therefore I see no reason to suppose that the legislature meant to exclude only North Carolina convicts from our courts. We must bear in mind that the general assembly was not dealing with the administration of criminal law, but was declaring simply what class of persons should be excluded from a profession which is so intimately connected with the welfare of our people. I see no reason why we should not be willing to accept, under such circumstances, the judgments of the courts of other states and of the United States. In all other property matters we must extend to them the same faith and credit we give to our own. Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 9, 27 L. ed. 346, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25. We have recognized this principle of comity in this state by holding that a witness convicted of forgery in Tennessee was incompetent in the courts of North Carolina in a strong opinion by Justice Henderson. State v. Candler, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 393. What reason, then, is there to suppose that the general assembly did not intend to exclude from practice in our courts those who have been condemned as felons by the judgments and laws of other courts of our common country. It is practically impossible to try them over again in this state, or to investigate the truth of the charges, for the evidence and the witnesses are beyond our reach. We must accept the judgment of other jurisdictions, or else we must let those who carry the odor of the felon's cell about them stand up and plead in our courts.

Again, if those only are to be excluded who commit crimes against the state of North Carolina, we can never exclude those who are felons under the laws of the United States, even though they "be with treason damned." Under the construction given the statute, an attorney of this state might be convicted and sentenced for larceny in a distant state and return, and pursue his profession unmolested, as it might be impossible to bring the witnesses here upon whose evidence he was convicted.

I am convinced that the language of the statute is comprehensive enough to exclude from our courts all who have been convicted in any court of the United States or of any state thereof of a crime which, under the laws of such jurisdiction, is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, a universally recognized method of punishing criminals. I feel sure such was the intent of the bar association in framing the act, and that such was the purpose of the general assembly in enacting it, and I think it should be so construed.

Clark, Ch. J., dissents upon the ground that commission of a felony anywhere makes the party an unfit member of an honorable profession, and is a ground for disbarment under our statute. Revisal 1905, § 211. If it be conceded that the "conviction" thereof in another jurisdiction is not such proof of the fact as our statute contemplates, yet, when the judge gave the respondent leave to file an answer denying the commission of the offense, he did not do so. The charge, based on a certified judgment upon conviction in the United States circuit court, not being denied, must be taken as admitted in open court (Revisal 1905, § 211), for this is a civil proceeding. Our courts could not "convict" the respondent for a felony committed elsewhere with a view to punishment for crime, but in a civil proceeding for disbarment it could inquire as to the fact whether he committed the act alleged. Offered the opportunity in open court, he did not answer the charge, and, there being no issue raised, the court properly gave judgment.

LAMM & COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

C. F. COLCORD.

(— Okla. —, 98 Pac. 355.)

Guaranty — parties — construction.

1. In construing the language of an instrument of guaranty for the purpose of interpreting the same to determine the intention of the parties, it should be taken most strongly against the guarantor, and in favor of the party parting with his property upon the faith of the interpretation of such instrument most favorable to his rights.

Same — restrictions.

2. After the meaning of a contract of guaranty has been ascertained, and the actual operation thereunder been begun, the guarantor is entitled then to the application of the strict rule of construction, and cannot be held beyond the precise terms of such contract.

Guarantor — compliance with contract — release.

3. A guarantor has the right to prescribe the exact terms upon which he will enter into a guaranty obligation, and to insist upon a discharge in case those terms are not strictly observed.

Same — release — evidence.

4. A party stipulating to guarantee against the default of O. C. Scoresby, in the event credit is extended him in a certain amount for goods, wares, and merchandise to be furnished him by the plaintiff, cannot be held on such guaranty; the plaintiff having extended credit in said sum, and furnished and delivered said merchandise and wares to the Scoresby Tailoring Company, there being no proof offered to show that O. C. Scoresby solely comprised the Scoresby Tailoring Company.

Case Note. — Does guaranty of credit extended for price of goods sold cover sales to successor.

It seems to be a generally accepted rule that, where a person guarantees the credit of one purchasing goods, the guarantor will be liable on his obligation only for sales made to the principal debtor, and not to his successor in the business.

A guaranty for the payment of merchandise purchased on credit cannot be extended to cover the liability of a partnership composed of the principal debtor and one whom he has taken into partnership subsequently to the making of the guaranty. Coan v. Partridge, 98 N. Y. Supp. 570; Shaw v. Vandusen, 5 U. C. Q. B. 353.

And so a guaranty that a certain firm would pay for all goods furnished them is held, in Bill v. Barker, 16 Gray, 62, not to extend to purchases by one of the partners succeeding to the business of the firm.

In Manhattan Gaslight Co. v. Ely, 39 Barb. 174, one guaranteeing that he would pay for gas and meter furnished to another if the latter should fail to pay therefor was relieved from his obligation upon the principal debtor ceasing to occupy the premises; and the guarantor was in no sense liable to pay for gas furnished to the new occupant because the gas company had received no notice of the change.

But it is held in Re Cinque, 109 Fed.

the said O. C. Scoresby solely comprises the Scoresby Tailoring Company, and consequently there was no necessity to affirmatively traverse the same. But there was an allegation that, upon said guaranty, and relying upon the same, plaintiff extended credit to O. C. Scoresby. The only account offered in evidence against anyone was that verified by the witness Malone in his deposition, which was against the Scoresby Tailoring Company, and was introduced over the objection and exception of the defendant on the ground that the same was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial; it not being shown to be an account for which the guaranty was executed, it appearing on its face that it was against the Scoresby Tailoring Company.

In the case of Cremer v. Higginson, 1 Mason, 323, Fed. Cas. No. 3,383, Mr. Circuit Justice Story said: "Having thus fixed the interpretation of the letter on this point, that it is a mere guaranty of the debt of third persons, the next question upon its construction is, To whom are the advances to be made? If there be anything clear in this cause, it is that the advances are to be made to Stephen Higginson, Jr., and Henry Higginson, then copartners in trade under the firm of S. & H. Higginson. It follows, therefore, that it covers only advances made to them jointly on their joint credit, and not advances made to them severally upon their several credit. Unless then it shall be completely established that the advances were made on the joint account of the firm, there is an end of the plaintiffs' case." In the case of Crane Co. v. Specht, 39 Neb. 123, 42 Am. St. Rep. 562, 57 N. W. 1017, Mr. Justice Harrison, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question raised by the bill of exceptions and strenuously argued by counsel is, Can the Crane Company recover upon the contract of guaranty given by defendants to Crane Bros. Manufacturing Company? The attorneys for plaintiff contended that the Crane Company was organized on the 20th day of January, 1890, being the Crane Bros. Manufacturing Company under the new name, Crane Company, that it was composed of the same persons, managed by the same officers, engaged in the same business, and at the same location; that there was merely a change in the name, and no other or further change in the composition or operations of the company, and hence it was entitled to recover on this, as well as other contracts to which the Crane Bros. Manufacturing Company was a party. The defendant's attorneys claim that the Crane Company cannot recover by virtue of the guaranty given by defendant to the Crane Bros. Manufacturing Company any sum due it for goods sold or furnished Lichtenberger after the change of its name to 'Crane Company.' The contention in the case resolves itself to the question, Did the change in the name of the corporation deprive it of the right to recover, upon the contract of guaranty given to it by the defendant in its former name, the price of goods furnished after the change in style to the party whose account was guaranteed to it under the old name? The answer to this question will be most readily obtained, it seems to me, by an examination of the nature of the contract of guaranty, and the construction to be given to it. In 1 Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty, 2d ed. pp. 134, 135, § 93, it is said, in discussing such contracts: 'A rule never to be lost sight of in determining the liability of a surety or guarantor is that he is a favorite of the law, and has a right to stand upon the strict terms of his obligation, when such terms are ascertained. This is a rule universally recognized by the courts, and is applicable to every variety of circumstances.' Again it is said: 'A surety or guarantor usually derives no benefit from his contract. His object, generally, is to befriend the principal. . . . The guarantor is only liable because he has agreed to become so. He is bound by his agreement, and nothing else. . . . It has been repeatedly decided that he is under no moral obligation to pay the debt of his principal. Being, then, bound by his agreement alone, and deriving no benefit from the transaction, it is eminently just and proper that he should be a favorite of the law, and have a right to stand upon the strict terms of his obligation. To charge him beyond its terms . . . would be, not to enforce the contract made by him, but to make another for him.'" In the case of Allison v. Rutledge, 5 Yerg. 193, the defendant addressed a letter to "Mr. Allison," by which he became surety for the payment of the purchase price of some bacon purchased by one Cooper, under which guaranty he was sued as guarantor by John and Joseph Allison for the price of the bacon. Mr. Chief Justice Catron, in speaking for the supreme court of Tennessee, said: "Can, under any circumstances, a recovery be had in this action by force of the guaranty? It is addressed in the singular to Mr. Allison. Rutledge undertook for the debt of Cooper, and is bound by the writing, and this only. The contract cannot be varied, or its meaning explained without violating the statute of frauds. He did not address himself to two Allisons, but to one. The paper from its face could not be given in evidence to sustain the joint action, and it could not be proved by parol that two were meant." In the case of Grant v. Naylor, 4 Cranch. 224, 2 L. ed. 603, John and Jeremiah Naylor brought an action against Daniel Grant on a letter or contract of guaranty addressed to John and Joseph Naylor. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "That the letter was really designed for John and Jeremiah Naylor cannot be doubted, but the principles which require that a promise to pay the debt of another shall be in writing, and which will not permit a written contract to be explained by parol testimony, originate in a general and a wise policy, which this court cannot relax, so far as to except from its operation cases within the principles. Already have so many cases been taken out of the statute of frauds, which seem to be within its letter, that it may well be doubted whether the exceptions do not let in many of the mischiefs against which the rule was intended to guard. . . . On examining the cases which have been cited at the bar, it does not appear to the court that they authorize the explanation of the contract which is attempted in this case. This is not a case of ambiguity. It is not an ambiguity patent, for the face of the letter can excite no doubt. It is not a latent ambiguity, for there are not two firms of the name of John & Joseph Naylor & Co. to either of which this letter might have been delivered. . . . In such a case the letter itself is not a written contract between Daniel Grant, the writer, and John and Jeremiah Naylor, the persons to whom it was delivered. To admit parol proof to make it such a contract is going further than courts have ever gone, where the writing is itself the contract, . . . and where no pre-existing obligation bound the party to enter into it." The apparent weight of authority is that no one but the identical person to whom the letter of credit was addressed, or in whose favor the instrument of guaranty runs, or his or their assigns, can maintain an action thereon. Taylor v. McClung, 2 Houst. (Del.) 25; Smith v. Montgomery, 3 Tex. 199; Walsh v. Bailie, 10 Johns. 180; Penoyer v. Watson 16 Johns. 100; Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 45 Am. Rep. 204; Taylor v. Wetmore, 10 Ohio, 491. The following authorities appear to support the contrary doctrine: Michigan State Bank v. Peck, 28 Vt. 200, 65 Am. Dec. 234; Wadsworth v. Allen, 8 Gratt. 174, 56 Am. Dec. 137. It is not necessary, however, to determine which announces the correct rule, these authorities being merely referred to to illuminate the doctrine of the liability of a guarantor.

In the case at bar the guarantor agreed to answer for the default of O. C. Scoresby. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The record shows that upon this instrument of guaranty the goods were furnished the Scoresby Tailoring Company. There is no presumption that they were one and the same. A guarantor has the right to prescribe the exact terms upon which he will enter into the obligation, and to insist upon a discharge in case those terms are not observed. If the Scoresby Tailoring Company was a corporation or a partnership composed of members other than the party mentioned in this guaranty, the defendant could not be held as guarantor in this action. If it were a corporation, its business and assets would be controlled by a board of directors, and the guarantor might have refused to have been bound for its defaults, though the said O. C. Scoresby was one of the stockholders and officers. If it were a partnership composed of other members than the said Scoresby, the partnership property and assets would have been subject to the partnership control, and the other partners would have had the same control thereof as the said O. C. Scoresby, and, under such circumstances, the guarantor might have declined to have become bound. The plaintiff having failed to affirmatively show that the goods were furnished to the party named in the guaranty, the guarantor could not be held on such liability.

There appears to have been no error committed by the lower court in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant. Its judgment is affirmed.

JOHN E. CARNEY et al., Respts.,
v.

FRANK L. BIGHAM et al., Appts.

Tax — owner — certificate of delinquency.

1. Notice to the person described in a certificate of tax delinquency is not sufficient to sustain a foreclosure if he is not the person appearing on the tax roll under a statute providing that the owner of the certificate may give notice to the person described in such certificate, where the statute also provides that the name of the person appearing on the treasurer's rolls as the owner for the purpose of this act shall be considered as the owner of the property.

Note. — As to effect of summons or notice to person by wrong initial, see case note to Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hasenwinkle, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 129.

Name — Initials — court proceedings.

2. Since the use of initials instead of a given name before a surname has become a common practice, these initials must be all given and correctly given in court proceedings.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover possession of and quiet title to certain real property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter S. Fulton, for appellants:

The variance in the middle initial is not fatal as notice was given to the owner as described in the certificate.

Rowland v. Eskeland, 40 Wash. 257, 82 Pac. 599; McManus v. Morgan, 38 Wash. 534, 80 Pac. 786; Allen v. Peterson, 38 Wash. 599, 80 Pac. 849; Pyatt v. Hegquist, 45 Wash. 504, 88 Pac. 933.

Messrs. Willett & Willett for respondents.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondents, who were plaintiffs below, brought this action to recover possession and quiet title to certain real property situated in the city of Seattle, of which the appellants had possession and were claiming under a tax deed issued by King county in a tax-foreclosure proceeding. The facts were stipulated by the parties, and were, in substance, these: On and prior to June 3, 1901, the respondents were the owners in fee of the property in question; the title standing of record in the name of the husband, John E. Carney. The land had been listed for taxation on the assessment rolls of King county for the years 1896 to 1901, inclusive, under the name of "J. E. Carney," and the taxes thereon for the several years named were unpaid. On August 2, 1900, the county treasurer of King county issued to the appellant Frank L. Bigham a certificate of delinquency in the sum of $4.49 for the year 1896, whereupon Bigham paid the taxes for the subsequent years of 1897, 1898, and 1899. The certificate recited the name of the person to whom the property was assessed as "J. G. Carney," instead of "J. E. Carney," as it appeared on the assessment rolls. After purchasing the certificate, the appellant Bigham inquired in the neighborhood of the lots for the J. G. Carney named in the certificate as the owner of the property, but failed to find any such person, although the real owner John E. Carney, then resided, and for ten years or more had resided, within three blocks of the property; he being a well-known contractor and builder of the city of Seattle, having his name and address in the current city directories both individually and in connection with the contracting firm of which he was a member. June 3, 1901, the appellant Bigham, as plaintiff, began an action to foreclose the certificate of delinquency, making parties defendant J. G. Carney and Jane Doe Carney, his wife. Summons for personal service was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff of King county, who returned the same not found. Summons was thereupon served by publication, and in due time a judgment of foreclosure was entered and a sale had thereon, under which the tax deed was issued which is sought to be canceled in the action. It is further agreed that the taxes paid by the appellants, together with interest, penalties, and costs, amount to the sum of $65. On the foregoing facts, the court held the foreclosure invalid and entered a judgment canceling the tax deed and quieting title in the respondents, giving the appellants judgment for the sum of $65, the amount of taxes paid by them.

It will be observed from the foregoing statement that neither the true owner of property, nor the person whose name appeared on the assessment rolls as the owner of the property, was made a party defendant to the foreclosure proceeding; but that the county treasurer, through inadvertence or otherwise, inserted a fictitious name in the certificate of delinquency which he issued to the appellant Frank L. Bigham, and that the appellant, being misled thereby, foreclosed against this fictitious person. The appellants contend, nevertheless, that the foreclosure proceeding is valid, that it is sufficient by the express terms of the statute to make the person named in the certificate of delinquency the sole party defendant, and that this court has so held. The statute relied upon is § 1 of the act of March 20, 1901. Laws 1901, chap. 178, p. 384. By that act it is provided that, at any time after the expiration of three years from the original date of delinquency of any tax included in a certificate of delinquency, "the holder of any certificate of delinquency may give notice to the owner of the property described in such certificate that he will apply to the superior court of the county in which the property is situated for a judgment foreclosing the lien," etc. It is insisted that the word "described" in the quoted portion of the statute modifies the word "owner," instead of the word "property," and hence the true construction of the statute is that the person named in the certificate of delinquency shall be deemed the true owner for the purpose of foreclosing the tax lien. The proper interpretation of this clause of the statute might be doubtful if it stood alone, but a subsequent section definitely fixes its meaning. By § 3 of the act above cited it is provided that "the names of the person or persons appearing on the treasurer's rolls as the owner or owners of said property for the purpose of this act shall be considered and treated as the owner or owners of said property. . . ." This section makes it clear that the person to whom the property is assessed is the only person other than the true owner against whom a valid foreclosure proceeding may be had in the courts, and that the insertion by the treasurer of the name of a person different from that appearing on the assessment rolls as the owner does not authorize the holder of the certificate to foreclose the lien by making such person a party defendant unless he be the true owner. On the contrary, the holder must, at his peril, foreclose against the person named on the treasurer's rolls as the owner of the property, or he must foreclose against the true owner.

The case relied on to support the contention of the appellant are Anderson v. Turati, 39 Wash. 155, 81 Pac. 557, and Rowland v. Eskeland, 40 Wash. 253, 82 Pac. 599. In the first of these cases it was said that the name of the owner described in the tax rolls and certificate of delinquency should be included in the summons, and that it is defective without it. In the second case similar language was used, and the further statement made that the statute only requires notice to be given to the owner described in the certificate. But an examination of the opinions in their entirety will show that the court used these expressions on the supposition that the treasurer had complied with his duty and had inserted in the certificate of delinquency the name of the person to whom the property was assessed on the treasurer's rolls. They were not made with the view of a mistake on the part of the treasurer. Moreover, the real meaning of the court was made clear in the subsequent case of Sherman v. Schomber, 43 Wash. 330, 86 Pac. 509, where the statute last above cited was quoted, and this language used: "This provision [§ 3, act March 20, 1901 (Laws 1901, chap. 178, p. 385)] is clear and explicit to the effect that the person appearing as the owner on the treasurer's rolls shall be considered and treated as the owner," for the purposes of foreclosure; saying, further, that the appellants' contention to the effect that the statute quoted applied to foreclosures by the county, and not to foreclosures by an individual, was unfounded, as the provision clearly applied to both classes.

Nor can the foreclosure proceedings be upheld on the theory that the middle initial is no part of a person's name, and hence no part of the name inscribed upon the assessment roll or in the certificate of delinquency. At common law it is true a legal name consisted of one given name and one surname or family name, and mistakes in a middle initial or a middle name were not regarded as of consequence. But since the use of initials, instead of a given name, before a surname, has become a common practice, the necessity that these initials be all given and correctly given in court proceedings has become of importance in every case and in many absolutely essential to a correct designation of the person intended. The present case is a good illustration of the latter class of cases. The respondent, as has been shown, was a well-known person, living close to the property in question, having his name in two places in all of the current city directories, yet neither the purchaser of the tax certificate when inquiring for the owner of the property, nor the sheriff having the process in his hand for service, thought it worth while to inquire of the respondent whether he was the owner of the property or the person intended to be named in the certificate of delinquency. Had the middle initial been correctly given, no such oversight could have been possible.

The judgment appealed from is right, and will stand affirmed.

ALBERT JONES, Appt.,

v.

BROADWAY ROLLER RINK COMPANY,
Respnt.

(— Wis. —, 118 N. W. 170.)

Civil rights — roller skating rink.

1. A roller skating rink which the public is invited to patronize for an admission fee is within the terms of a statute imposing a penalty for exclusion on account of color of any person from the privilege of Case Note. — What are places of amusement within civil rights acts.

In People v. King, 42 Hun. 186, affirmed in 110 N. Y. 418, 1 L.R.A. 293, 6 Am. St. Rep. 389, 18 N. E. 245, it appears that the jury, under the charge of the court, found that a skating rink to which the general public was admitted on the payment of a fee was a place of amusement within a statute making it a misdemeanor to exclude a citizen by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, from the equal en-inns, restaurants, saloons, barber shops, eating houses, public conveyances on land or water, or any other place of public accommodation or amusement.

Costs — special provision.

2. A statute providing a penalty of $5 and costs for excluding a person of color from a place of amusement prevails over a prior general statute governing the matter of costs.

Appeal — intermediate orders — costs — exception.

3. An order determining the provisions of the judgment on the subject of costs necessarily affects the judgment within the meaning of a statute requiring such orders to be included in the judgment roll, and also within the operation of a statute permitting intermediate orders to be reviewed, whether excepted to or not.

(November 10, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County denying him costs after recovery of the statutory penalty for wrongful exclusion from a roller rink. Reversed.

Statement by Dodge, J.:

Action for damages, alleging that the defendant, a corporation, was conducting a place of public accommodation and amusement, to wit, a roller skating rink, in the city of Superior; that plaintiff paid the price of admission and for skating and entered said rink, but was prohibited by the defendant from skating for the reason that the plaintiff was a colored man; that he was thus unjustly denied equal enjoyment and privilege by illegal discrimination based wholly upon color, to his damage. The answer admits the conduct of the roller skating rink, and denies all other allegations. After trial a jury brought in a verdict for joyment of "theaters or other places of amusement." The court said that this finding could not be a subject of doubt, irrespective of the verdict.

In Johnson v. Humphrey Pop Corn Co. 24 Ohio C. C. 135, it was held that a pleasure resort with a bowling alley maintained and operated as a part thereof was a place of "public accommodation and amusement" within the meaning of a statute providing for "the full and equal enjoyment . . . of inns, restaurants, eating houses, . . . theaters, and all other places of public accommodation and amusement."

In Rhone v. Loomis, 74 Minn. 200, 77 N. W. 31, it was held that a saloon was not within the meaning of a statute which made the defendant liable in damages to the aggrieved party and also liable to a fine and imprisonment for denying to any person, on account of race, creed, or color, "the full and equal enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of any hotel, inn, tavern, restaurant, eating house, soda water fountain, ice cream parlor, public conveyance on land or water theater, barber shop, or other place of public refreshment, amusement, instruction, accommodation, or entertainment." In Com. v. Sylvester, 13 Allen. 247, it was held that an unlicensed billiard room was not within the meaning of a civil rights act limited in terms to public places of amusement "licensed under the laws of this commonwealth."

As to what are places of public accommodation within the meaning of civil rights acts, see case note to Faulkner v. Solazzi, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 601. It appears in two of the cases cited in that note, and therefore omitted from this, that a saloon and a soda water fountain have been held not to come within the meaning of the phrase "and all other places of public accommodation and amusement."

the plaintiff for $25. The clerk entered judgment, and taxed plaintiff's costs. Upon motion for review of the clerk's action, the court entered an order that the clerk strike out and disallow all costs to the plaintiff, and that he tax and allow costs to the defendant. Whereupon judgment was entered reciting such original taxation by the clerk, and said order on review thereof, and the off-setting of defendant's costs against plaintiff's damages, and ordering recovery by the defendant of the balance of $5.56. From this judgment, the plaintiff appeals, but settled no bill of exceptions.

Mr. Archibald McKay, for appellant:

Where costs are given by statute, a party's right thereto is absolute, and the court has no discretion in the matter.

St. Charles v. O'Malley, 18 Ill. 407; Lutgor v. Walters, 64 Barb. 417; Hotaling v. McKenzie, 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 320; Furman v. Cunningham, 34 Hun. 606.

Mr. W. P. Crawford, for respondent:

Defendant's roller rink was not a place of public accommodation and amusement within the meaning of the statute, and plaintiff cannot recover costs within the statute.

Cecil v. Green, 161 Ill. 265, 32 L.R.A. 566, 43 N. E. 1105; Kellar v. Koerber, 61 Ohio St. 388, 55 N. E. 1002; Faulkner v. Solazzi, 79 Conn. 541, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 601, 65 Atl. 947, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 67.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We cannot doubt that the action attempted to be stated in the complaint and met by the answer was the action expressly authorized by § 4398c, Stat. 1898: "Any person who shall deny to any other person, in whole or in part, the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages,

In Com. v. Sylvester, 13 Allen. 247, it was held that an unlicensed billiard room was not within the meaning of a civil rights act limited in terms to public places of amusement "licensed under the laws of this commonwealth."

facilities, and privileges of inns, restaurants, saloons, barber shops, eating houses, public conveyances on land or water, or any other place of public accommodation or amusement, except for reasons applicable alike to all persons of every race or color, or who shall aid or incite such denial, or require any person to pay a larger sum than the regular rate charged other persons for such accommodations . . . shall be liable to the person aggrieved thereby in damages not less than $5 with costs," etc. The complainant alleges that the defendant's skating rink was a place of public accommodation or amusement, and that the exclusion was on the ground of plaintiff's color, neither of which allegations is of any materiality or significance to an action either of tort or contract independent of such statute. We think, also, that nothing in the record shows that the roller skating rink maintained by the defendant was not a place of accommodation or amusement within the terms of the statute. It is alleged to have been such place, and presumably the evidence went as far as possible in support of such allegation. A public roller skating rink is undoubtedly a public place of amusement. This, however, probably would not suffice to bring it within the statute if it were entirely different in character from the places of accommodation or amusement specifically named therein, for, by reason of the context, the rule noscitur a sociis applies, and the other places of accommodation and amusement intended by the statute are only such as bear some resemblance to those specifically named. Our statute is quite exhaustive in its specifications, much more so than the statutes of some of the other states. Thus it includes in the specifications both saloons and barber shops, which have been held in other states not to be included in a statute omitting to specifically name them, but containing the words "other places of accommodation and amusement." Faulkner v. Sollazzi, 79 Conn. 541, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 601, 65 Atl. 947, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 67; Kellar v. Koerber, 61 Ohio St. 388, 55 N. E. 1002. By their specification in the Wisconsin statute the genus or class to which resemblance must be found is, of course, enlarged. Appellant's counsel has given us no aid whatever by citation of authorities or reference to the construction of similar statutes in other states. We find ourselves unable, however, to conceive any class of places of public accommodation or amusement which would not include a roller skating rink to which the public were generally invited upon no condition but the payment of a fixed charge,—public in as broad a sense as is the common carrier or the innkeeper, the exclusion from which of an individual or a class must infer discrimination and denial of privileges which all other persons enjoy by virtue merely of their membership in the public or general community. Public accommodation and amusement is the test prescribed by our statute. The amusement offered by the usual skating rink is to the public as such and generally. It differs radically from the tender of accommodation offered by the ordinary merchant or professional man, who, while he impliedly, by opening the door of his shop or office, invites everyone to enter, does so only for the purpose of selling to each individually either service or merchandise. This distinction has been often noted. We append a few illustrated cases: Public eating house, Humburd v. Crawford, 128 Iowa, 743, 105 N. W. 330; boot-blackening stand, Burks v. Boso, 81 App. Div. 530, 81 N. Y. Supp. 384, Id. 180 N. Y. 341, 105 Am. St. Rep. 762, 73 N. E. 58; theater, Joseph v. Bidwell, 28 La. Ann. 382, 26 Am. Rep. 102; bowling alley, Johnson v. Humphrey Pop Corn Co. 24 Ohio C. C. 135; billiard room, Com. v. Sylvestor, 13 Allen, 247; skating rink, People v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 1 L.R.A. 293, 6 Am. St. Rep. 389, 18 N. E. 245. From reason and authority, we are convinced that a roller rink may fall within § 4398c, Stat. 1898, and therefore that the complaint attempts to state a cause of action based upon that statute.

This being, then, an action specially authorized by § 4398c, enacted in 1895, and the minimum amount of the recovery being therein prescribed, we can see no escape from the conclusion that that section must control upon the subject of costs specifically treated therein, over the general statute (§ 2918, Stat. 1898), enacted long previous, wherever the two conflict. There is nothing to obstruct the presumption of an intention to legislate according to the words used in 1895 when the legislature provided that plaintiff's recovery, though as low as $5, should entitle him to costs. Where statutes conflict in terms, ordinarily the later prevails over the earlier and the specific over the general. Blabon v. Gilchrist, 67 Wis. 45, 29 N. W. 220; State ex rel. Donnelly v. Hobe, 106 Wis. 411, 423, 82 N. W. 336; Cotzhausen v. H. W. Johns. Mfg. Co. 107 Wis. 59, 82 N. W. 716; Gymnastic Asso. v. Milwaukee, 129 Wis. 429, 100 N. W. 109.

But respondent urges that we cannot review the order awarding costs, for the reason that no exception thereto appears upon the record, and the judgment roll or record is not enlarged by bill of exceptions. An order determining the provisions of the judgment on the subject of costs is an order prior to judgment, and it is, within the terms of § 3070, Stat. 1898, an order "which involves the merits and necessarily affects the judgment," and which therefore is a part of the record and must be included in the judgment roll by virtue of § 2898, Stat. 1898. Hoey v. Pierron, 67 Wis. 267, 30 N. W. 692; Morris v. National Protective Soc. 106 Wis. 92, 81 N. W. 1036; Hildebrand v. American Fine Art Co. 109 Wis. 171, 53 L.R.A. 826, 85 N. W. 268. It therefore is an intermediate order, which may be reviewed on appeal "whether the same were excepted to or not" by virtue of § 3070. It is true that general language was used indicating the necessity of exception, and perhaps of bill of exceptions, in Cord v. Southwell, 15 Wis. 211, and Perkins v. Davis, 16 Wis. 470. But it was after the decision in those cases that § 3070 in its present form was enacted, containing as new matter with reference to the review on appeal of such orders the words: "Whether the same were excepted to or not; nor shall it be necessary in any case to take any exception or settle any bill of exceptions to enable the supreme court to review any alleged error which would, without a bill of exceptions, appear upon the face of the record." It was a mistake, therefore, to assume that the rule of those early cases still persists, as this court apparently did in Fowler v. Metzger Seed & Oil Co. 131 Wis. 633, 111 N. W. 677. The broad language in the last case: "But an order allowing or disallowing costs is not reviewable by this court, unless the evidence upon which it is based and the exceptions thereto are preserved in a bill of exceptions (Cord v. Southwell and Perkins v. Davis, supra)" according to its words is incorrect. Such an order is part of the record, and may be reviewed to the extent that any error thereby committed appears of record. That language, however, read in its application to the situation then before the court, was entirely correct. That situation was a review of the taxation of certain items by the clerk, depending for its correctness upon proceedings and evidence had before the clerk and before the court, which could have no place in the record except by means of a bill of exceptions. As to such action, it has uniformly been held that the errors do not appear upon the record without a bill of exceptions, and therefore cannot be reviewed. State v. Wertzel, 84 Wis. 347, 54 N. W. 579; Lauterbach v. Netzo, 111 Wis. 322, 87 N. W. 230; Dunbar v. Montreal River Lumber Co. 127 Wis. 131, 106 N. W. 389.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for $25 damages and $27.27 costs as of August 22, 1907.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

WINDHAM et al., Appts.,
v.
STEPHENSON et al.

(— Ala. —, 47 So. 280.)

Lien — purchase — conversion.

1. The mere purchase of a crop upon which another has a lien is not of itself destructive of the lien so as to give the lienor a right of action against the purchaser for the wrongful conversion of the property.

Mortgage — crops — change of premises.

2. A mortgage by a renter of crops to be grown during the year, and also of crops to be raised "each successive year," until the debt is paid, will not attach to crops grown in a subsequent year on land rented by him from a different landlord, in which he had no interest when the mortgage was executed.

Case Note. — Validity of chattel mortgage on crops to be grown on land in which mortgagor has no present interest.

There is much authority upon the question of the validity of mortgages upon property to be thereafter acquired and of mortgages upon property not yet in existence (5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 979); but the cases are few which treat of the question of the validity of a mortgage upon crops where the property is not in existence, and the source of potential existence is in no manner connected with the mortgagor at the time of the giving of the mortgage.

A few cases follow the doctrine of WINDHAM v. STEPHENSON, and hold that a chattel mortgage on crops to be raised on lands in which the mortgagor has no present interest is invalid.

Thus, in Weil v. Flowers, 109 N. C. 212, 13 S. E. 761, the chattel mortgage or agricultural lien described the crop as "all my entire crop now growing or to be grown the present year on my land or on any other land." The court held that the words "or on any other land" were too indefinite, because they pointed out no particular lands. The court said: "The lands of the maker of the lien at the time he executed it could be seen and known,—those that he might cultivate could not." And to the same general effect were the decisions in Woodlief v. Harris, 95 N. C. 211; Gwathney v. Etheridge, 99 N. C. 571, 6 S. E. 411; Crinkley v. Eger-ton, 113 N. C. 142, 18 S. E. 341.

And in Paden v. Bellenger, 87 Ala. 575, 6 So. 351, where a mortgage in terms conveyed the entire crop of the mortgagor to be raised in a certain year on his "own land or on any other land," the court, in holding the mortgage void for uncertainty, said:

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain crops upon which plaintiffs claimed a lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. C. Amon and J. M. Irwin for appellants.

Mr. G. O. Chenault, for appellees:

The corn and cotton were not owned by the mortgagor when the mortgage was issued, and no lien can attach thereto.

Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 288; Christian & C. Grocery Co. v. Michael, 121 Ala. 87, 77 Am. St. Rep. 30, 25 So. 571; Karter v. Fields, 140 Ala. 364, 37 So. 204.

Haralson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs, Windham & Company, sued the defendants, Stephenson & Alexander, in an action on the case, to recover

$100 damages for an alleged wrongful removal and disposition of 2 bales of cotton and 50 bushels of corn, upon which plaintiffs claimed to have a lien by virtue of a mortgage executed on the 18th of February, 1903, by Charles Daugherty to Tollie Hodges, and which was by the latter, for value received, transferred, on the 19th of February, 1903, to the plaintiffs. The mortgage was, to repeat its language, on "the entire crop of cotton and corn, fodder, grain, or other articles of any kind, raised or to be raised by me and family during the year 1903, also the crops raised each successive year until the debt hereby secured is paid in full."

The undisputed evidence shows that Charles Daugherty was farming in 1903, on land rented by him from said Hodges; and on February 18th of that year he executed to said Hodges a note for $100, payable on the 15th of October following; and to secure said note, he, at the same time, executed a mort-

"According to the unbroken current of our decisions, as well as by the weight of authority in other states it is essential to the creation of such an encumbrance that its subject-matter should have a potential existence, as distinguishable from a mere possibility, or expectancy on the part of the contracting parties, that it will come into being. While the thing itself need not have identity or separate entity, yet it must at least be the product, or growth, or increase of property which has, at the time, a corporal existence, and in which the mortgagor has a present interest, not a mere belief, hope, or expectation that he will in future acquire such an interest." And to the same effect are several other Alabama cases sufficiently set out in the opinion.

In Reeves v. Sheets, 16 Okla. 342, 82 Pac. 847, it was held that while a mortgage upon crops to be grown in the future might be valid, a mortgagor cannot create a lien upon property which he does not own at the time and in which he afterwards acquires no interest.

Some cases hold that while such a mortgage is void at law, the parties contemplated that the mortgagor would acquire the land and would produce the crop, and therefore the instrument created an equitable lien which would attach to the crop when it came into existence.

Thus, in Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 266, where a mortgage was executed upon crops to be grown upon premises not yet leased, the court said: "If no other relation existed between the parties than that of mortgagor and mortgagee, we incline to the opinion that if, at law, the mortgage would be invalid, as a conveyance of things not in existence, unless ratified by some act done by the mortgagor after their acquisition, in equity it would attach to the crop as it came into existence, transferring the beneficial interest against the mortgagor and all 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

others than a bona fide purchaser without notice." And to the same effect was the decision in Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 336.

And in Richardson v. Washington, 88 Tex. 339, 31 S. W. 614, it was held that an interest in the land upon which the crop was to be raised was unimportant to the validity of the mortgage, and it was enough that the particular land and the crop of a particular year were described; the agreement attached to the crop and became a lien upon it which equity would enforce. This decision was distinguished in McDavid v. Phillips (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 1129 (affirmed in 100 Tex. 73, 94 S. W. 1131), the court holding that the rule there laid down was not applicable to an instrument purporting to give a lien upon "crops to be raised by the mortgagor for future years until the mortgage is discharged." The court said: "The description in the mortgage, if valid, is broad enough to include in its general terms all the crops which the mortgagor might thereafter grow in any year upon any land on the face of the earth."

Other cases, adopting the rule in equity, have held such mortgages valid even at law.

Thus, in Hogan v. Atlantic Elevator Co. 66 Minn. 344, 69 N. W. 1, it was held that a chattel mortgage upon a crop to be raised on land to be acquired thereafter was valid, the court relying upon the case of Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218, 43 N. W. 137, in which the court went entirely beyond the doctrine of potential existence, and adopted the rule in equity holding that, where parties by their contract in clear terms express an intention to create a mortgage lien upon personal property not then owned, but to be subsequently acquired, by the mortgagor, whether then in being or not, the mortgage attaches as a lien upon the property as soon as the mortgagor acquires it.

gage on his crop of that year, which note and mortgage, as stated, were for value transferred the day after their execution, to the plaintiffs, and it is under this mortgage they claim to be entitled to prosecute this suit.

As stated, said mortgage, besides conveying his crop of that year, contained the clause—"Also the crops raised each successive year, until the debt hereby secured is paid in full." It is under the latter clause that the plaintiffs claim a lien upon the cotton and corn in controversy.

This clause, prima facie and presumptively, upon its face, in connection with the other facts of said mortgage conveying the crops of that year, would refer to the crop in after years grown on the same premises that the crop of 1903 was raised upon.

At the date of the execution of said mortgage Daugherty owned no land of his own, and was renting land upon which he was then cropping from said Hodges.

The cotton and corn to which the suit relates were raised by Daugherty in the year 1906,—three years after the crop which he was raising, in 1903, on land rented from Hodges,—and on land rented in 1906 from one W. C. Wallace. At the time of the execution of said mortgage,—February 18, 1903,—as appears and as stated, Daugherty not only owned no lands of his own, and had no others rented, but had no interest in the lands, by lease or otherwise, on which he farmed in 1906, which lands he afterwards rented from said Wallace, and on which the cotton and corn in controversy were raised. The defendant bought from said Daugherty, as is shown without conflict in evidence, the said 2 bales of cotton and 50 bushels of corn, part of the crop raised by him in 1906, on the Wallace lands, shown to be worth $100.

It may be stated in passing, that plaintiffs aver, "which said cotton and corn defendants sold and removed, or caused to be removed, beyond plaintiffs' reach, or caused the same to be so mixed with other corn and cotton as to be indistinguishable therefrom, by reason of which said unlawful acts of the defendants, plaintiff is prevented from enforcing his said lien thereon under his said mortgage."

Waiving, for the present, consideration of the question as to whether plaintiffs had a lien on said crops, it would seem that they were bound to make the truth of this averment in their complaint reasonably to appear. There is, however, an absence of any evidence in support of this averment; and from aught appearing, defendants had said cotton and corn, separate from any other, in the same condition as when they bought it, at the time this suit was brought and at the time of the trial of this case. No reason is shown for making it appear that plaintiffs' lien, if they had one, had been destroyed and could not be enforced. No facts or circumstances are proven, further than that they bought said property from Daugherty, which tend to show that defendants have done any acts with reference to the property in question; and the mere fact of their purchase, without more, was not wrongful as destructive of plaintiffs' alleged lien.

As to said alleged lien, in order to establish it, it is held that "while the thing itself need not have identity, or separate entity, yet it must, at least, be the product, or growth, or increase of property, which has at the time a corporal existence, and in

D.) 119 N. W. 1006, it was held that, under a statute which provided for the validity of mortgages upon property not yet acquired by the mortgagor, a mortgage given by a tenant upon crops to be raised by him upon land not yet leased would be valid if the mortgagor thereafter leased the land and raised the crop. While this decision is made to turn upon the statute, nevertheless, the language of the court indicates that it was more or less influenced by the fact that such mortgages have been upheld in equity.

In the following Alabama cases, the mortgages were upheld as being sufficiently definite; the language used in the instruments, however, clearly distinguishes these cases from the Alabama cases cited above.

Thus, in Keith v. Ham, 89 Ala. 590, 7 So. 234, the court said: "A valid contract for the rental of a given quantity of land out of a larger tract, or for the rental of one or another of several tracts, the particular tract or place to be thereafter selected by the tenant, or determined upon in any practical way, would carry such a present interest in the land, afterwards segregated and subjected to the contract, as would give vitality and validity, in equity, to a mortgage of the crops to be planted and grown thereon."

And in Cobb v. Daniel, 105 Ala. 335, 16 So. 882, it was held that a mortgage which conveyed the "entire crop grown by me the present year, or which I may aid in or cause to be grown, on my lands, or any other lands that I may cultivate, or aid in or cause to be cultivated," was sufficient to give the mortgagee a lien upon crops grown on lands which the mortgagor had previously rented.

Upon validity of chattel mortgages upon after-acquired property, see case note to Burrill v. Whitcomb, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451.

Upon the general question of sale or mortgage of future crops, see note to Dickey v. Waldo, 23 L.R.A. 449.

which the mortgagor has a present interest, not a mere belief, hope, or expectation that he will in the future acquire such an interest." Paden v. Bellenger, 87 Ala. 576, 6 So. 351; Alabama State Bank v. Barnes, 82 Ala. 619, 2 So. 349; Varnum v. State, 78 Ala. 30; Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 278; Mayer v. Taylor, 69 Ala. 403, 44 Am. Rep. 522; Grant v. Steiner, 65 Ala. 499.

"If a tenant should mortgage such crops as might be raised or grown by him on some indefinite place which he expected to rent, the conveyance would, we apprehend, be inoperative and void, as an attempted conveyance of a mere possibility or expectancy, not coupled with any interest in, or growing out of, property." Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 288.

"A mortgage of subsequently-acquired property, especially by general terms of description, which is not the product, increase, or accretion of something already owned by the mortgagor, amounts to nothing more than a mere agreement to give a further mortgage. It confers no specific lien on such after-acquired property." Christian & C. Grocery Co. v. Michael, 121 Ala. 87, 77 Am. St. Rep. 30, 25 So. 573.

In Karter v. Fields, 140 Ala. 364, 37 So. 207, in reference to the facts in that case, similar to the ones here, it was held: "Whether the mortgage of 1890 from Persall to Fields vested the latter with a lien on crops grown in 1893 depended upon whether Persall was the owner of the land on which the crops were grown in 1893, when he executed the mortgage in 1890."

Applying these principles to the case in hand, it would seem that, to create a lien on crops to be grown, the mortgagor must have owned or had some interest in the lands on which the crops were grown; and if Daugherty, in February, 1903, had no interest in the lands upon which the crops of 1906 were grown, at the time he executed the plaintiffs' mortgage,—and it is not pretended he had any such interest,—these plaintiffs had no lien on the crops grown in 1906, and would have no grievance against defendants, no matter what they did with the crops purchased by them from Daugherty. As to these crops, as was said in Burns v. Campbell, supra, the mortgage was "inoperative and void, as an attempted conveyance of a mere possibility or expectancy, not coupled with any interest in, or growing out of, property."

We find no error in the charge given for the defendants, nor in refusing the one requested by plaintiffs, which are the only errors assigned.

Affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Appt.,
v.

J. F. SANDERS.

(86 Ark. 353, 111 S. W. 454.)

Gambling — pool game — payment by loser.

1. A pool game in which a certain price per cue is charged for the use of the table, all of which is to be paid by the loser of the game, is within the statutes against gambling.

Gambling device — pool table.

2. A pool table for the use of which the loser of the game is, to the knowledge of the keeper, to pay, is a gambling device within the meaning of statutes providing punishment for one who exhibits such devices.

Case Note. — Effect of understanding that the loser is to pay for game to bring it within statutes against gambling.

The numerical weight of authority supports the conclusion reached in the above case that it is sufficient to bring a game within the statutes against gambling that the price therefor be paid by the loser. Accordingly, in the following cases, it was held that evidence that the loser of a game of billiards paid for the use of the table was sufficient to show the proprietor of the place guilty of keeping a gaming house: Crawford v. State, 33 Ind. 304; Hamilton v. State, 75 Ind. 586; State v. Book, 41 Iowa, 550, 20 Am. Rep. 609; State v. Miller, 53 Iowa, 154, 4 N. W. 900; State v. Leighton, 23 N. H. 167; Ward v. State, 17 Ohio St. 32.

So, in the following cases, it was held sufficient to convict one of gaming if it was shown that he and others played a game of pool, billiards, or ten pins, with the understanding that the loser should pay for the game: Hopkins v. State, 122 Ga. 583, 69 L.R.A. 117, 50 S. E. 351, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 617; Mount v. State, 7 Ind. 654; Alexander v. State, 99 Ind. 450; Middaugh v. State, 103 Ind. 78, 2 N. E. 292.

So, in State v. Records, 4 Harr. (Del.) 554, the defendant was held to be guilty of suffering a game of chance on which money was wagered to be played in his house, where it was shown that the compensation for the use of his bowling alley was made to depend upon the result of the game.

And in Blanton v. State, 5 Blackf. 560, it was held that the defendant was properly convicted of keeping a billiard table for the purpose of winning or gaining money or other property of value, where it appeared that he was a keeper of a billiard table which was rented to persons for a stipulated compensation per game, though he did not play on it himself for money nor allow others to do so.

So, in Texas one may be convicted of the offense of keeping a gaming table within the APPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sebastian County acquitting defendant of exhibiting a gambling device. Reversed.

Statement by Hill, Ch. J..

Sanders was indicted by the grand jury of the Ft. Smith district of Sebastian county for exhibiting a gambling device, contrary to § 1732 of Kirby's Digest. He was tried before the court without a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts: "Kelley pool is a game played on an ordinary pool table, with 15 pool balls, numbered from 1 to 15, inclusively, the players using ordinary pool or billiard cues, for driving the balls into pockets with a cue ball which is not numbered. Before the game is started, each player is given a small ball on which is a number, all such balls supposed to be numbered from 1 to 15, inclusively, just the same as the pool balls. The object of the game is for the player to pocket the ball on the table which corresponds in number with the small ball which he holds in secret, until he pockets his ball. If he pockets such ball, he wins the game. If some other player pockets the ball with this number, he is 'dead' and cannot win, and the only consolation which remains to him is to remain in the game with the prospect of killing some other person. Defendant has a license from the city of Ft. Smith to run or operate a pool room in the city limits, and does run and operate pool tables as set forth above, and that Kelley pool is played on said tables at times, and that other pool is played and the loser pays for the cues." The court found the defendant not guilty. The state moved for a new trial, and, upon its denial, brought the case here.

Messrs. William F. Kirby, Attorney

General, A. A. McDonald, William H. Rector, and Dan Taylor for the State.

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question to be determined is whether, under the facts, the game of Kelley pool is a game at which money or property may be won or lost; and, if so, if the table kept for it to be played on is a "gambling device" within the meaning of § 1732 of Kirby's Digest.

1. Similar games and similar statutes have been before the courts, and what has been said by them is pertinent here. In the case of State v. Book, 41 Iowa, 550, 20 Am. Rep. 609, it was said: "The defendant kept certain tables on which divers persons were in the habit of playing at what is called the game of 'pin pool.' That this play is a 'game' there is no dispute, and there is no controversy about the fact that, for the use of the tables and other instruments of the game, the defendant charged and required the players to pay a certain sum of money for each cue (whatever that is). When, therefore, two or more persons played this game, they became jointly or severally bound to pay the sum or sums of money chargeable therefor. It is plain that, if they play the game or games in order to determine which of the players shall pay the entire sum or sums which they would be jointly or severally bound to pay, they play for the sum each one would be bound to pay, and it does not change the matter that they play the game in advance of paying therefor. The principle is the same as if the money had been staked or put up before the game was played. It is gambling in the one case as well as in the other. Nor is it any less gambling that the meaning of the statutes of that state if it appear that he permitted others to play thereon and to bet the table fees. State v. Howery, 41 Tex. 506; Vanwey v. State, 41 Tex. 639; Tuttle v. State, 1 Tex. App. 364; Stone v. State, 3 Tex. App. 675; Hall v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 34 S. W. 122; Mayo v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 82 S. W. 515. And the result would be the same though he had paid the occupation tax on his table (Reeves v. State, 12 Tex. App. 199); but not if he did not know, or, by the use of reasonable diligence, might not have known, that the table was used by the players for gaming purposes (Wells v. State, 22 Tex. App. 18, 2 S. W. 609; Smith v. State, 28 Tex. App. 102, 12 S. W. 412; Berry v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 376, 92 S. W. 1081).

to be void because given in part for money won by gaming.

On the other hand, the opposite conclusion was reached in the following cases, holding that the mere fact that the loser of a game paid the charges therefor does not show gaming within the meaning of the statutes against gaming: Harbaugh v. People, 40 Ill. 294; Wakefield v. Com. 7 Ky. L. Rep. 295; State v. Quaid, 43 La. Ann. 1076, 26 Am. St. Rep. 207, 10 So. 183; Blewett v. State, 34 Miss. 606; State v. Hall, 32 N. J. L. 158; State, Breninger, Prosecutor, v. Belvidere, 44 N. J. L. 350; People v. Sergeant, 8 Cow. 139, People ex rel. Healey v. Forbes, 52 Hun. 30, 4 N. Y. Supp. 757; Steuer v. Royal Cigar Co. 17 Ohio C. C. 82.

In State v. Bishel, 39 Iowa, 42; Carr v. State, 50 Ind. 178; People v. Harrison, 28 How. Pr. 247, sometimes cited upon this question, the court expressly refrained from giving any opinion.

sum of money played for is small. To 'play at any game for any sum of money,' however small, comes within the statute." This was followed by State v. Miller, 53 Iowa, 154, 4 N. W. 900. In State v. Leighton, 23 N. H. 167, the court said: "The defendants in this case made a profit from the use of the billiard tables. For the 'hire' of them they were paid a shilling a game. The persons who resorted there played for the hire. In substance, they played for a shilling a game. The loser paid and the winner received the sum. By an understanding among the players the money won was to be applied towards defraying the expenses of the tables, but still it was money won at play, and upon the chance of the play." "Where a party keeps a billiard table, and permits persons to play upon it for 20 cents a game, to be paid by the loser of the game, he is guilty of keeping such table for gain within the meaning of § 8 of the act of March 12, 1831 [29 Ohio Laws, p. 443], 'for the prevention of gaming' . . . although such keeper of the table does not permit the players, as between themselves, to bet, and neither they nor other persons do bet on the issue of the game or games in any other manner than that the loser of the game should pay the 20 cents for the use of the table." Ward v. State, 17 Ohio St. 32. These cases were followed in Hamilton v. State, 75 Ind. 586; and the Missouri court reached the same conclusion in State v. Jackson, 39 Mo. 420. This is the general rule. See 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 889, and cases cited in note 1. There are some decisions to the contrary: People ex rel. Healey v. Forbes, 52 Hun, 30, 4 N. Y. Supp. 757; People v. Sergeant, 8 Cow. 139. The great weight of authority and the sounder reasoning, however, declare such games to be within the gambling statutes.

2. Therefore only the inquiry remains whether the keeping of this pool table was the keeping of a gambling device within the meaning of § 1732 of Kirby's Digest. This exact question was raised in Texas, and the court held that the keeping of such a table would not be keeping a gambling device unless the keeper of the table had knowledge, or might, by reasonable diligence, have known, that the table was used by the players for gaming purposes. Smith v. State, 28 Tex. App. 102, 12 S. W. 412. It is apparent from the statement of facts here that it was a part of the game, understood by the proprietor as well as the players, that the loser was to pay the tolls of the participants of the game. This made it a gambling game, and implicated all parties concerned. A gambling device is an instrumentality for the playing of a game upon which money may be lost or won; and the instrumentality is not necessarily intended solely for gambling purposes. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 684, 685; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 882-884. Certain gambling devices cannot be used for any other purpose, and, when designed for that purpose alone, they may be destroyed under the "burning statutes." Garland Novelty Co. v. State, 71 Ark. 138, 71 S. W. 257. But there may be gambling devices that are no less such, although not always so used, but which, from their nature, may be used for other purposes. State v. Lewis, 12 Wis. 435. Under a kindred statute the Alabama court said: "The statute is aimed at the use to which the table is appropriated. Any table used for gaming, without regard to its appliances or adaptation to any particular game, is included in the statute; and, if the defendant had the possession or custody of the table, authority over its use, and supervised the gaming, he was the keeper, or interested or concerned in keeping it." Bibb v. State, 84 Ala. 13, 4 So. 275. The pool table in question was adapted for games that were not within the statute, or for games within the statute depending upon the use to which it was put. In this case it was put to a use contrary to the statute, and, being exhibited for that purpose and maintained for his profit by the defendant, he is within the statute.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

As shown by the cases cited in the note appended to *Robison v. ERROR to the District Court for Reno County to review a judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover for the conversion of certain grain. Reversed.

Statement by Benson, J.:

R. F. Fleming cultivated wheat on lands rented from Dailey upon an agreement to deliver to the owner one third of the wheat when harvested and threshed, for the use of the land. Late in the fall of 1904, after the wheat was sown, he removed from the farm, leaving it vacant, to a place 12 miles distant. In December of the same year he gave his promissory note to the Citizens' State Bank for $213, secured by a mortgage on his share of the growing wheat, to be paid August 7, 1905. Fred Thorp was the cashier of that bank, and the land upon which the wheat was growing was conveyed to him by Fleming's lessor in November, 1904. On June 27, 1905, the wheat was ripe, and Thorp caused it to be cut and stacked, threshed a part of it and marketed two loads, about 114 bushels. Threshing was then suspended because of rain. Two weeks later, Fleming, after paying the note at the bank, demanded of Thorp two thirds of the money for the wheat so marketed, and was informed that the amount received was not sufficient to pay the expenses incurred in harvesting. He then told Thorp "to let the rest of the wheat alone," and Thorp promised to do so. No further demand was made for the wheat or its proceeds, and neither party did anything with the remainder of the wheat until the last of the threshing season. Then, when most of the machines had been "pulled in," Mr. Thorp caused it to be threshed, and placed in a bin with that remaining from the first threshing. Fleming then commenced this action for conversion of his two thirds of the wheat. In his answer the defendant pleaded good faith, based upon such reasonable apprehension of danger as would cause a reasonable man to act. The same conflict is noticeable in the later cases.

Thus, the mortgagee's right to take possession under a clause authorizing him to do so whenever he shall "deem it necessary for his more complete security" does not depend upon the fact whether or not he has reasonable grounds to believe himself insecure. Francisco v. Ryan, 54 Ohio St. 307, 56 Am. St. Rep. 711, 43 N. E. 1045.

But, on the other hand, it has been held that the discretion vested in a mortgagee of chattels by an "insecurity" or "danger" clause is not an arbitrary power, but one which must be exercised in good faith, with sufficient reason for so doing. Hogan v. Akin, 181 Ill. 448, 55 N. E. 137, reversing 81 Ill. App. 62; Nash v. Larson, 80 Minn. 458, 81 Am. St. Rep. 272, 83 N. W. 451; Feller v. McKillip, 109 Mo. App. 61, 81 S. W. 641; Brown v. Hogan, 49 Neb. 746, 60 N. W. 100; Allen v. Cerny, 68 Neb. 211, 94 N. W. 151; Meyer v. Michaela, 95 Neb. 138, 95 N. W. 63, 97 N. W. 817; Hawver v. Bell, 46 N. Y. S. R. 447, 19 N. Y. Supp. 612, affirmed in 141 N. Y. 140, 36 N. E. 6.

The right of a mortgagee to take possession of chattels at any time he shall "deem himself insecure" depends upon some act of the mortgagor done or threatened, tending to impair the value of his security. Brown v. Hogan, supra.

So, authority to take possession of encumbered chattels if he feels insecure, "with or without apparent cause," may not be arbitrarily exercised by a mortgagee, but must be based upon probable cause or reasonable 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

grounds for apprehension. Tanton v. Boomgaarden, 111 Ill. App. 37.

And the doctrine just stated was applied in First Nat. Bank v. Teat, 4 Okla. 454, 46 Pac. 474, to authority to take possession of mortgaged chattels at any time the mortgagee "deems himself insecure," without assigning any reason therefor.

And First Nat. Bank v. Teat, supra, was followed and applied in Brook v. Bayless, 6 Okla. 568, 52 Pac. 738, where a mortgagee was empowered, if at any time he considered the debt secured unsafe, or, from any cause, in his opinion, the security should become inadequate, to take possession of encumbered chattels.

But it was said in Sills v. Hawes, 14 Colo. App. 157, 59 Pac. 422, that the court would not go to the extent of saying that the mortgagee of chattels should be required to show there was actual danger of his security being impaired, but must show there was apparent danger, or that he had good reason to believe there were such grounds as a reasonable man might in good faith act upon.

So the reasonable grounds that will justify the exercise of such power need not consist of actual danger to the security. Hogan v. Akin, supra.

As it is incumbent upon the mortgagee, in order to justify taking possession under an insecurity clause, to show some ground for claiming he deemed himself insecure, when there is any evidence upon the subject, it is for the jury to determine whether he did in reality feel insecure, or whether it was a mere pretense, for the purpose of enforcing payment before maturity of the debt. Hawver v. Bell and Nash v. Larson, supra; Op- his right to one third as the owner of the land, alleged that the wheat was ripe and falling down, that the plaintiff neglected to cut and care for it, and that to preserve his interest as such owner, and to collect the amount due the bank under the lien of the mortgage, he had rightfully harvested the wheat. A copy of the mortgage was attached to the answer. After the suit was commenced, Thorp sold the wheat and deposited the proceeds in the bank. The wheat measured 508 bushels at the machine, and 489 bushels when marketed, amounting to $339.86. The expense of harvesting was $140, to which $13 was added for marketing the wheat, which was done after the suit was commenced. On the trial the defendant testified that he entered and cut the wheat to secure his own share, and to collect for the bank the amount due upon the mortgage. The evidence tended to show that it was then ripe and falling down, that the officers of the bank felt insecure, and that the president directed the harvesting to be done. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that he had made arrangements to have the harvesting done, but that he was informed by telephone that it was too wet to cut, and hence the delay. Both parties agree that when he made the demand, Thorp promised to let the remaining wheat alone. No reason was given why Fleming did not then proceed to thresh and market it, although he testified that, under his contract with the former owner, it was his duty to do so. The jury found for the plaintiff, and returned the following special findings: "(1) Did Thorp, at the time he entered upon the land and harvested the wheat in question, intend to convert the wheat to his own use, and to deprive the plaintiff of any interest therein? Answer. Yes. (2) Has the defendant, Thorp, at all times been willing to have an accounting between himself and plaintiff regarding said wheat, and to pay to plaintiff such sum or amount as would be found due him upon such settlement or accounting? Answer. No. (4) Did the witness, Soper, as president of the bank, caution Thorp, as cashier of the bank, to look after this wheat so as to protect the bank's interest? Answer. Yes. (5) Was Thorp, at the time he entered upon the land, and had the wheat cut, acting for and in the interest of himself as the landlord, or was he acting not only for himself, but also in

And it was said in Crowley v. Langdon, 127 Mich. 51, 86 N. W. 391, that the question of the mortgagee's good faith in taking possession under an insecurity clause is for the jury, where his security was not inadequate.

The following grounds have been held sufficient to justify the exercise of a danger or insecurity clause of a chattel mortgage: Absconding of a mortgagor, leaving the property unprotected (O'Neil v. Patterson, 52 Ill. App. 26); seizure of mortgaged chattels upon a distress warrant against the mortgagor (McCarthy v. Hetzner, 70 Ill. App. 480); refusal of an officer who had levied an execution upon encumbered chattels in opposition to the mortgagor's right, to let the latter into possession with him (Rosenfield v. Case, 87 Mich. 295, 49 N. W. 630); sale of a stock of groceries at the rate of ten to fifteen dollars' worth per day, where the margin of value of the stock above the mortgage is not great, if any at all (Stage v. Van Leuven, 77 App. Div. 646, 78 N. Y. Supp. 960); sale of a portion of the encumbered property by the mortgagor (Allen v. Cerny, supra).

So, the consumption of encumbered hay, corn, and oats by a mortgagor is a sufficient justification for the mortgagee taking possession when authorized so to do if the mortgagor should, upon any pretense, conceal, make away with, or in any manner dispose of the encumbered chattels. Mathews v. Granger, 66 Ill. App. 121.

Where, by statute, an execution against a mortgagor may be levied upon encumbered chattels, subject, however, to the mortga-gee's rights, a seizure and removal from the town in which the mortgage is of record, standing alone, will not justify taking possession by virtue of an insecurity clause, such facts not amounting to "just cause" based upon actual existence of facts constituting reasonable ground for believing himself insecure. Galde v. Forsyth, 72 Minn. 248, 75 N. W. 219.

But the grounds which will justify the exercise of an insecurity clause must arise subsequent to the date of the mortgage. Meyer v. Michaels, supra; Campbell v. Doggett (Miss.) 23 So. 371.

So, an attachment levy upon exempt chattels, which is released immediately after a mortgage is given thereon, is not sufficient cause to justify a seizure thereof by the mortgagee under an insecurity clause. Slingo v. Steele-Wedeles Co. 82 Ill. App. 139.

Although a mortgagee is authorized to take possession and sell mortgaged chattels at any time he deems himself insecure, yet he must exercise reasonable diligence; and, if he retains perishable property until maturity of the debt secured, he will be liable to the mortgagor for any depreciation in the value thereof between the date of taking possession and making the sale. Lomax v. Walk, 33 Or. 385, 54 Pac. 199.

The right of a mortgagee to sell before maturity of the debt, when possession is taken under a danger or insecurity clause, is frequently stipulated for in the mortgage, as in Schmittiel v. Moore, 101 Mich. 590, 60 N. W. 279, and Cole v. Shaw, 103 Mich. 505, 61 N. W. 869.

the interest of and for the protection of the bank, for which he was cashier, under the chattel mortgage which it held? Answer. For himself. (6) Did Thorp, at the time he entered upon the land and harvested the wheat in question, act in good faith, and believe that it was necessary for him to do so in order to protect his interests as a landlord? Answer. No. (7) Did the president of the bank (Soper) tell Thorp, cashier, before the wheat was cut, for him (Thorp) to protect the interests of the bank under the chattel mortgage, and to not let that wheat get away? Answer. Yes."

Messrs. Vandever & Martin for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. H. Lewis for defendant in error.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant claims that the findings are not supported by the evidence. There was abundant evidence that the wheat was ripe and falling down when defendant commenced to cut it. The defendant testified that he took possession and cut it for the bank as well as to secure his own interest. The justice before whom the case was first tried testified that Thorp swore that he took it under his lien, and the plaintiff's attorney testified that the defendant said he took it under the lease, but he also testified that he knew that the defendant had set up both claims in his answer, which were not withdrawn. In the light of this evidence, and the finding that the president of the bank cautioned the defendant to protect its interest in the wheat, it is difficult to discover any warrant for finding that the defendant intended wrongfully to convert the wheat to his own use. It is also difficult to see how the finding that he did not harvest the wheat for the bank as well as for himself is supported. His statement that the quantity sold was insufficient to cover the expenses appeared to be true, and no further disposition of the wheat was made until after the suit was brought. The plaintiff might have proceeded to market the remainder of the wheat, and take out his interest, and this we must presume was his purpose when he exacted from the defendant the promise to let the rest of it alone; or he might have allowed the defendant to complete the marketing, and then demanded an accounting; but, instead of doing either, he sued for conversion. The findings challenge a careful scrutiny of the instructions to ascertain if there was any error that would lead the jury to find as they did. The court fairly instructed the jury upon the right of the defendant to harvest the wheat, giving in substance the following instruction, requested by the defendant, excepting however, the words in italics: "If you find from the evidence that, at the time he entered and had the wheat cut, he was acting in the interest of and for and on behalf of the bank, as well as for himself, and that the bank deemed itself insecure, then his actions were rightful under the chattel mortgage, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, and your verdict should be for the defendant. In determining this last question it is wholly immaterial whether the bank had good cause to deem itself insecure or not." The proposition so refused was a correct statement of the law. Werner v. Bergman, 28 Kan. 60, 42 Am. Rep. 152. The mortgage contained the clause that if "the party of the second part shall deem itself insecure, then and thenceforth it shall be lawful for the said party of the second part, or its authorized agent, to enter upon the premises of the said party of the first part, or any other place or places wherein the said goods and chattels aforesaid may be, to remove and dispose of the same, and all the equity of redemption of the said party of the first part at public auction or private sale. . . ." Under this clause the defendant had the right to take possession if the proper officers deemed the bank insecure, and whether they had just cause for such belief was not an issue to be tried.

In the cross-examination of the defendant he was asked whether he had proceeded to advertise the wheat for sale by written or printed handbills. An objection to this question was overruled, and the defendant answered that he had not. This was an erroneous ruling. No demand had been made for such proceedings (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4253), and the mortgagee had consented to a private sale by provision in the mortgage. The finding of the jury that the defendant did not act in good faith in harvesting the wheat may have been, and probably was, influenced by this admission. The ruling of the court would naturally lead the jury to suppose that the failure to advertise was evidence of a wrongful purpose. In this erroneous ruling, in connection with the failure to give the instruction referred to, may, perhaps, be found the reason why the jury found, apparently against the evidence, that the defendant, in harvesting this wheat, intended thereby to convert it to his own use in violation of the plaintiff's rights, and not for the protection of the bank, or to protect his own interests as landlord. Errors not prejudicial to the rights of the defendant should be disregarded; but the reasonable inference from the findings, in view of the fact that there was little if any evidence so support them, is that the jury was misled thereby.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

HARRINGTON HOTEL COMPANY.

Contract — mutuality — statute of frauds.

Shipping a display cabinet which an hotel proprietor has contracted in writing to place on the counter does not make the contract mutual, so that it can be enforced against him, when not signed by the other party, where it was to run for six years, with a change of cabinet every two years, since the undertaking of the shipper is void under the statute of frauds.

(September 10, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for St. Clair County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to display an advertising cabinet. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Avery & Walsh, for plaintiff in error:

The proposal was accepted by furnishing the cabinet, and the defendant then became bound.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was tried before the circuit judge without a jury. At the request of the plaintiff the judge made findings of fact and law. The court rendered judgment for defendant. Exceptions were taken to his findings. The case is brought here by writ of error. The facts are not in dispute. The defendant delivered to the plaintiff a paper reading as follows:

Port Huron, 6-16, 1903.

In consideration of the Adams Advertising Agency of Omaha, Neb., supplying us with one of their ink well and stationary counter cabinets, like photo of Los Angeles, Mexican onyx & silver holding, etc., light, free of charge, we agree to place same upon our office counter and make it a permanent fixture thereon for a term of two years. We agree to keep said cabinet in good order, and refer our guests seeking purchases or professional services to the cards thereon whenever opportunity affords. This contract is made for a term of six years, with a change of cabinet each two years.

A. C. Stuart,

Manager, Harrington Hotel.

This paper was not signed by plaintiff, nor did he sign any other paper relating thereto. He solicited advertisements from the business men at Port Huron, which he expected to place in the cabinet, for which they were to pay him $318. The cabinet was shipped to the defendant, who notified plaintiff that it would not be received, and was subject to his order, and it was returned to plaintiff. Plaintiff claims he is entitled to a judgment for $318, the amount he would have received for the advertisements.

The court found that the cabinet was suitable in workmanship and in material, and was in full performance of the requirements of the agreement, but held that the agreement was unilateral, and the plaintiff was not bound by its terms. Counsel for plaintiff in error insist that "a promise upon a condition to be performed by the other party is a valid contract when the condition is performed. It is then clothed with a valid consideration which relates back to the promise, and it then becomes valid as an express promise. People v. Taylor, 2 Mich. 254. Want of mutuality in the inception of a contract may be remedied by subsequent conduct of the parties or by the execution of the agreement. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 115. . . . It is now generally held that if a proposition be made, to be accepted within a given time, it constitutes a continuing offer, which, however, may be retracted at any time. But if, at any time before it is retracted, it is accepted, such offer and acceptance constitute a valid contract. Cooper v. Lansing Wheel Co. 94 Mich. 272, 34 Am. St. Rep. 341, 54 N. W. 39; Miller v. Smith, 140 Mich. 524, 103 N. W. 872; Orr v. Kenny, 150 Mich. 159, 114 N. W. 228. . . . Where vendee accepts the proposal and pays money on it, the element of mutuality is supplied and the contract is binding. Mull v. Smith, 132 Mich. 618, 94 N. W. 183. In our case the expenditure of money on the cabinet and sending it to defendant supplies the element of mutuality." One trouble with this contention is that it overlooks some of the conditions stated in the paper signed by the defendant. It is stated therein that the cabinet shall be placed upon the office counter and made a permanent fixture thereon for two years. It is also stated therein, "this contract is made for a term of six years, with a change of cabinet each two years." It is apparent that the contract, if it is to be regarded as a contract, cannot by its terms be completed in one year. It is also evident that the change of cabinet each two years must be made by plaintiff, and yet he has signed no agreement to make said change. It is clear, we think, that the contract is void under the provisions of § 9515, Comp. Laws. 1897, because the agreement which is to be performed by the plaintiff cannot be performed in one year from the making of the agreement. See Wilkinson v. Heavenrich, 58 Mich. 574, 55 Am. Rep. 708, 26 N. W. 139, where there is a full discussion of the principle involved. See also Davis v. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. 127 Mich. 559, 86 N. W. 1021; Co-Operative Teleph. Co. v. Katus, 140 Mich. 367, 112 Am. St. Rep. 414, 103 N. W. 814; McIlroy v. Richards, 148 Mich. 694, 112 N. W. 489.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

DELIA V. MORAN

v.

DOVER, SOMERSWORTH, & ROCHESTER STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

(74 N. H. 500, 69 Atl. 884.)

Damages — negligent injuries — physician's services.

Direct evidence of the value of a physician's services in treating one injured by another's negligence is not necessary to authorize an allowance therefore against the person responsible for the injury, where the fact of his employment and the nature and extent of the treatment are shown, but the jury may fix the value from their own knowledge and experience.

Case Note. — Allowance for physician's services in action for personal injuries, without evidence of the value thereof.

It is agreed that in personal injury cases, if plaintiff is entitled to recover at all, an element of his damages is the necessary and reasonable expense incurred by him for medical treatment for the injury suffered. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 645. But there is a conflict as to whether such expenses should be considered by the jury in the absence of any evidence as to the value thereof.

A rule identical with that in the headnote to the above case was announced by the court in a short opinion, and without citing any authorities, in the recent case of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Stell (Ark.) 112 S. W. 876.

In Western Gas Constr. Co. v. Danner, 38 C. C. A. 528, 97 Fed. 882, the evidence tended to show that plaintiff's physician would charge $100 for his services, but there was no direct evidence as to the value of such services or the reasonableness of such sum. It was held that it was proper to submit this to the jury as an item of the damages for their consideration.

In Scullane v. Kellogg, 109 Mass. 544, 48 N. E. 622, it was held that although there was no distinct proof of the amount of the expenses for medical attendance, yet, in view of the evidence showing the exact number of times plaintiff was treated by the physician, the jury might allow a reasonable sum.

In McGarrahan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 171 Mass. 211, 50 N. E. 610, it was held not erroneous to charge the jury that: "There is evidence in the case as to medical attendance. Dr. Coxwell told you the number of visits he had made to the plaintiff for the purpose of treating him. There is no evidence as to what the ordinary charge for such a visit is. There is no evidence as to what the charges of Dr. Coxwell ordinarily are. . . . I must assume that you have some knowledge, in common with men in general, as to the charges ordinarily EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court of Strafford County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

Among other evidence offered by plaintiff, she proved that she had employed physicians to treat her for the injuries, and she also showed the nature and extent of the treatment, but no evidence was offered as to the value or cost of the services. Upon this state of the record defendant requested an instruction that there could be no recovery for medical attendance and services of physicians.

made by physicians for attendance and services such as you find, upon the evidence in this case, have been rendered, and you may avail yourselves of that knowledge for the purpose of determining what sum the plaintiff should have by reason of the expense he has properly and reasonably incurred in endeavoring to effect a cure."

In Farley v. Charleston Basket & Veneer Co. 51 S. C. 222, 28 S. E. 193, 401, the court said: "There was testimony to the effect that the plaintiff employed physicians who rendered him professional services for which the law implied a liability on his part for reasonable compensation;" and held that it was proper to instruct the jury that he was entitled to recover compensation for medical expenses.

A great majority of the cases have held, however, that there could be no recovery for such services without proof of their value and their reasonableness.

Thus, in Brown v. White, 202 Pa. 297, 58 L.R.A. 321, 51 Atl. 962, the court said that "the average jurymen is not a professional man, and is not presumed to know the value of such services;" and held that, in the absence of any evidence of the value of a physician's services rendered necessary because of a personal injury, or of what such services were reasonably worth, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything on account thereof.

In Cudahy Packing Co. v. Broadbent, 70 Kan. 535, 79 Pac. 126, it was held to be a matter of mere speculation, entirely unwarranted, to permit the jury to find the value of a physician's services, in a personal injury case, from the statement that they were rendered, accompanied by a statement, somewhat detailed, of their value and extent.

In Carter v. Nunda, 55 App. Div. 501, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1059, it appeared that from the time of the accident plaintiff was visited thirty-one times by a physician, but no evidence was offered as to the value of these services. It was held error for the trial court to call the attention of the jury to the number of visits made by the physician, and to state that the value of these services was a question for them to decide. The 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. Samuel W. Emery for defendant. Messrs. Kivel & Hughes, for plaintiff.

It is not necessary for a plaintiff to put in testimony as to the actual charges made for medical attendance.

Scullane v. Kellogg, 169 Mass. 544, 48 N. E. 622; McGarrahan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 171 Mass. 211, 50 N. E. 610; Hopkins v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 36 N. H. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 287; Holyoke v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 48 N. H. 541; Turner v. Boston & M. R. Co. 158 Mass. 261, 33 N. E. 520; Cornell v. Putnam, 58 N. H. 534; Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. 199; Bradford v. Cunard S. S. Co. 147 Mass. 55, 16 N. E. 719; Murdock v. Sumner, 22 Pick. 156; Clark v. Manchester, 64 N. H. 471, 13 Atl. 867; Huntress v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 185, 49 Am.

appellate court said: "There is no fixed and definite schedule of charges of which a jury make take judicial notice by which the value of professional services may be determined, and their value is not a matter of such common knowledge that jurors may be permitted to appraise the same unaided by other evidence."

In Gibler v. Terminal R. Asso. 203 Mo. 208, 101 S. W. 37, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1194, where there was no evidence that plaintiff paid anything for his physicians' services, and he testified that he did not know the amount of his doctors' bills, it was held that, although the evidence showed the number of professional visits made by the physicians, it was error to charge the jury that, if they found for plaintiff, they could allow him for any expenses incurred by him for medical attention.

In Nelson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 659, 88 S. W. 781, it was held that where the evidence failed to show either the amount of a physician's charge or the reasonable value of his services, there was an entire failure of proof of this item, and the jury should not have been permitted to speculate in an effort to award full compensation for actual damages suffered.

Where it is shown that services were rendered by physicians, but there is no evidence showing the value of the services or the amount of the expenses incurred therefor, it is error to instruct the jury that, in determining the damages, they can or should take into consideration such expenses. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Butler, 10 Ind. App. 244, 38 N. E. 1; Reed v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 23, 10 N. W. 285; Duke v. Missouri P. R. Co. 99 Mo. 347, 12 S. W. 636.

Where there is no testimony tending to show the amount of the charges made by the attending physician, or what such services were reasonably worth, it is error to submit this item to the jury, although it is shown that, on account of the injuries, the physician attended the plaintiff. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Garcia (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 713; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Craft (Tex. Civ. App.) 102 S. W. 170.

St. Rep. 600, 34 Atl. 154; Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. ed. 1028; Low v. Connecticut & P. R. Co. 45 N. H. 370.

Peaslee, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

So far as a fact in issue is one upon which men in general have "a common fund of experience and knowledge," the jury may use this information in making up their minds. 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2570. Such knowledge dispenses with the necessity for introducing evidence on the subject. It is also said that "the scope of this doctrine is narrow. It is strictly limited to a few matters of elemental experience in human nature, commercial affairs, and everyday life." Ibid.

It is apparent that the rule laid down cannot be applied with mathematical exactness. Upon the particular question involved in this case the courts are divided. A considerable number hold with more or less strictness to the theory that the value of the services of a physician must be shown by evidence. Brown v. White, 202 Pa. 297, 58 L.R.A. 321, 51 Atl. 962; Hobbs v. Marion, 123 Iowa, 726, 99 N. W. 577; Nelson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 113 Mo. App. 659, 88 S. W. 781; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Garcia (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 713. Compare with these cases the following: Kelley v. Mayberry Twp. 154 Pa. 440, 26 Atl. 595 (jurors allowed to estimate the value of a wife's services to her husband); Northern Texas Traction Co. v. Mullins, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 566, 99 S. W. 433 (jurors allowed to take into consideration the fact that future medical attendance would probably be necessary); Murray v. Missouri P. R. Co. 101 Mo. 236, 20 Am. St. Rep. 601, 13 S. W. 817 (jurors allowed to find the value of the services of a nurse, the measure being "their own knowledge and experience"). In other jurisdictions the rule is that jurors "have some knowledge in common with men in general as to the charges ordinarily made by physicians for attendance and services," and that they may avail themselves of that knowledge "for the purpose of determining what sum the plaintiff should have by reason of the expense he has properly and reasonably incurred in endeavoring to effect a cure." McGarrahan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 171 Mass. 211, 217, 220, 50 N. E. 610, 611; Scullane v. Kellogg, 169 Mass. 544, 48 N. E. 622; Feeney v. Long Island R. Co. 116 N. Y. 375, 5 L.R.A. 544, 22 N. E. 402; Western Gas. Constr. Co. v. Danner, 38 C. C. A. 528, 97 Fed. 882. The latter ruling appears the more reasonable, and is in accordance with the practice at nisi prius in this state. It would be difficult to conceive of a matter with which all men are more certainly called upon to deal than the employment and payment of a physician. Knowledge on the subject of doctors' bills is as general as upon almost any question of everyday life. If more satisfactory proof was available, it might have been produced by the defendant, had it not preferred to allow the case to rest here; and the fact that other evidence was not introduced by the plaintiff was legitimate ground for argument that probably the bills were of small amount. Boucher v. Larochele, 74 N. H. 433, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 416, 68 Atl. 870.

Exception overruled.

All concur.

And so it has been held although the evidence showed the amount charged by the physician, but did not show the reasonable value of such services. Bowsher v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 113 Iowa, 16, 84 N. W. 958; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Pereira (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 767.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Sampson (Tex. Civ. App.) 64 S. W. 692, it was held that proof that doctors' bills were incurred and paid would not authorize their submission as elements of damages to the jury in the absence of evidence that the bills were reasonable in amount.

In Schmitt v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 3 N. Y. S. R. 257, it was held error to admit the physician's bill in evidence, there being no proof that the bill had been paid or that the services were worth the amount charged.

In Schimpf v. Sliter, 64 Hun, 463, 19 N. Y. Supp. 644, it was held error to allow proof of the amount paid by plaintiff to his physician without showing the value of the services.

In Clarke v. Westcott, 2 App. Div. 503, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1111, affirmed without opinion in 158 N. Y. 736, 53 N. E. 1124, it was held that plaintiff could show the amount actually paid his physicians, but the court intimated that, in the absence of any other evidence as to the value of the services, a motion at the end of the case to strike out the evidence as to the bills and their payment should be granted.

In Wheeler v. Tyler Southwestern R. Co. 91 Tex. 356, 43 S. W. 876, it was held that where there was no proof of the value of the medical services rendered, or that the amount of the bill paid by plaintiff was reasonable compensation for such services, it was error to submit to the jury the question of the medical bill.

In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Kimbell (Tex. Civ. App.) 43 S. W. 1049, it was held that where there was no evidence as to the expense incurred by plaintiff for medical attention, it was error to charge the jury that, if they found for plaintiff, they should assess such damages as would compensate him for the expenses incurred in procuring medical attention.

In Houston E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Richards, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 203, 49 S. W. 687, it was held that no recovery for medical expenses was allowable where there was no proof of the amount of the outlay.

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Thornsberry (Tex. Civ. App.) 17 S. W. 521, it was held error to instruct the jury that they could award damages for expenses incurred, when there was evidence of protracted medical treatment, but no proof of any expenses incurred therefor.

In Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. v. Ison, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 219, 83 S. W. 408, it was held that where plaintiff had the services of several physicians, and the value of the services of one was shown, but the value of the services rendered by the others was not shown, it was error to instruct the jury, without qualification, to allow for medical attention.

In Fry v. Hillan (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 359, it was held that where the evidence showed that plaintiff had employed doctors for a long time, but there was no evidence as to the amount expended for such services, it was error to instruct the jury that they might find for the amount expended for medical attention.

In Scott v. Banks, 44 App. Div. 28, 60 N. Y. Supp. 397, it was held that where the evidence showed that plaintiff was attended by two physicians for a considerable period of time, but there was no evidence of the value of such services, the jury was not warranted in awarding damages for the same; and the court should so charge.

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Haynes (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 934, it was held that where there was no proof whatever of the amount contracted to be paid for medical services, and no evidence as to the reasonable value of such services, the jury should have been instructed not to allow any sum for such services.

In Joliet v. Henry, 11 Ill. App. 154, it was held that although it was proved that services were rendered by a surgeon, instructions given for plaintiff in relation to damages recoverable, which included "expenses incurred in being cured, if any," were erroneous, there being no evidence tending to show what amount was charged, agreed on, or reasonably deserved for such services.

In Bedford v. Woody, 23 Ind. App. 401, 55 N. E. 499, where but a small part of a physician's bill had been paid, and there was no evidence of the reasonable value of the physician's services, it was held not allowable to ask the physician, while testifying as a witness, to state the amount of plaintiff's indebtedness to him on account of medical services rendered because of the injury.

In Gumb v. Twenty-third Street R. Co. 114 N. Y. 411, 21 N. E. 993, it was held error to permit plaintiff to show how much his physician charged him, without giving evidence of payment, or any evidence of the value of the services except the incidental 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

remark of the physician, on the witness stand, that his bill was very small.

In Heater v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 90 App. Div. 495, 85 N. Y. Supp. 524, it was held that an estimate made by a country physician without accurate knowledge of the nature or extent of the services rendered was not adequate proof of the value of such services upon which to base a judgment for liability incurred therefor.

In Sotebier v. St. Louis Transit Co. 203 Mo. 702, 102 S. W. 651, it was held that where the injury is permanent, and the evidence shows that the character of the injury is such that plaintiff will probably need medical attention in the future, the jury may be instructed to allow such sum therefor as the evidence and facts in the case show would be just and reasonable for such services, although there is no evidence of the reasonable value thereof.

In Feeney v. Long Island R. Co. 116 N. Y. 375, 5 L.R.A. 544, 22 N. E. 402, where recovery was not complete at the time of the trial, the court said: "The nature and extent of the medical services having been proved, it was competent for the jury to consider the evidence in assessing the damages, and to award at least a nominal sum for professional treatment."

But in Page v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 34 App. Div. 618, 54 N. Y. Supp. 442, it was held that there could be no recovery for future medical services in the absence of evidence showing the character, probable duration, and value of such services.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

SARA V. TOMLINSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ARMOUR & COMPANY.

(75 N. J. L. 748, 70 Atl. 314.)

Appeal — demurrer — judgment.

1. A judgment in favor of either party, upon demurrer to a declaration, is a final judgment, reviewable on error.

Same — informal judgment.

2. The record returned to a writ of error, besides reciting the plaintiff's declaration and the demurrer thereto, set forth simply that the court below, having heard argument upon the demurrer and duly considered the Headnotes by PITNEY, C.

Case Note. — Liability of manufacturer, packer, or vendor to persons not in privity of contract, for injury from defects in article sold.

This note is confined strictly to contracts of sale, and therefore does not include cases involving the liability of those who have contracted to construct buildings, elevators, and the like, for injuries resulting to third persons from the contractor's negligence in same, did order that the demurrer be sustained, with costs; there being no more formal entry of judgment nor any award of a specific sum for costs. After joinder in error and argument of the cause upon the merits,—Held, that, for purposes of review, the judgment as returned was sufficient in substance, and would be treated as if amended in the court of review with respect to matters of form.

Same — joinder in error — effect.

3. The common joinder in error amounts to an admission by defendant in error that what is returned as the record of the judgment below is, in truth, the record thereof; so that, after joinder in error, neither party can of right allege diminution, or have a certiorari.

Same — ideo consideratum est.

4. The technical phrase ideo consideratum est is not necessary to constitute such a judgment as will support a writ of error. The want of this technical phrase, being a defect of form merely, may be amended, if necessary, in the court of review.

fulfilling his contract of construction. It also excludes cases involving the liability of druggists to strangers for injuries resulting from drugs or poisons sold by them, that question being discussed in the case note to McKibbin v. Bax, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 646.

As to the specific branch of this general question presented in TOMLINSON v. ARMOUR & Co. the liability of a packer or manufacturer of food to the ultimate consumer who purchased the same from a middleman, there is but little authority, as an extensive search has disclosed but three other cases involving that particular problem, and these are not in accord.

In Salmon v. Libby, McNeil & Libby, 219 Ill. 421, 76 N. E. 573, reversing 114 Ill. App. 258, a declaration was held to be good which set out a statute permitting a recovery for the death of a person caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, and which alleged that defendant negligently and improperly prepared and manufactured mince-meat so that the same became poisonous and destructive to human life when used as food; and that the plaintiff's testator, while lawfully partaking of the same, was poisoned and died in consequence thereof; though it also showed that the plaintiff's testator did not purchase the mince-meat directly from the defendant. The question of the liability of a packer to persons not in privity of contract with him was not discussed, as the specific objection to the declaration was that it failed to state the particular negligence complained of.

To the same effect is Craft v. Parker, W. & Co. 96 Mich. 245, 21 L.R.A. 139, 55 N. W. 812, which was an action to recover for injuries caused by eating spoiled bacon sold by the defendant to the plaintiff's brother, and in which the court, in reversing a judgment for the defendant, said that, if the defendant was negligent in selling meats that were dan-

Poisoned food — injury to consumer — liability.

5. A declaration setting forth that defendant was engaged in the business of putting up in tin cans or vessels, and vending, meats for food and domestic use, and did put up a certain can of ham for food and domestic use, which was sold by the defendant to a retail dealer, to be sold to customers and patrons; that plaintiff purchased said can of ham from said retailer for food and domestic use; that the defendant negligently put up in said can of ham diseased, unfit, and unwholesome ham, which was deleterious and poisonous to the human body and health; and that the plaintiff, without fault or negligence on her part, ate a piece of ham taken from said can, and in consequence thereof became poisoned and sick with ptomaine poison,—Held, to set forth a good cause of action, notwithstanding the absence of scienter.

Food — canned goods — duty of manufacturer.

6. Irrespective of the presence, or absence, gerous to those who ate them, he would be liable for the consequences of his act if he knew the meats to be dangerous or by proper care on his part could have known their condition. Here, too, the court refrained from any discussion of the question of the manufacturer's liability to third persons.

There is, however, a dictum in Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 52 Am. Rep. 715, 1 N. E. 154, that a caterer who furnished improper and unwholesome food, by which the guests of his customer were made sick, would be liable to such guests though he had no direct contractual relations with them. Upon the authority of this case, there is a dictum to the same effect in Lebourdais v. Vittrified Wheel Co. 194 Mass. 341, 80 N. E. 482. The first-mentioned case was, indeed, an action by a guest at an entertainment, but the guest purchased his ticket direct from the caterer, so there was, as a matter of fact, privity of contract between the two.

But in Nelson v. Armour Packing Co. 76 Ark. 352, 90 S. W. 288, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 237, recovery was refused to a purchaser from a retailer of canned meat against the packer of the same, upon the ground that, as the goods were purchased from a middleman, there was no privity of contract between the consumer and the packer, and that therefore no warranty of wholesomeness passed to the property from the packer to the consumer through the latter's vendor. The question of the packer's liability for negligence in the preparation of the stuff was altogether ignored by the court, though the plaintiff's complaint contained an averment of such negligence.

Passing now to the general question of the liability of a manufacturer or seller to persons other than his immediate purchaser, it may be laid down as a general rule, subject, however, to not a few exceptions, as will hereafter be seen, that a manufacturer or seller is not liable to those who have no of contractual obligations arising out of the dealings between manufacturer and retailer, and between retailer and consumer, the manufacturer of canned goods is under a duty to him who, in the ordinary course of trade, becomes the ultimate consumer, to exercise care that the goods which he puts into cans and sells to retail dealers, to the end that such dealers may sell the same to customers and patrons as food, are wholesome and fit for food, and not tainted with poison.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carrow & Kraft, for plaintiff in error:

The defendant owed a general duty to contractual relations with him, for injuries to persons or property resulting from negligence in the manufacture or sale of the articles handled.

A leading case upon this question is McCaffrey v. Mossberg & G. Mfg. Co. 23 R. I. 381, 55 L.R.A. 822, 91 Am. St. Rep. 637, 50 Atl. 651, in which it was held that the manufacturer of a drop press was not liable for an injury to an employee of his purchaser caused by the breaking of a part of the machine. The court divided into three classes, those cases involving the liability of a manufacturer to parties with whom he had no privity of contract, as follows: First, where the thing causing the injury was of a noxious or dangerous kind, upon the principle that one who dealt with an imminently dangerous article owed a public duty to all to whom it might come, and whose lives might be endangered thereby, to exercise caution adequate to the peril involved. This principle the court said could be supported on two grounds. (1) that of an illegal act, when, as in most states, there were statutory provisions imposing a public duty upon those who dealt with poisons and other dangerous substances like gun-powder, naphtha, etc.; (2) that of the duty which the law imposed upon everyone to avoid acts which in their nature were dangerous to the lives of others. The second class of cases was said to embrace those where the manufacturer had been guilty of fraud or deceit in selling the article, in which class the degree of danger in the thing itself might be less than in the first class, but where the seller actually knew the danger of the article and put it forth by some fraud or deceit. In such cases the breach of duty arose out of the fraud or deceit in the sale, and extended to persons injured thereby who might reasonably be deemed to be within the contemplation of the parties to the transaction. The third class of cases included those where there was no

the public, or a special duty to the plaintiff, not to put up in its cans diseased or poisonous meat.

Salmon v. Libby, McNeill & Libby, 219 Ill. 421, 76 N. E. 573, reversing 114 Ill. App. 258; Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455; Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. 124 Ga. 121, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1178, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157, 52 S. E. 152; Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 418, 52 Am. Rep. 715, 1 N. E. 154; Craft v. Parker, W. & Co. 96 Mich. 245, 21 L.R.A. 139, 55 N. W. 812; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 823; Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 457, 5 L.R.A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324, 10 S. E. 118; Styles v. F. R. Long Co. 70 N. J. L. 302, 57 Atl. 448.

Messrs. Gaskill & Gaskill for defendant in error.

Pitney, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error is brought to review a liability upon the manufacturer to third persons with reference to the sale or manufacture of a thing not in itself imminently or necessarily dangerous, though he had been guilty of negligence in regard thereto, upon the principle that as to such things there was no general or public duty, but only a duty which arose from contract out of which no duty could be owing to strangers. The court deemed the rule to be clearly established by the weight of authority that, where the cause of injury was not in itself imminently dangerous, or where it did not depend upon fraud, concealment, or implied invitation, or where the plaintiff was not in privity of contract with the defendant, no action of negligence could be maintained.

To the same effect is Davidson v. Nichols, 11 Allen, 514, in which the court said that it knew of no principle of law by which the seller of an article could be held liable for mistakes in the nature or quality of the article sold, arising from his carelessness or negligence, which causes injury to others than the immediate purchaser, where such article was in itself harmless, and there were no false or fraudulent representations on the part of the seller,—especially where he had no knowledge that the article was bought for a third person, or was to be used in such a way as might make it dangerous or injurious to persons or property.

And in Standard Oil Co. v. Murray, 57 C. C. A. 1, 119 Fed. 572, where recovery was refused to an engineer against the seller of oil purchased by his employer, for injuries caused by the oil not being of the quality represented, upon the ground that a breach of contract of sale could not be taken advantage of by a stranger to it, it was also held that the acceptance by the vendee of the thing sold, except under special circumstances, relieved the vendor from liability to a stranger for an injury resulting to the latter from the negligent manufacture or con-decision of the supreme court sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's declaration. The record returned by that court to the writ of error, besides reciting the declaration and the demurrer thereto, sets forth simply that the court, having heard the argument of counsel upon the demurrer, and having duly considered the same, did order that the demurrer be sustained, with costs. There is no more formal entry of judgment, nor any award of a specific sum for costs. Upon this record the plaintiff in error assigns error, in that the supreme court ordered that the demurrer be sustained, with costs, and decided that judgment should be given for the defendant, whereas judgment should have been given for the plaintiff. The defendant in error filed the common joinder in error, averring "that there is no error, either in the record and proceedings aforesaid, or in giving the judgment aforesaid;" and praying "that the judgment aforesaid, in manner aforesaid given, may in all things be affirmed," etc. The case has been submitted upon arguments addressed to the merits, without suggestion of a motion to quash, or other objection, based upon the want of a proper judgment returned. The question suggests itself, however, whether the record manifests a definitive adjudication against the plaintiff in error, which ought to be reviewed here.

The general rule is laid down in 2 Tidd's Pr. (3d Am. from 9th London ed.) 1141, as follows: "No writ of error can be brought but on a judgment, or an award in nature struction of the thing sold. The court laid down the rule that the duty owing to the public for a breach of which anyone injured might recover had respect to and was limited to instruments and articles in their nature calculated to do injury, such as were essentially dangerous; and that, if the wrongful act complained of was not imminently dangerous to life and limb, the negligent vendor was liable only to the party with whom he had contracted.

So, in Marquardt v. Ball Engine Co. 58 C. C. A. 462, 122 Fed. 374, recovery was refused for the death of an employee of the purchaser of a steam engine caused by the bursting of the fly wheel thereof, which was alleged to have been due to a defect in a valve. The court refused to accede to that doctrine which, applied to such circumstances, would impose upon the manufacturer or vendor the duty of ordinary care to make an article safe, and create a liability for an injury to a stranger due to the lack of such ordinary care and skill.

And in Loosee v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638, the manufacturer of a steam boiler was held to be liable only to the purchaser for defective materials, or for any want of care or skill in its construction, and, if the boiler, after having been tested by the purchaser to his satisfaction, and accepted by him, exploded in consequence of its defective construction, injuring a third person, the latter had no cause of action against the manufacturer because of such injury.

Attention should here be called to Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109, though it is not strictly in point in this note as it was an action against one who had contracted to supply and maintain mail coaches for the use of the Postmaster General, for injuries caused to a driver by a breakdown of one of the coaches. It is, however, a leading case upon the liability for negligence to those with whom the negligent person had no contractual relations, and one much relied upon by the courts in dealing with the liability of manufacturers or vendors to persons not in privity of contract with them. It was held that the driver could not recover, upon the ground that there was no privity of contract, though the declaration alleged negligence on the part of the defendant, and that there was a breach of its duty to keep the coach in a safe condition. But, since the negligence and the breach of duty were alleged to have arisen under and by virtue of the contract, the case was treated altogether as one arising out of the contract.

Upon this principle, recovery was refused against manufacturers or vendors in the following cases, for injuries to others than their immediate purchasers, caused by defects in the articles sold, the nature of which is parenthetically stated: Bragdon v. Perkins-Campbell Co. 66 L.R.A. 924, 30 C. C. A. 567, 58 U. S. App. 91, 87 Fed. 109 (saddle, though the seller knew it to have been purchased for the buyer's wife); Swan v. Jackson, 55 Hun, 194, 7 N. Y. Supp. 821 (ice box); Talley v. Beever, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 675, 78 S. W. 23 (gasolene "pear burner"); Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761 (lamp, though the seller knew it was to be used by a third person); Guinea v. Campbell, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 22 C. S. 257 (bottle of cream soda).

In the following cases, which also assent to the general rule that a manufacturer or vendor was not liable to those not in privity of contract with him, for injuries resulting from his negligence, unless the article was dangerous in itself, it will be noticed that the rule was further limited to cases where he was ignorant of the defective condition of the article sold, thus leaving the inference that, if he knowingly sold a defective article otherwise not dangerous to human life or property, he would be liable even to strangers to his contract of sale:

Thus in Heindirk v. Louisville Elevator Co. 122 Ky. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1103, 92 S. W. 608, it was held that the manufacturer of a machine not imminently dangerous to human life was not, in the absence of knowledge of its defective condition, liable for injuries which resulted from such condition, to an employee of the purchaser.

And in O'Neill v. James, 138 Mich. 567, 68 L.R.A. 342, 110 Am. St. Rep. 321, 101 N. W. 828, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 177, it was held that there must be a knowledge of the dan-of a judgment; for the words of the writ are si judicium redditum sit, etc. And hence it was formerly holden that a writ of error could not be brought before judgment given; and, if tested before, it was no super-sedeas. But it seems to be now agreed that a writ of error, bearing teste before judgment, is good, so as the judgment be given before the return of it; and this is the usual course for preventing execution, and the allowance of it may be served before the return of the writ of inquiry and final judgment. Still, however, if the writ of error be returnable before judgment, it may be quashed." And at page 1102 it is said: "If the writ of error be returnable before judgment is given, it may be quashed on motion. But, where the writ of error, on a judgment in the common pleas, was returnable in Easter term, and the costs were not taxed and final judgment signed until Trinity term, after which the defendants, in Michaelmas term, served the plaintiff with a rule to assign errors; and, the plaintiff having assigned them, the defendants, in the same term, joined in error, and, the case being afterwards argued, the judgment of the court of common pleas was reversed,—the Court of King's bench, under these circumstances, refused to quash the writ of error, on the ground that it was returnable before costs were taxed in the court below, and consequently before any judgment was given in that court; as the defendant ought to have applied to quash it, in an earlier stage of the gerous character of the thing sold before a seller can be liable to others than his immediate vendee; and that therefore a manufacturer of a champagne cider made by proper machinery and not excessively charged was not liable for injuries to an employee of his customers through the explosion of a bottle, unless he knew that for some reason such bottle was peculiarly liable to such accident.

And in Heizer v. Kingsland & D. Mfg. Co. 110 Mo. 605, 15 L.R.A. 821, 33 Am. St. Rep. 482, 19 S. W. 630, it was held that the explosion of a cylinder of a threshing machine by which a person engaged in operating it was injured would not render the manufacturer liable in the absence of any privity of contract between the manufacturer and the injured person, unless the former knew the machine was defective, though he was guilty of negligence in manufacturing and testing the machine.

And in Slattery v. Colgate, 25 R. I. 220, 55 Atl. 639, it was held that a barber who had purchased shaving soap from a dealer in barber supplies could not recover from the manufacturer for damages resulting to his business by reason of the maker negligently using in its manufacture an excess of a necessary ingredient of the soap, such as alkali, unless the manufacturer knew of the excess.

And in Corry v. Lucas, Ir. Rep. 3 C. L. 208, recovery was refused against the manufacturer of a boiler for the death of an employee of the purchaser, where it was not shown that the manufacturer was aware of any defects in the boiler.

In accordance with the principle to be inferred from the foregoing decisions, recovery was allowed in the following cases to strangers to the contract of sale, for injuries caused by defects in articles not otherwise dangerous, where such defective condition was known to the manufacturers or vendors when they sold the goods:

Thus, in Forgesen v. Schultz, 102 N. Y. 156, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 84 N. E. 956, it was held that, if the vendor of siphons of a rated water knew that the siphons were likely to explode when placed on the market, and he failed to apply such tests as would render it tolerably certain that they would not explode, he would be liable for an injury caused to a person other than his immediate purchaser. See, however, O'Neill v. James, supra, in which an opposite conclusion was reached as to the sale of a similar article.

So, in Holmvik v. Parsons Band Cutter & Self-Feeder Co. 98 Minn. 424, 108 N. W. 810, recovery was allowed for the death of an employee of a purchaser of a machine called a separator caused by the breaking through of the covering of the machine upon which the deceased was walking. The court said that, if the covering contained a board so obviously defective as to be in reason known to be such to the manufacturer, but not so as to be apparent to the vendee or the employee in using it; and if the employee, stepping upon the board with force, broke it,—there was negligence on the part of the manufacturer sufficient to make him liable for the death resulting therefrom. Whether the machine was inherently dangerous or not cannot be determined from the report of the case.

Upon the same principle, it was held in Skin v. Reutter, 135 Mich. 57, 63 L.R.A. 743, 106 Am. St. Rep. 384, 97 N. W. 152, that one who sold hogs known to him to have a dangerous and infectious disease committed a wrong imminently dangerous to human life, within the rule that one guilty of such an act might be liable for injury to life or limb thereby caused, even to persons not immediately connected with the transaction. It was further held that, if the hogs so sold communicated the disease to sound animals belonging to a remote purchaser, from which they died, the liability of the first seller was not destroyed by the intervention of another buyer between the first seller and the last buyer.

Whether or not ignorance of the defective condition of the article sold will excuse a manufacturer or vendor from liability to third persons, where, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, he might have become acquainted with the condition, the few authorities upon the question are not agreed.

proceedings,"—citing Denn ex dem. Nowell v. Roake, 5 Barn. & C. 735, note.

In Thompson v. Bowne, 39 N. J. L. 2, our supreme court, upon an examination of the record returned with a writ of error, concluded that no judgment had, as yet, been actually entered, and therefore dismissed the writ, as having been providently issued and returned; and this, although manifest error appeared in the proceedings. So harsh a practice ought not to be followed (especially after joinder in error and consideration of the merits), unless the state of the return clearly requires it; else a mere mistake in form, for which the plaintiff in error is not responsible, may delay the reversal of an erroneous judgment, or the affirmation of one that is free from error. And why should an erroneous judgment stand any the longer, because it adds informality to error? To so hold is simply to encourage loose practice in the entry of judgments.

In Cooper v. Vanderveer, 47 N. J. L. 178, it clearly appeared that the action in which the alleged error had been committed had not proceeded to its termination, and the supreme court properly dismissed the writ of error. Chief Justice Beasley, however, in delivering the opinion, employed the phrase: "A writ of error will not run until the conclusion of the course of law in the court of first instance."

But in Stein v. Goodenough, 69 N. J. L. 635, 56 Atl. 701, it was pointed out by this court that by the later English practice the writ of error was permitted to be tested be-

Thus, in Lebourdais v. Vitrified Wheel Co. 194 Mass. 341, 80 N. E. 482, the rule was laid down that a manufacturer of an article which he put upon the market was not ordinarily responsible in damages to those other than the immediate purchaser who might receive injuries caused by its defective condition, where he did not know of the same, though by the exercise of reasonable diligence he might have learned such condition. It was therefore held that a workman in a factory could not recover from the manufacturer for injuries caused by the bursting of a defective emery wheel bought by his employer, where he failed to show the manufacturer knew of the defect in the wheel when he sold it; and that it was not enough for him to show that the manufacturer sold the wheel in the open market without exercising reasonable diligence to discover whether it was defective.

So, in Berger v. Standard Oil Co. 31 Ky. L. Rep. 613, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 103 S. W. 245, in which the rule was enunciated that a stranger to a contract of sale could have no right of action for the breach of a warranty, as there were lacking privity, mutuality, consideration, and every other element essential to constitute a contractual relation between the parties, it was further held that an employee could not recover from the seller of unsuitable lubricating oil to his employer for an injury to himself by an explosion of the oil, if he was unable to show that the seller had knowledge of the dangerous character of the oil, or of such facts that he ought to have known of it.

But in Statler v. George A. Ray Mfg. Co. 125 App. Div. 69, 109 N. Y. Supp. 172, it was held that a defectively constructed steam boiler was an article imminently dangerous to human life; and that one who manufactured and sold the same with knowledge of its defective condition, or who could have discovered the same by the exercise of ordinary diligence, was liable for injuries caused by its explosion, to an employee of a remote purchaser to whom its defective condition was unknown, the defect being concealed so that it could not be readily discovered.

covered. See, however, Losee v. Clute and Correy v. Lucas, supra, where an opposite conclusion was reached as to injuries caused by the explosion of a boiler.

On the other hand, in Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 351, 1 Am. Rep. 543, recovery was refused to an employee of the purchaser of an emery wheel for injuries received from the bursting of the wheel, though the manufacturer was aware of the defect from which the accident resulted, and still further weakened the wheel by attempting to overcome the defect. But here the purchaser's attention was called to the defect and the attempted remedy, and the wheel did not burst until after it had been in use for over four years.

Turning now to those cases in which recovery was allowed against a manufacturer or vendor in favor of one not in privity of contract with him, for injuries resulting from defects in the article sold, a clear enunciation of an exception to the general rule is found in Weiser v. Holzman, 33 Wash. 87, 99 Am. St. Rep. 932, 73 Pac. 797, in which an employee of a purchaser of a bottle of champagne cider recovered from the manufacturer for injuries caused by its explosion, upon the ground that the stuff was imminently dangerous. The rule was laid down that one who sold to another an article intrinsically dangerous to life or health, such as a poison, explosive, or the like, knowing it to be such, without notice to the purchaser that it was such, was responsible to any person who, without fault on his part, was injured thereby. The court went on to say that this rule did not rest upon any privity of contract or contractual relation between the person selling the article and the person injured, but upon the principle that the original act of selling such an article was wrongful, and that the wrongdoer was therefore responsible to everyone for the natural consequences of his wrongful act.

And in Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 61 L.R.A. 303, 57 C. C. A. 237, 120 Fed. 865, Judge Sanborn said that, while it was a general rule that a manufacturer or vendor was not liable to third parties who had no contractual relations with him, for negligence in the manufacture or sale of the fore judgment entered, in order that it might operate as a supersedeas in cases where execution was forthwith sued out: that, even under this practice, the writ was good only provided judgment was given before its return, and if it was returnable before judgment was entered, it was quashed upon motion; and that this practice is prevalent in this state, and is recognized by that section of our practice act (P. L. 1903, p. 582, § 170) which provides that whenever any writ or other proceeding shall require the removal of the record of any judgment to any other court, the clerk shall record the judgment and the proceeding in the action in full. In Stein v. Goodenough we retained the cause, in order that the actual entry of judgment final might be procured, and the record then brought up by certiorari. But in that case the return showed that, although rules entitling the defendant in error to judgment had been entered in the minutes, no judgment had been actually entered.

The present case differs, for here the return discloses, not a mere minute or memorandum of the judgment that is to be entered, but the very entry of the judgment itself. The order sustaining the defendant's demurrer is certified to us, by the supreme court, as the record of the judgment called for by our writ of error. It may be presumed to have been entered in that form in the judgment book. Of course such an entry is informal. The technical and proper form of a judgment, sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's declaration, after re-articles handled, and that, if third parties, while using such articles for the purposes for which they were made or sold, were, without fault on their part, injured through the negligence of the manufacturer or vendor, there could be no recovery therefor because the makers or sellers owed no duty to strangers to their manufacture or sale,—yet an act of negligence on the part of a manufacturer or vendor which was dangerous to the health or life of mankind, and which was committed in the preparation of an article intended to preserve, destroy, or affect human life, was actionable by third parties who suffered from the negligence. Many cases were cited upholding this exception, in all of which the natural and probable results of the act of negligence—indeed, the inevitable result of it—was not an injury to the party to whom the sales were made, but to those who, after the purchasers had disposed of the articles, had used or consumed them. To quote from the opinion: "Hence, these cases stand upon two well-established principles of law: (1) That everyone is bound to avoid acts or omissions imminently dangerous to the lives of others; and (2) that an injury which is the natural and probable result of an act of negligence is actionable. It was the natural and probable result of the negligence in these cases that the vendees would not suffer, but that those who subsequently purchased the deleterious articles would sustain the injuries resulting from the negligence of the manufacturers or dealers who furnished them." It was also held that one who sold or delivered to another an article presumably not in itself dangerous, which he knew to be imminently dangerous to the life or limb, without notice of its qualities, was liable to any person who suffered injury therefrom, which might have been reasonably anticipated, whether there were any contractual relations between the parties or not; and that, therefore, if a manufacturer, without giving notice of its character or qualities, delivered to another a threshing machine, which at the time of delivery the former knew to be imminently dangerous to the life and limb of anyone who might use it for the purpose for which it was intended, such manufacturer was liable to an employee of the purchaser who sustained injury from its dangerous condition, notwithstanding the absence of contractual relations.

Sales of oils for illuminating purposes have given rise to the most numerous class of cases in which a manufacturer or vendor has been held liable to strangers to the contract of sale, upon the ground of the inherent danger of the article sold. A leading case upon this branch of the subject is Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co. 104 Mass. 64, in which it was said to be well settled that one who delivered an article which he knew to be dangerous or noxious, to another without notice of its nature and quality, was liable for any injury which might reasonably be contemplated as likely to result, and which did in fact result, therefrom to that person or any other who was not himself at fault. Recovery was therefore allowed against a manufacturer of naphtha for injuries caused, by its explosion when used in a lamp, to the property of one who purchased the same from a retail dealer, where it appeared that the manufacturer sold the same for the purpose of being retailed and resold to be burned in lamps, knowing it to be explosive and dangerous to life when so used, and knowing the purchaser's business to be that of a retailer and his purpose to retail and sell his naphtha to the public to be so used, and where both the retailer and the consumer were ignorant of its dangerous qualities. The court said that, under such circumstances, the manufacturer was guilty of a violation of duty in selling an article which he knew to be explosive and therefore dangerous, for the purpose of being resold in the market, without giving information of its nature, and was therefore bound to contemplate as the natural and probable consequence of the unlawful act that it might explode or ignite and injure an innocent purchaser or his property, and to answer in damages for such a consequence if it should come to pass.

So, in Waters Pierce Oil Co. v. Davis, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 508, 60 S. W. 453, a manufacturer of gasoline was held liable for the citing that it appears to the court that the declaration and the matters and things therein contained are not sufficient in law for the plaintiff to have and maintain his action thereof against the defendant, proceeds, in substance, as follows: "Therefore, it is considered that the plaintiff take nothing by his said writ, and that the defendant go thereof without day," etc. And there follows a judgment for costs in the following form: "And it is further considered that the defendant to recover against the plaintiff [mentioning the sum], for his costs and charges by him about his defense, in this behalf laid out and expended, by the court here adjudged to the defendant with his assent, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and that the defendant have execution, thereof," etc. Archbold's Append. 299.

But the technical phrase ideo consideration est is not necessary to constitute such a judgment as will support a writ of error. Den ex dem. Rutherford v. Fen, 21 N. J. L. 700, 702. Such a defect, being one of form merely, may be amended (if necessary) in this court. Appgar v. Hiler, 24 N. J. L. 808; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Toffey, 38 N. J. L. 525, 526, citing Hooper v. Lane, 6 H. L. Cas. 443, 476, 489, 501, 555.

The common joinder in error—in nullo est erratum—amounts to an admission, by defendant in error, that what is returned as the record of the judgment under review is, in truth, the record thereof; so that after joinder in error neither party can of right death of an employee of a purchaser resulting from an explosion of the gasoline, where it appeared that the manufacturer knew the dangerous qualities of the grade of gasoline sold, but they were unknown to the purchaser and his employee. The court said that there was a distinction made in all cases where the injury was caused by the sale and use of merchandise not essentially dangerous to human life and where it was caused by sales of merchandise inherently dangerous; and that in the last class of cases the law imposed a duty on the part of the seller to give notice to the purchaser of the dangerous qualities of the article sold, and, if he failed to do this, he would be liable for any injury which might reasonably be contemplated as likely to result therefrom to any person who was not himself at fault.

And in Riggs v. Standard Oil Co. 130 Fed. 199, it was held that a manufacturer who placed on the market an article which was dangerous, such as a mixture of kerosene and gasoline, under the name of one which was not dangerous, such as kerosene, was liable for injury to any person who might be injured by the use of it in the manner in which it was expected to be used, though that person did not buy directly of the one who put it upon the market.

And in Standard Oil Co. v. Parrish, 76 C. C. A. 405, 145 Fed. 829, it was held that one who supplied illuminating oil must have contemplated that it would be used in lamps in the household of the purchasers; and that, where the oil sold contained gasoline to such an extent that the mixture was liable to explode in an ordinary lamp, the first seller would be liable for an injury to a member of the remote purchaser's family, resulting from the oil being used in the ordinary fashion.

To the same effect were Ellis v. Republic Oil Co. 133 Iowa, 11, 110 N. W. 20, and Nelson v. Republic Oil Co. (Iowa) 110 N. W. 24, in which a manufacturer of oil was held to be liable for the death of a child caused by the explosion of what her father had purchased from a retail dealer for kerosene oil, but which was gasoline, or oil with which gasoline had been mixed in dangerous quantities.

And in Elkins v. McKean, 79 Pa. 493, it was held that a manufacturer of oil who sold his product as illuminating oil bearing a high and safe fire test of 110°, when in fact he knew that his fire test would not exceed 64° or 65°, thus making it a most explosive and unsafe oil for domestic use, could not plead the absence of privity of contract against one injured by its explosion.

Many of the cases involving the sale of illuminating oil or gasoline present the further element of a sale in violation of statute. And this would seem to be sufficient to render the manufacturer or vendor liable to strangers, regardless of the fact that the article was also intrinsically dangerous, as these cases appear to base their decision upon the violation of the law, rather than upon the character of the article sold.

Thus, in Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Deselms, 212 U. S. 159, 53 L. ed. —, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270, affirming 18 Okla. 107, 89 Pac. 212, it was held that the absence of any contractual relation between an oil company and a private consumer did not relieve the former from liability for injury sustained by the latter in using in the customary manner that which both he and his innocent vendor supposed was coal oil, and which the oil company, knowing that it contained gasoline, sold to such vendor as coal oil in violation of statute and with the expectation that it would be retailed to the public for domestic use as such.

And in Ives v. Welden, 114 Iowa, 476, 54 L.R.A. 854, 89 Am. St. Rep. 379, 87 N. W. 408, a merchant who filled a jug with gasoline for a customer without complying with a statute requiring such packages to be marked "gasoline," was held to be liable for injuries to a member of the customer's family which resulted when she attempted to use it believing it to be kerosene, upon the specific ground that the failure to label it as required by law was negligence per se.

And in Hourigan v. Nowell, 110 Mass. 470, recovery was allowed against the manufacturer of illuminating oil for the death of a purchaser from one to whom the manufacallege diminution or have a certiorari. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1174; Gilliland v. Rappleyea, 15 N. J. L. 138, 145. Indeed, the common joinder ordinarily concludes with a prayer "that the judgment aforesaid, in manner aforesaid given, may in all things be affirmed." And such is the prayer of the defendant in this case. It involves a clear inconsistency to admit the defendant in error afterwards to move to quash the writ of error, on the ground that no judgment has been returned.

It is true that, notwithstanding the parties may thus be bound by their admissions, the court of review is not restrained from looking into the record, and may of its own motion award a certiorari to supply any defects in the body of the record or in its out-branches. Such was the course pursued by us in the case of Stein v. Goodenough, above cited. But in the present case the judgment record, in the form of which it has been made up in the supreme court, and by that court returned to us, sufficiently imports a determination of the merits raised by the demurrer, and lacks only a precise ascertainment of the amount of costs. Of this imperfection defendant in error makes no complaint. If the judgment is to be affirmed, only defendant in error will be harmed by the omission of costs. If the judgment is to be reversed, because erroneous on the merits, the judgment for costs would, of course, fall with it. A judgment in favor of either party upon demurrer to a declaration is a final judgment, reviewable on error. Hale v. Lawrence, 22 N. J. L. 72, 80. Upon the whole, turer sold the same, where such oil was below the standard fixed by law, though the manufacturer was ignorant that it did not conform to such standard, or though an authorized inspector had said that it did so conform. The court said that it was not at all a question of diligence or good faith, but that the law proceeded upon the assumption that an ordinary purchaser at retail was not in a position to know whether the oil that he bought was such as the statute allowed to be sold; and that therefore the sale of such oils as were dangerous and unfit for ordinary use was altogether forbidden.

And in Stowell v. Standard Oil Co. 139 Mich. 18, 102 N. W. 227, in which recovery was allowed against the manufacturer of illuminating oil not up to the statutory standard, for injuries resulting to the daughter of a purchaser from the retailer from its explosion, it was held that the rule that the seller of an article of commerce not in itself dangerous was not responsible for injuries to a purchaser from his vendee resulting from defects in the article sold, which were unknown to the original seller, did not apply to the sale of adulterated kerosene oil in violation of statute. The court said that a recognized exception to the rule of non-liability to a remote purchaser existed in the case of the sale of an article dangerous in itself; and that the legislature of the state had recognized and treated illuminating oil not tested and shown to be up to a certain standard as a dangerous substance; and that one who sold it without inspection brought himself within the principle of this exception to the general rule as to the liability of manufacturers to strangers.

And the rule that, if one sells an article in violation of law, he will be liable to others than his immediate vendee for injuries resulting from the use of such article, would seem to be supported by Gartin v. Meredith, 153 Ind. 16, 53 N. E. 936, which was an action against one who had negligently and unlawfully sold cartridges to a minor, for injuries afterwards resulting to another minor, caused by the discharge of a gun containing one of the cartridges while held by the purchaser. It is true that a complaint alleging these facts was held to be bad because freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was not alleged; but the language of the court would lead one to infer that such facts would have shown a cause of action had the complaint contained an averment as to the lack of contributory negligence.

So, where a manufacturer put upon the market stove polish composed of such inflammable and dangerous materials as rendered it liable to combustion or explosion when applied to the use for which it was intended, he would be liable for the death of one caused by its ignition when being used, though she purchased it from a retail dealer to whom the manufacturer sold it (Wolcho v. Rosenbluth [Conn.] 71 Atl. 566); as he would also be liable for injuries to a purchaser of such stuff from a retail dealer, though the latter knew of its dangerous nature and sold it without a warning (Clement v. Crosby & Co. 148 Mich. 293, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, 111 N. W. 745).

And Favo v. Remington Arms Co. 67 App. Div. 414, 73 N. Y. Supp. 788, appeal dismissed in 173 N. Y. 600, 66 N. E. 1107, would seem, also, to support the general rule that a manufacturer or dealer in dangerous articles intended for use, such as a gun, would be liable for damages to a purchaser other than his immediate vendee, resulting from negligence in using defective materials, or from the want of proper care and skill in the manufacture, though the plaintiff was denied recovery because he failed to show negligence on the part of the defendant.

So, in Keep v. National Tube Co. 154 Fed. 121, there was held to be a right of action against the manufacturer of a carbonic-acid-gas cylinder, for the death of an employee of the purchaser, where it appeared that the cylinder, because of its defective manufacture, exploded and killed such employee when it was applied to the only use for which it was made, upon the ground that the manufacturer of the thing which, when applied to its intended use, became dangerous, was liable in damages to anyone who, without fault therefore, we see nothing in the exigencies of the present case to require that decision be delayed in order to enable the supreme court to perfect its judgment record, and return the perfected record to us pursuant to a certiorari. For the purposes of review we consider the judgment, as returned, sufficient in substance, and will treat it as if amended in this court with respect to the mere matter of form.

We proceed, therefore, to consider the case upon its merits. The plaintiff's declaration sets forth that the defendant was engaged in the business of putting up in tin cans or vessels, and vending, meats or ham for food and domestic use, and did put up a certain can of ham for food and domestic use which was sold by the defendant to a retail dealer, to be sold to customers and patrons; that plaintiff purchased said can of ham from said retailer for food and domestic use; that the defendant "so carelessly, negligently, recklessly, and improperly put up, in said can of ham, diseased, unfit, and unwholesome pork or ham, which was deleterious and poisonous to the human body and health; that the plaintiff, after purchasing said can of ham, and without fault or negligence on her part, ate a piece of ham taken from said can, and, in consequence thereof, became poisoned and sick with ptomaine poison." Defendant's demurrer raised certain formal objections that, under the old practice, could have been raised only by special demurrer, and are now available only on motion to strike out. Central R. Co. v. Van Horn, 38 N.

A manufacturer or vendor may also become liable to strangers to the contract of sale if he induced the first sale by false representations as to the quality of the article sold. Thus, in Lewis v. Terry, 111 Cal. 39, 31 L.R.A. 220, 52 Am. St. Rep. 146, 43 Pac. 398, it was held that one who sold a folding bed representing it to be safe for use when he knew it to be dangerous was liable for injuries caused by the defects in the bed, to any person who used it, though there was no privity of contract between them. It was admitted to be the general rule that, if a tradesman sold and furnished for use an article actually unsound and dangerous, but which he believed to be safe and warranted accordingly, he was not liable for injuries resulting from its defective or unsafe condition, to a person who was neither a party to the contract with him nor one for whose benefit the contract was made. As to the contention that such bed was not ordinarily a dangerous article, the court said that this would seem to enhance the wrong of representing the bed to be safe for use when known to be really unsafe, for the danger was thus rendered more insidious.

Attention should here be called to King v. Creekmore, 117 Ky. 172, 77 S. W. 689, in which Lewis v. Terry, supra, was said by the Kentucky court, in Simons v. Gregory, 120 Ky. 116, 85 S. W. 751, to be approved, though in that case the court, after citing Lewis v. Terry, to the effect that one who sold an article which he knew to be dangerous committed a wrong independent of the contract, and was liable to any person not himself at fault, for injury resulting therefrom, used the following language: "We do not express any opinion on the question."

So, in Woodward v. Miller, 119 Ga. 618, 64 L.R.A. 932, 100 Am. St. Rep. 188, 46 S. E. 847, the manufacturer of a buggy, who sold it to a municipal corporation for the use of an employee of the latter, representing it to be strong and in good condition, but knowing that it was in fact defective, the defect being so concealed that it could not be detected, was held to be liable in damages to the person whose use of the buggy was contemplated at the time of the sale, for injuries caused by such defect, though there was no privity of contract between the two.

And in Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co., 124 Ga. 121, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1178, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157, 52 S. E. 152, it was held that a manufacturer who made a bottle of soda water for public consumption, representing it to be harmless and refreshing, was under a legal duty not negligently to allow foreign substances dangerous to the human stomach, such as bits of broken glass, to be present in a bottle of the stuff when it was placed on sale; and that one who, relying on this obligation, purchased a bottle from a merchant to whom the manufacturer sold it, and, without negligence on his part swallowed several pieces of glass while drinking the beverage from the bottle, would have a right to recover against the manufacturer for injuries sustained in consequence.

In State use of Hartlove v. M. Fox & Son, 79 Md. 514, 24 L.R.A. 679, 47 Am. St. Rep. 424, 29 Atl. 601, the rule was laid down that the sale, by false representations to innocent purchasers, of property known to the seller to be imminently dangerous to human beings and likely to cause them injury, rendered the seller liable for resulting injury, not only to the purchaser, but to such persons as might, in the ordinary course of events, be called upon to take charge of the property for him. It was accordingly held that, where one falsely sold a horse which he knew had glanders, to a purchaser who was ignorant of the fact, the seller would be liable for the death of a third person who contracted the disease while in charge of the horse for the purchaser, if such death was the natural and probable consequence of contact with the horse.

This principle of false representations as to an article sold by him making a manufacturer or vendor liable even to those with whom he was not in privity of contract was carried still farther in Cunningham v. C. R. Pease House Furnishing Co. 74 N. H. 435, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 124 Am. St. Rep. 979, 69 Atl.

The only question properly raised by the demurrer is whether, upon the facts stated in the declaration, and in the absence of scienter, there is a liability on the part of the defendant. The supreme court held there was none; and this, upon the ground that at common law, upon a sale of food or provisions, by a manufacturer to a dealer, there is no implied warranty of wholesomeness, and that, assuming a different rule exists in the case of a sale by such dealer to a consumer, yet the consumer, in the absence of a statute, cannot hold the manufacturer or original vendor to a higher degree of duty than that cast upon him by common law with respect to his own vendee. In our opinion the supreme court erred in making the question of defendant's liability turn upon the existence or nonexistence of a warranty. Whether a warranty be express or implied, it is a matter of contract, rendering the maker liable in case of breach, notwithstanding he used all care to prevent a breach, but rendering him liable in ordinary circumstances only to the party with whom he contracted, or to others for whose benefit the contract was made. Assuming (without deciding) that there is no implied warranty, on the part of 120, in which a merchant selling stove blacking which he negligently represented to be intended for stoves, and to work the better the warmer the stove, was held to be liable to a member of the purchaser's family who was injured by the blacking exploding while being used on a warm stove, though he honestly believed his representation to be true.

On the other hand, in Wells v. Cook, 16 Ohio St. 67, 88 Am. Dec. 436, in which it appeared that the owner of certain sheep apparently sound and healthy, and which he represented so to be, though he knew they were diseased with a contagious malady, sold them to an agent who avowed the purpose of mingling them with a larger herd belonging to his principal, which was done, and, in consequence of which, the united herd was infected; and the agent, who, with his principal, was still unaware of the existence of the disease, bought the united herd from the principal on his own account and suffered further damages from the spread of the disease,—it was held that the representations made by the original seller, not having been made to the last purchaser to induce him to act upon them in any manner affecting his own interests, gave him no right of action against the original seller for the deceit.

And in Carter v. Harden, 78 Me. 528, 7 Atl. 392, the seller of a horse which he falsely represented to be a kind animal and a good family horse, though he knew it was vicious, was held not to be liable because of his false representations, at the suit of the purchaser and his wife for an injury to the wife caused by the horse running away, where the seller did not know that the horse was purchased for the use of the wife.

Attention may here be called to Langridge v. Levy, 2 Mees. & W. 519, in which recovery was allowed to the son of the purchaser of a gun against a seller who knowingly made false representations as to its manufacture, excellence, and safety, apparently upon the ground, however, that, as the defendant had sold the gun knowing that it was to be used by the purchaser's son, the plaintiff was actually a party to the contract of sale. This interpretation would 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

also seem to be supported by the result on appeal in 4 Mees. & W. 337, where the judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed upon that portion of the opinion of the lower court which stated that, as there was fraud, and damage resulted from that fraud, not from an act remote and consequential, but one contemplated by the defendant at the time as one of its results, he who was guilty of the fraud was responsible to the injured party.

And these false representations which would make a manufacturer or vendor liable to strangers for injuries caused by articles sold by them need not, it seems, be expressed in language.

Thus, in Kuelling v. Roderick Lean Mfg. Co. 183 N. Y. 78, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 303, 111 Am. St. Rep. 691, 75 N. E. 1098, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas 124, reversing 88 App. Div. 309, 84 N. Y. Supp. 622, it was held that the manufacturer of a road roller, who wilfully and fraudulently placed therein defective materials which he concealed by putty and paint, was liable for injuries thereby caused to one who put it to its intended use, though it passed through the hands of wholesale and retail dealers, so that there was no privity of contract between the manufacturer and the person injured. The court said that there were here not only fraudulent deceit and concealment, but what also amounted to an affirmative representation that the roller was sound, as the manufacturer, by so concealing the defects that no weakness could be detected, must be held to have represented the roller to be in a perfectly marketable condition.

And in Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. 49 Minn. 331, 15 L.R.A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103, the manufacturer of a stepladder made of poor, cross-grained and decayed lumber, but so varnished, oiled, and painted that the defects could not be discovered, thereby rendering it dangerous to the life or limb of anyone using it, was held to be liable to the employee of one who purchased it from a middleman. The court laid down the rule that a manufacturer of an article not ordinarily dangerous, which was put upon the market for sale and for the manufacturer of canned food, that the goods shall be wholesome and fit to be eaten, it by no means follows from this that there is no duty resting upon the manufacturer to exercise care that the contents of the cans, which it puts upon the market to be sold for food and domestic use, are, in fact, food, rather than poison.

In this state we have repeatedly held that, where a duty arises solely out of a contract, no one can bring an action for its breach unless he be a party to the contract, or one for whose benefit it is made. Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. L. 19; Styles v. F. R. Long Co. 67 N. J. L. 413, 417, 51 Atl. 710, same case at a later stage, 70 N. J. L. 301, 57 Atl. 448; Conklin v. R. P. & J. H. Staats, 70 N. J. L. 773, 59 Atl. 144. But in these cases liability was denied upon the ground that, aside from the contract, there was no duty ultimate use, and which was so negligently made that it thereby became obviously dangerous to the life or limb of anyone using it, would be liable for injuries caused by such negligence, to one into whose hands the dangerous article came for use in the usual course of business, even though there were no contractual relations between the injured person and the manufacturer, if the latter knew of such defects, and knew the same were concealed and were not likely to be discovered by anyone using the article.

Upon the same principle, it was held in Pierce v. C. H. Bidwell Thresher Co. 153 Mich. 323, 116 N. W. 1104, that, if one engaged in the business of manufacturing goods not ordinarily of a dangerous nature, which were to be put upon the market for sale, so negligently constructed an article that, by reason of such negligence, it would obviously endanger the life or limb of anyone who might use it; and if the manufacturer, knowing of such defect and knowing that the same was so concealed that it was not likely to be discovered, sold the article without notice of such dangerous condition, he would be liable for injuries caused by such negligence, to anyone into whose hands the dangerous article might come for use in the usual course of business, even though there were no contractual relations between the injured party and the manufacturer. Recovery was therefore allowed to an employee of the purchaser of a threshing machine for injuries sustained by falling through the deck of the machine, where it appeared that the deck was fastened by a cleat in which were driven several fourpenny nails upwards, which condition rendered the machine dangerous to life and limb to those who might operate it, and was so concealed by the manufacturer that it could not be readily discovered.

The principles of law here discussed, that a manufacturer or vendor will not ordinarily be liable for injuries resulting from the defective condition of the articles sold by him to strangers to the contract of sale, unless the articles were inherently dangerous to life and property, are supported by dicta in the following decisions, in many of which the several cases above reviewed were cited with approval: National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621; Goodlander Mill Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 27 L.R.A. 583, 11 C. C. A. 253, 24 U. S. App. 7, 63 Fed. 400; Binford v. Johnston, 82 Ind. 426, 42 Am. Rep. 508; Daugherty v. Herzog, 145 Ind. 253, 32 L.R.A. 837, 57 Am. St. Rep. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

204, 44 N. E. 457; Simons v. Gregory, 120 Ky. 116, 85 S. W. 761; Kahl v. Love, 37 N. J. L. 5; Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. L. 19; Albany v. Cunliff, 2 N. Y. 165; Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co. 56 N. Y. 124, 15 Am. Rep. 387; Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311; Wyllie v. Palmer, 137 N. Y. 248, 19 L.R.A. 285, 33 N. E. 381; Burke v. De Castro & D. Sugar Ref. Co. 11 Hun. 354; Glenn v. Winters, 17 Misc. 597, 40 N. Y. Supp. 659; Bailey v. Northwestern Ohio Natural Gas Co. 4 Ohio C. C. 471; Curtin v. Somerset, 140 Pa. 70, 12 L.R.A. 322, 23 Am. St. Rep. 220, 21 Atl. 244; Zieman v. Kieckhefer Elevator Mfg. Co. 90 Wis. 497, 63 N. W. 1021; Collis v. Selden, L. R. 3 C. P. 495; Earl v. Lubbock [1905] 1 K. B. 253, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 755.

And in Kahner v. Otis Elevator Co. 96 App. Div. 169, 89 N. Y. Supp. 185, affirmed without opinion in 183 N. Y. 512, 76 N. E. 1097, there is a dictum that, if a machine not in itself inherently dangerous was made so by the negligence of the manufacturer having notice and knowledge that it was to be used by others than the purchaser, and an injury resulted to one other than the purchaser, directly traceable to that negligence, such manufacturer was liable to the person injured because of that negligence.

Attention should finally be called to two cases in which recovery was refused to strangers to a contract of sale for injuries caused by defects in the thing sold, but upon grounds not material to the question here discussed.

In Marples v. Standard Oil Co. 71 N. J. L. 352, 59 Atl. 32, a demurrer was sustained to a declaration which alleged that the plaintiff, while in a certain store, was injured by the explosion of gas generated from gasoline supplied by the defendant in a tank in the cellar of such store, instead of petroleum or crude oil theretofore furnished, upon the ground that the declaration failed to show that there was any duty upon the defendant to furnish petroleum or crude oil, or that it did not change the supply at the request of the proprietor of the store.

And in Empire Laundry Machinery Co. v. Brady, 164 Ill. 58, 45 N. E. 486, recovery was denied to the employee of a purchaser of a laundry wringer for injuries caused by its improper construction, where it appeared that, after delivery and acceptance thereof by the purchaser, the manufacturer was again put in charge to make alterations, the case being treated as if the machine had never been actually sold.

incumbent upon the defendant. In the case in 46 N. J. L. 19, Ward was subject to a contractual obligation to build a bridge in accordance with his contract, and was under no other duty. The contract was subject to modification and waiver as between the parties. In the Styles Case, as reported in 67 N. J. L. 413, 417, 51 Atl. 710, it appeared that the trial judge had submitted to the jury the contractual obligation to light the footbridge, arising out of defendant's agreement with the board of freeholders as forming in and of itself a sufficient basis for imposing upon the defendant the duty of exercising care towards the public, for breach of which duty the plaintiff, as one of the public, could maintain an action of tort; and that the stipulations of the contract were adopted as the sole criterion for determining what precautions were necessary to be taken by the defendant in order to fulfil the duty in question. It was held by the supreme court that this was error. In the case, in 70 N. J. L. 301, 57 Atl. 448, it was held by this court that the contractual obligation created no liability toward the traveling public, and that the Long Company was not liable under the doctrine of invitation, because it was the county authorities who had invited the public to use the bridge, and not the bridge builder. In Conklin v. R. P. & J. H. Staats the scow that was damaged was berthed by the defendant at a place where there was a submerged pile, upon which the plaintiff's scow was impaled when the tide fell. There was no notice to the defendant of the existence of the submerged pile, but, because defendant had contracted with a third party to remove all old piles, it was contended that it thereby came under a general duty to the public, including the plaintiff. This court held that the plaintiff, not being a party to that contract, could not maintain an action of tort in respect to the breach of a duty that arose solely from its provisions.

In Styles v. F. R. Long Co. 70 N. J. L. 302, 57 Atl. 448, Mr. Justice Swayze, speaking for this court, cited some distinguishable cases, where the existence of the contract creates a situation that subjects the parties to duties that are independent of the obligation to perform the contract, instancing the duty of carriers of passengers (Marshall v. York, N. & B. R. Co. 11 C. B. 655), the duty of a vender of drugs (Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455), the duty of the vender of a gun to a person for whom it was bought (Langridge v. Levy, 2 Mees. & W. 519, 4 Mees. & W. 337), the duty of a person who participates in the management of a highly dangerous agency (Van Winkle v. American Steam Boiler Co. 52 N. J. L. 240, 19 Atl. 472), the duty of a county clerk under the statute in canceling a mortgage (Appleby v. State, 45 N. J. L. 161), as cases where the duty was held to be a positive duty, independent of the contract although arising out of a state of facts created by the contract.

Coming, then, to consider the facts of the present case as averred in the declaration, and dealing with them, irrespective of the presence or absence of contractual obligations arising out of the dealings between manufacturer and retailer and between retailer and consumer, the question is whether the manufacturer is under a duty to him who, in the ordinary course of trade, becomes the ultimate consumer, to exercise care that the goods which he puts into cans and sells to retail dealers, to the end that such dealers may sell the same to customers and patrons as food, are wholesome and fit for food, and not tainted with poison. Canned goods are, at the present day, in such common use that we may judicially recognize that the contents are sealed up, not open to the inspection or test, either of the retailer, or of the customer, until they are opened for use; and not then susceptible to practical test, except the test of eating. When the manufacturer puts the goods upon the market in this form for sale and consumption he, in effect, represents to each purchaser that the contents of the can are suited to the purpose for which it is sold, the same as if an express representation to that effect were imprinted upon a label. Under these circumstances, the fundamental condition upon which the common-law doctrine of caveat emptor is based—that the buyer should “look out for himself”—is conspicuously absent; for he has no opportunity to look out for himself. And when he thus buys and eats the contents of the package, relying upon the assurance of the manufacturer that they are fit to be eaten, it seems to us to result from general and fundamental principles that he has a right to insist that the manufacturer shall at least exercise care that they are so fit, and are not wholesome and poisonous.

Among the most fundamental of personal rights, without which man could not live in a state of society, is the right of personal security, including the “preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it” (1 Bl. Com. 129, 134)—a right recognized, needless to say, in almost the first words of our written Constitution (Const. art. 1. §1). To assert, therefore, that one living in a state of society, organized, as ours is, according to the principles of the common law, need not be careful that his acts do not endanger the life or impair the health of his neighbor seems to offend against the fundamentals. Upon what other fundamental principle does the rule rest that one who uses a highway must be careful not to collide with his neighbor? Upon what other fundamental principle does the law of libel and slander rest? Or the rule, recently laid down by this court in Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. L. 729, 744, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 254, 118 Am. St. Rep. 727, 65 Atl. 165, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 727, that any act is wrongful which, in the ordinary course, will infringe upon the rights of another to his damage, except it be done in the exercise of an equal or superior right?

In Langridge v. Levy, supra, plaintiff's father bargained with defendant to buy of him a gun, for the use of himself and sons, and the defendant, by falsely and fraudulently warranting the gun to have been made by N., and to be a good, safe, and secure gun, sold the gun to plaintiff's father, and the plaintiff, knowing and confiding in the warranty, used the gun, which in his hands, by reason of its weak, dangerous, and insufficient construction and materials, burst, whereby plaintiff was injured. Held, by the courts of exchequer and of exchequer chamber, that the action was maintainable, on the ground "that, as there is fraud and damage, the result of that fraud, not from an act remote and consequential, but one contemplated by the defendant at the time as one of its results, the party guilty of the fraud is responsible to the party injured." This case of itself is, of course, not an authority closely in point with the case before us, for here there is no averment of fraud, but only of negligence. But in George v. Skivington, L. R. 5 Exch. 1, where the declaration alleged that the defendant carried on the business of a chemist, and in the course of his business professed to sell a chemical compound, made of ingredients known only to him, and by him represented to be fit to be used for a hair wash; and the plaintiff J. G. thereupon bought of the defendant a bottle of this hair wash, to be used by his wife, the plaintiff E. G., as the defendant then knew, and averred that the defendant had negligently and unskillfully prepared the hair wash, so that, by reason thereof, it was unfit to be used for washing the hair, whereby the female plaintiff, who used it for that purpose, was injured,—it was held by the court of exchequer on demurrer that a good cause of action was disclosed. This decision was based upon the authority of Langridge v. Levy, it being held that the duty was of a similar character; one of the barons saying: "Substitute the word 'negligence' for 'fraud,' and the analogy between Langridge v. Levy and this case is complete." Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761, was distinguished, but upon grounds that are not very satisfactory. In the latter case it was held that a tradesman who contracts with an individual for the sale to him of an article to be used (in this instance a lamp) for a particular purpose by a third party is not, in the absence of fraud, liable for injury caused to such person by some defect in the construction of the article. In this case the declaration averred that there was a fraudulent representation that the lamp was safe; but of this there was no proof at the trial. There was no averment, in the declaration, of negligence on the part of the defendant in the manufacture of the lamp. The decision may perhaps be sustained upon this ground.

The leading American case is Thomas v. Winchester (1852) 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. This is a well-considered case, and holds that a dealer in drugs and medicines, who carelessly labels a deadly poison as a harmless medicine, and sends it so labeled into market, is liable to all persons who, without fault on their part, are injured by using it as such medicine in consequence of the false label; that such liability arises, not out of any contract or privity between the dealer and the person injured, but out of the duty which the law imposes upon the former to avoid acts in their nature dangerous to the lives of others. This decision has been cited with approval by our supreme court as a typical instance of the duty imposed, on public grounds, upon any person who undertakes the performance of an act which, if not done with care and skill, will be dangerous to the persons or lives of others; the duty being to exercise such care and skill. Van Winkle v. American Steam Boiler Co. 52 N. J. L. 240, 247, 19 Atl. 472. And this court has already approved Thomas v. Winchester to the extent that it held the chain of causation was not broken by the innocent acts of the intervening parties who, in reliance upon the label, bought and sold the poison until it came to her who finally used it as a medicine. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Salmon, 39 N. J. L. 299, 310, 23 Am. Rep. 214. The doctrine of Thomas v. Winchester has been recognized and approved in Massachusetts. See Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 144, 8 Am. Rep. 298. And in Bishop v. Weber (1885) 139 Mass. 411, 52 Am. Rep. 715, 1 N. E. 154, an action of tort was sustained against a caterer for improperly and negligently furnishing unwholesome and poisonous food. Allen, J., said: "This liability does not rest so much upon an implied contract as upon a violated or neglected duty voluntarily assumed. Indeed, where the guests are entertained without pay, it would be hard to establish an implied contract with each individual. The duty, however, arises from the relation of the caterer to the guests. The latter have a right to assume that he will furnish for their consumption provisions which are not unwholesome and injurious through any neglect on his part. The furnishing of provisions which endanger human life or health stands clearly upon the same ground as the administering of improper medicines, from which a liability springs irrespective of any question of privity of contract between the parties."

In Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper (1889) 83 Ga. 457, 5 L.R.A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324, 10 S. E. 118, it was held, upon the authority of Thomas v. Winchester, that the proprietor of a patent medicine, who puts upon the bottle containing it a prescription that it is to be taken in certain quantities, and sells it to a druggist for resale to any who may wish it, is liable for any injury sustained, on account of its poisonous effect, by one who buys it of the druggist, and uses it according to the prescription. The court said: "the liability of the plaintiff in error to the person injured arises, not by contract, but for a wrong committed by the proprietor in the prescription and direction as to the dose that should be taken. We can see no difference, whether the medicine was directly sold to the defendant in error by the proprietor, or by an intermediate party, to whom the proprietor had sold it in the first instance for the purpose of being sold again. It was put upon the market by the proprietor, not alone for the use of druggists to whom they might sell it, but to be used by the public in general, who might need the same for the cure of certain diseases, for which the proprietor set forth in his label the same was adapted. This was the same thing as if the proprietor himself had sold this medicine to the defendant in error, with his instructions and directions as to how the same should be taken."

A recent Minnesota case, Schubert v. J. R. Clark Co. (1892) 49 Minn. 331, 15 L.R.A. 818, 32 Am. St. Rep. 559, 51 N. W. 1103, perhaps extends the doctrine of Thomas v. Winchester further than we need to go in the present case. There one Phelps had ordered a new stepladder from a retail merchant, for the use of the plaintiff, who was a house painter in the employ of Phelps. The merchant, not having such a ladder in his stock, ordered the defendant corporation to deliver such a ladder to the plaintiff for his use. Pursuant to this order, defendant delivered a ladder to the plaintiff, which was made of poor, cross-grained, and decayed lumber, but was so painted that neither the plaintiff nor his employer nor the merchant could discover the defects. Plaintiff, supposing the ladder to have been made of good material, proceeded to use it in the performance of his work, when it broke under his weight, and he was thereby injured. The liability was sustained.

Craft v. Parker, W. & Co. (1893) 96 Mich. 245, 21 L.R.A. 139, 55 N. W. 812, is a case more closely in point, and is, we deem, a reliable authority.

In Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. (1903) 61 L.R.A. 303, 57 C. C. A. 237, 120 Fed. 865, the precise question was this: "Is a manufacturer or vendor of an article or machine which he knows, when he sells it, to be imminently dangerous, by reason of a concealed defect therein, to the life and limbs of anyone who shall use it for the purpose for which it was made and intended, liable to a stranger to the contract of sale, for an injury which he sustains from the concealed defect while he is lawfully applying the article or machine to its intended use?" Sanborn, J., in the course of a somewhat elaborate opinion, approves, arguendo, the doctrine of Thomas v. Winchester, Bishop v. Weber, and other cases of that character.

In Salmon v. Libby, McNeill, & Libby (1905) 219 Ill. 421, 76 N. E. 573, the declaration alleged, in substance, that the defendant prepared, put up in a package, and sold to the trade, certain mince-meat, which, in the due course of business, passed through the hands of a wholesale dealer, a retail dealer, and finally was made into a pie, of which plaintiff's testator ate; that the defendant negligently and improperly prepared and manufactured the mince-meat in question; that as a result the same became unfit for food, and poisonous and destructive to human life when used as food; and that plaintiff's testator, lawfully partaking of the same, was poisoned, and lost his life in consequence thereof. There was no averment of a scienter, the declaration counting upon the negligence alone. The supreme court of Illinois held that this set forth a good cause of action, under a statute permitting a recovery for the death of a person caused by the wrongful act or omission of another.

Upon both reason and authority, we are clearly of the opinion that the declaration before us sets up a good cause of action. The fact that the defendant was the manufacturer, presumably having knowledge, or opportunity for knowledge, of the contents of the cans and of the process of manufacture; that it put the goods upon the market for sale by dealers to consumers, under circumstances such that neither dealer nor consumer had opportunity for knowledge of the contents; the fact that the goods were thus manufactured and marketed under circumstances that imported a representation to intending purchasers that they were fit for food and beneficial to the human body; that, in the ordinary course of business, there was a probability (it being, indeed, the very purpose of the defendant) that the goods should be purchased, and used by parties purchasing, in reliance upon the representation; and that the defendant negligently prepared the food so that it was unwholesome and unfit to be eaten, and poisonous to the human body, whereby the plaintiff was injured,—make a case that renders the defendant liable for the damages sustained by the plaintiff thereby.

Let the judgment be reversed, and the record be remitted to the Supreme Court, to the end that the defendant may apply there for leave to withdraw its demurrer and plead to the merits. See Hale v. Lawrence, 22 N. J. L. 72, 82.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

S. C. SMITH

v.

DARIUS HICKS, Appt.

(— N. M. — 98 Pac. 138.)

Appeal — correction of pleadings.

1. A judgment will not be reversed because of refusal of the trial court to strike out portions of a pleading because redundant, or a legal conclusion, in the absence of anything to show prejudice therefrom.

Landlord — covenant to furnish water — breach.

2. A landlord does not comply with his agreement to furnish water to irrigate the crops to be grown on the land, from an artesian well on the property, by completing through a contractor whose contract antedated the lease a well sufficient to furnish Case Note. — Measure of damages for breach of contract to furnish water for irrigation.

Aside from SMITH v. HICKS and the cases therein cited and sufficiently reviewed, very little authority can be found on the question as to what is the measure of the damages recoverable for a breach of contract to furnish water for irrigation. However, those found all involve the destruction of a growing crop, and support, in effect at least, the rule laid down in the above case.

Thus in Raywood Rice Canal & Mill. Co. v. Langford Bros. 32 Tex. Civ. App. 401, 74 S. W. 926, it was held that, for the failure of a lessor to furnish his lessee with sufficient water for irrigation purposes, as per contract he was obliged to do, the measure of damages for the injury to a growing crop was the difference between what the crop damaged made and what it would probably have made but for the injury, less the cost of raising, harvesting, and marketing it. The same measure of damages seems to have been applied in Tres Palacios Rice & Irrig. Co. v. Eidman, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 542, 93 S. W. 698.

In Raywood Rice Canal & Mill. Co. v. Wells, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 545, 77 S. W. 253, it was held that, for breach of contract to the water, if the contractor, for the purpose of securing his compensation, immediately caps and locks the well so that to procure the water the tenant would be compelled to break the lock.

Damages — loss of crops.

3. The measure of damages for breach of contract to furnish water to irrigate growing crops so that they become worthless is the value of the crops on the market at maturity, less the cost necessary to put them in condition for and upon the closest market.

Same — evidence — neighboring crops.

4. Upon the question of measure of damages for failure to furnish water to irrigate crops, so that they are lost, evidence is admissible of the value of matured crops of like kind with those planted, in the neighborhood where they were growing.

(September 2, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Chaves County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for loss of plaintiff's crops through defendant's breach of contract. Affirmed.

Statement by McFie, J.:

This is a suit for damages brought by the appellee, S. C. Smith, hereinafter called "plaintiff," against Darius Hicks, appellant, hereinafter called "defendant," upon special covenant in a lease to furnish water, which plaintiff alleges was broken by defendant. The complaint alleges that, on March 13, furnish water for irrigating purposes, the measure of damages is the market value of the crop that would have been produced when harvested, less that proportion of the crop which was agreed to be paid for the water, and the expenses that would have been incurred in planting, raising, harvesting, and preparing such crop.

In Barstow Irrig. Co. v. Cleghon (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 1023, it was held that the proper measure of damages for breach of contract to furnish water for irrigation is the difference between what the crop damaged made and what it probably would have made if it had been properly watered, less certain expenses which were necessary to its cultivation and preparation for market.

In Anderson v. Adams, 43 Or. 621, 74 Pac. 215, where, because of a breach of contract to furnish water for irrigation, a growing crop was destroyed, it was evidently held that the damages recoverable was the value of the crop at the time of its destruction, this value to be ascertained by evidence of the value of the crop at maturity less the cost of the labor, care, and attention necessary to put it in condition for the nearest market.

1906, the defendant leased to plaintiff a certain quarter section of land in Chaves county, New Mexico, containing 160 acres of land, for one year, and agreed to furnish water sufficient for the irrigation of the land leased from a certain artesian well to be sunk on a portion of the premises, in consideration of which the plaintiff was to prepare and seed said lands in certain crops, properly cultivate and irrigate said crops, and deliver to defendant the share falling to him at Dexter, New Mexico, and that plaintiff performed said contract on his part, but defendant failed to furnish the water as contracted for in the lease, and, by reason of such failure, the crop died, with the result that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $1,000. To the complaint defendant directed a motion to strike out certain portions as legal conclusions and surplusage, which motion was overruled, and defendant answered. The defendant answered, denying all the material allegations contained in the complaint; denied that he failed and refused to furnish plaintiff with water with which to irrigate the crop; and alleges compliance with the terms of the lease contract; alleges that he caused to be brought in, on June 9, 1906, an artesian well located on the northwest corner of the land described in the lease with water sufficient to irrigate the whole of said demised premises, and that plaintiff, being in full charge of said demised premises, negligently permitted and allowed the well to be locked up, and failed and refused to use the waters thereof to irrigate the crops; that plaintiff's failure and refusal to secure the water was not the fault or neglect of the defendant, but that at the time plaintiff and defendant entered into the lease the plaintiff had full knowledge that the water to be furnished with which to irrigate the crops was to come from the well then being bored, and that, in addition to the well furnished by defendant, defendant notified plaintiff before and after the well was brought in not to allow the crop to die for lack of water, that defendant would pay extra for water from neighboring claims, and that plaintiff negligently and wilfully abandoned the premises on June 15, 1906, and rented other lands and refused to cultivate the lands of the defendant, and failed to use the water furnished by the defendant from the artesian well. The defendant further alleged by way of counterclaim that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $100 as stipulated damages provided for in the lease because of his alleged breach of contract. The plaintiff denied the new matter set up in the answer and reply. The cause was tried to a jury upon the issues thus made, which resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and his damages were assessed in the sum of $362.50. Whereupon defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he prosecutes this appeal.

Messrs. K. K. Scott and W. A. Dunn, for appellant:

The amount of damages recoverable for that, for lack of due diligence by a municipal corporation to furnish a supply of water according to contract for steam heating in a greenhouse, the damages recoverable was the full amount of damage to the growing lettuce in such greenhouse, which was frozen by reason of the breach.

In Colorado Canal Co. v. McFarland (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 400, it was held that, where damages are claimed for breach of contract to furnish water for irrigation purposes, evidence of what similar lands properly cultivated and irrigated yielded in the same year, in connection with other evidence, was admissible to ascertain the damages sustained.

It will be noticed that in some, at least, of the above cases the measure of damages is stated to be the value of the crop at the time of its destruction, to be ascertained by the admission of evidence of the value of the crop at the time of maturity less the expenses and cost necessary to prepare it for the nearest market. It would seem, therefore, that this class of cases makes a rule in regard to the admissibility of evidence out of what seems to be stated in SMITH v. HICKS, and some of the cases gathered in this note, to be the measure of damages. Whether there is any real practical distinction between these two statements of the rule is difficult to state, since most of the courts fail to draw any distinction at all. This was so in SMITH v. HICKS, and also in Raywood Rice Canal & Mill. Co. v. Langford Bros. supra, where the court, after approving a statement of the latter, said that it was but another way of saying "Find for plaintiffs the value of the crops at the date of the breach." It is suggested here, however, that those cases which state the measure of damages to be the value of the crop at the time of its destruction, and admit as evidence the value of the crop at the time of maturity less the cost of preparing it for market, might also admit other evidence to ascertain the damages recoverable, and thus finally come to a somewhat different result than those cases which state the market value of the crop at the time of maturity less the cost of preparing it for its nearest market to be the measure of damages, for, under a statement of the latter rule, the admissibility of other evidence would seem to be precluded.

A note discussing this same question and including all cases concerning the measure of damages for injury to, or destruction of, growing crops, may be found with Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 267.

the loss of growing crops must be ascertained solely by the value of the lost or injured crops in their then condition, without reference to their conjectural worth at maturity.

McFie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first error assigned is upon the overruling of defendant's motion in the lower court to strike out portions of the complaint as being redundant or legal conclusions. There was no error committed in the overruling of this motion. "But, even if the court had erred in overruling the motion, a reversal of the judgment would not follow. A party has no absolute right to have his adversary's pleadings pruned to suit his fancy. A reviewing court will only interfere in such matters where it appears that the denial of a motion to correct a pleading was not only erroneous, but prejudicial to the substantial rights of the moving party." Lincoln Mortg. & T. Co. v. Hutchins, 55 Neb. 158, 75 N. W. 538. In the case of Pfau v. State, 148 Ind. 539, 47 N. E. 927, the supreme court of Indiana says that "this court has repeatedly held that the overruling by the court below of a motion to strike out a part of a pleading is not on appeal an available error here. The reason assigned for such decision is that, 'at most, it can but leave surplusage in the record, which does not vitiate that which is good.'" Hudelson v. First Nat. Bank, 56 Neb. 247, 76 N. W. 570; Coddington v. Canaday, 157 Ind. 243, 61 N. E. 567; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Marks, 11 Okla. 82, 65 Pac. 996. There is nothing disclosed by the record in this case to show that the defendant was prejudicially affected by the ruling so as to bring the case within the exception referred to in some of the cases above cited.

While there are several assignments of error, they all relate to the four remaining questions in this case, namely: (1) Did the defendant, Hicks, comply with his covenant in the lease, which is in the following language: "Party of the first part agrees to furnish water sufficient to irrigate land above described; said water to come from an artesian well located on land?" (2) Did the court submit to the jury in his charge the correct measure of damages? (3) Was error committed in the overruling of the demurrer of the evidence and refusal to give peremptory instructions? (4) Was error committed in overruling the motion for new trial? We will consider these questions in the above order.

Considering, then, the first, it is found to be based upon two paragraphs of the court's charge, and the refusal of the court to give two instructions requested by the defendant in the court below. It became the duty of the court to charge the jury as to the meaning of the defendant's covenant in the lease, "Party of the first part agrees to furnish water sufficient to irrigate land above described; said water to come from an artesian well located on land." The undisputed facts are that at the time the lease was entered into March 13, 1906, work was progressing on the well by the contractor Fisher. The crops were planted, as agreed upon, in April, May, and the last about the 1st of June. The oats came up and grew to be from 2 to 3 inches high, alfalfa 2 to 8 inches high, Indian corn 3 to 4 inches high. All of these crops dried up and died for want of water to irrigate them. The final flow of water was struck on the 9th day of June, and on the same day the contractor Fisher capped, put a chain and padlock on, and locked the well up so that Smith, the lessee, could not, and did not, get any water from the well. Smith was present when Fisher locked the well, and protested verbally, to the extent of saying that he would break the lock, but Fisher replied that he had to do so to get a settlement with Hicks, and, if he broke the lock, he would do it at his peril. There was some correspondence between Smith and Hicks, who had gone to Illinois some time before and was still there, in which Hicks told Smith to break the lock and take the water; Hicks claiming that he did not owe Fisher anything. Fisher gave Smith the key to unlock the well July 5th, and he then obtained water, and, while some of the maize he had planted then came up and continued to grow, it was too late to mature. The frost killed it, and it was worthless. The evidence tended to show that, although the crops were planted and became growing crops, they were total loss to the plaintiff, and that the failure of the defendant to furnish the water necessary as provided for in the lease was the cause of the loss. Upon this branch of the case the court charged the jury as follows: "The first question for you to determine upon going to your jury room is whether there has been a breach of the contract in the respect alleged; that is, whether or not the defendant failed to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the crops as provided by the lease here from the artesian well located upon the premises. The court instructs the jury that plaintiff, by the terms of the written lease submitted in evidence, was entitled to one half of the hay and grain that might be produced on the west 80 acres, and to all of the hay and grain produced on the east 80 acres of the premises described in said lease and occupied by the plaintiff during the year 1906, and that, by the terms of said lease, the defendant was bound to furnish sufficient water for the irrigation of the crops planted by the plaintiff on said leased premises; and, if you find from the evidence, defendant failed to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the crops planted by the plaintiff, and that plaintiff lost his crops on said premises by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish water sufficient for the irrigation thereof, then and in case you so find your finding should be for the plaintiff. The court instructs you that the term used in the lease, 'to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the land, said water to come from an artesian well located on the land,' means in law the duty was imposed by law on the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff, Smith, for the irrigation purposes of the premises occupied by him under the lease in evidence, a sufficient water source from which to irrigate said land. It does not impose the duty upon the defendant of being constantly in attendance for the purpose of seeing that this water was conveyed upon the premises, nor did it impose upon the defendant the duty of protecting the well from trespassers after the same had been completed and the water delivered to the plaintiff, because the duty rested upon the plaintiff to protect himself against trespasses, but the court charges you it was the duty of the defendant, Mr. Hicks, in the first instance under his contract to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the land, said water to come from an artesian well located on the land. It was his duty to deliver water from said well to the plaintiff, Smith, for the irrigation of the premises occupied by him under the lease in evidence. Now, the court charges you that if, in case you find that the defendant, within the terms of this instruction, did furnish water to this plaintiff sufficient for the irrigation, then and in that event the plaintiff cannot recover because the breach of the contract relied upon has not been established by the evidence. If, on the other hand, you find that the defendant failed to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the lands in question from the artesian well referred to, it would become your duty to assess the damages in favor of the plaintiff."

The argument of counsel for the defendant is that the water was furnished to the plaintiff, within the terms of the contract, by defendant, when the well was completed and capped by Alonzo Fisher, the contractor. They further say that, if the plaintiff permitted the contractor to do some unlawful act on his premises, it certainly would not be contended that Fisher, going beyond the scope of his employment and committing such unlawful act, could be the agent of the defendant or bind the defendant. If, after the well was brought in, Fisher had permitted the water to run for a time, and had Smith been permitted to use it, thus obtaining possession thereof, the argument of counsel would be quite forcible, as Fisher in seizing and locking up the well would have been a trespasser against whom Smith would doubtless have been charged with the duty of defending his possession thereof; but under the facts here it is different. The defendant had put Fisher in possession of the well under a contract to which Smith was not a party, and this contract gave Fisher a right to be upon the premises superior to that of Smith himself, as this right existed when the lease was executed. Fisher refused to allow the well to flow for the use of Smith, and immediately locked the well. Smith protested to the extent of threatening to break the lock and take the water, but without effect. The situation, therefore, on June 9th, was that to obtain the water Hicks had bound himself to furnish the plaintiff must do an act of violence, such as breaking the lock, thereby incurring personal damage and possibly criminal prosecution, or bring legal proceedings to obtain the use of the water he had a right to be peaceably furnished by the defendant. The word "furnished" as used in that lease is used in the sense of delivery; that is, to provide with the right of possession and use. The water was to be furnished for the use of the plaintiff in raising crops, and was not furnished, when, to obtain possession and use of it, the plaintiff would be required to incur personal danger or become involved in litigation. Smith was not the agent of Hicks in regard to the sinking or paying for this well. Fisher was in possession with a claim of right, and, in our opinion, the plaintiff was not required to do more than he did to obtain the water.

The views expressed as to the correctness of the court's charge in effect dispose of the ninth and tenth assignments of error. Those assignments are based upon the refusal of the court to give to the jury instructions Nos. 3 and 4, requested by counsel for the defendant. No. 3 is substantially that, if the jury believe that the well was brought in on June 9th, and that, after the well began to flow, Fisher locked it up, that Fisher's act was a trespass, and the plaintiff had a right to remove the lock and use the water. No. 4 is to the effect that

Smith, as lessee, had full right and authority to protect the place from all trespasses, and that, if Fisher locked up the well, it was the right and duty of Smith to protect himself against such trespass, and it was not the duty of the defendant, Hicks, to do so. These instructions are along the line of defendant's contention that the plaintiff was compelled to break the lock and take the water, and that the defendant was under no obligation to place the water at the disposal of the plaintiff as he had contracted to do.

In the case of Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487, the court says: While we are to determine the legal import of these provisions according to their own terms, it may be well to briefly recall certain well-settled rules in this branch of the law. One is that, if a party by his contract charges himself with an obligation possible to be performed, he must make it good, unless his performance is rendered impossible by the act of God, the law, or the other party. Difficulties, even if unforeseen, and however great, will not excuse him. If parties have made no provision for a dispensation, the rule of law gives none, nor, in such circumstances, can equity interpose. Dermott v. Jones (Ingle v. Jones) 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. ed. 762; Cutter v. Powell, 6 T. R. 320, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1. It was within the power of the defendant to provide for this emergency when he executed the lease, but, failing to do so, he must comply with its terms or be liable for the consequences. The case of Pallett v. Murphy, 131 Cal. 192, 63 Pac. 366, is a case where Murphy was the owner of a ditch and obligated to supply water to the Rancho Paso de Bartolo tract of land, part of which was leased to the plaintiff. The lessee offered to pay the water rates and demanded the water, which was refused on the ground that the defendant had disposed of all the water to other parties. The court held the defendant liable, and affirmed the judgment for damages. In this case the lessee had a right to the water from the defendant's ditch on the land, but he did not take it by violent means. His right of action for damages was sustained; and we regard the law as laid in that case equally applicable to the present one. Entertaining the views we have above expressed, we think the court properly refused to give the jury these instructions.

Coming, now, to the main point in the case,—that of the measure of damages,—we find quite a conflict of authority upon that subject. An examination of the authorities also shows that the measure of damages as applied to the leased lands and crops depends to a considerable extent upon the condition of the lands and crops at the time of the alleged damage: that is, whether the lands have been planted or contain growing or matured crops, thus necessitating a different measure of damage in accordance with the facts. This question of the damages was before this court in case of Mogolon Gold & Copper Co. v. Stout (N. M.) 91 Pac. 724; but the measure of damages adopted in that case is not controlling in this, inasmuch as the plaintiff Stout sued to recover damages for the destruction of trees and vines which pertain to the real estate, as well as for crops, and different measure of damages is found to exist as between real estate and growing crops. As to the measure of damages in this case, the court instructed the jury as follows: "The court charges you that the only damages claimed in this case are damages resulting from the loss of the crop in question. The court instructs you upon this point that the measure of damages in this case is the value of the crop at the time it was destroyed, if it was destroyed through the fault of the defendant, and the value at maturity and the labor necessary to put the crop in a condition for marketing are the data from which to estimate this value. The value of the crop at maturity would be its value on the farm where it is produced or at the closest market. If you find from the evidence that, by the negligence or failure of the defendant to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the crops of the plaintiff, said crops were wholly destroyed, or were destroyed to such an extent as to be worthless, then the plaintiff's damages, if any, would be the value of such crops on the market at maturity, less the cost of labor, care, and attention necessary to put the crops in condition for the closest market and upon such market. The court charges you that, in determining this branch of the case, it becomes material what the value of such crops would be at maturity, you have a right to take into consideration the results which came from crops situated upon similar land in that immediate vicinity under irrigation, and from this date you are permitted, and it is your duty, to proceed to the determination of what would have been the results in the crops upon the land in question. And from the value of the crops upon the adjacent lands or similar lands you may determine what would have been the value of these crops on the property in this section. You have a right to take into consideration from the experience of crops upon neighboring lands to what extent these crops, if they had been allowed water, would have arrived at maturity, and, if you find from the evidence that the crops upon adjoining lands to a considerable extent did not reach to maturity by reason of the character of the season or otherwise, these are circumstances you have a right to consider in determining to what extent, if any, the plaintiff had been damaged in this case." The defendant submitted and requested the court to give the following instruction as to the proper measure of damages: "If you find from the evidence in this case, under the instruction heretofore given you, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover anything from the defendant on account of defendant's failure to furnish water, as alleged in the complaint, then I instruct you that the amount which the plaintiff can recover is the difference between the rental value of the premises described in the complaint without water and the value of their rental value with water; and, if you should find for the plaintiff, you will assess his damages for the sum as the evidence may have shown the rental value of the land with water to be in excess of the rental value without water." Briefly stated, the court charged the jury that, "if they found from the evidence that the crops were wholly destroyed, or were destroyed to such an extent as to be worthless, then the plaintiff's damages, if any, would be the value of such crops on the market at maturity, less the cost of labor, care, and attention necessary to put the crops in condition for the closest market and upon such market," while the measure of damages contended for by counsel for the defendant is "that the amount which the plaintiff can recover is the difference between the rental value of the premises described in the complaint without water and the value of the rental value with water." There is no doubt that the measure of damages contended for by the defendant's counsel is supported by quite a number of the decided cases, and is, no doubt, the true measure of damages in some jurisdictions, especially in cases where, on account of failure to obtain water, crops were never planted.

Counsel for the defendant are to be commended for their diligence in referring the court to almost every case to be found in the books supporting, even remotely, their contention. Their main reliance, however, is upon two cases from the state of California, namely, Crow v. San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. 130 Cal. 310, 62 Pac. 562, 1058; Pallett v. Murphy, supra. These cases hold that the true measure of damages under the facts is the difference between the rental value of the land with and without water for irrigation; but in those cases there were no growing crops on the land to be destroyed, as the crops were never planted owing to the failure to obtain water; and, further, the lessees were evidently paying rent for the land, judging from the reference of the court, although not directly stated. The authorities show that a different measure of damages prevails where crops have been planted and destroyed in whole or in part. The case of Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co. 151 Cal. 209, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 267, 90 Pac. 942, is a case on all fours with the present case, and was decided in May, 1907, being reported in the last volume of California Reports published up to this date. The lands were rented for a share of the crops, and the suit was brought by the tenant for the total destruction of growing crops. The syllabus, which is supported by the opinion of the court as to the measure of damages, is as follows: "In an action by a tenant entitled to three fourths of a crop, for the total destruction of the crop while growing, the court, in arriving at the value of the crop at the time of its destruction, found the probable yield of the crop and the market value thereof, deducting therefrom the cost of producing and marketing the crop, and deducting therefrom one fourth of such value as the landlord's share. Held the true measure of damages." As will be seen, the measure of damages in this case in practically the same as that given the jury on the charge of the court in this case. The court's attention was called to the fact that the measure of damages was different from that declared in 130 Cal. 310, 62 Pac. 562, 1058, but the court overruled a motion for a rehearing of the case. From this it appears that in California, in an action for the destruction of growing crops, the measure of damages is not that contended for by the defendant, but is that which the court submitted to the jury in this case. The court, in his charge, speaking of the measure of damages, said: "The court instructs you upon this point that the measure of damages in this case is the value of the crop at the time it was destroyed, if it was destroyed, through the fault of the defendant, and the value at maturity and the labor necessary to put the crop in condition for marketing are the data from which to establish this value." The court here lays down the general rule as to measure of damages in case of the destruction of growing crops, that it is "the value of crops at the time of their destruction." In an extensive note in support of the case of Candler v. Washoe Lake Reservoir & G. C. Ditch Co., reported in 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. p. 949, the author cites the states of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New York, Oregon, Utah, and Nevada as adhering to this measure of damages. As the court below in his charge pointed out, there is a marked difference between the measure of damages and the mode from which the value at the date of destruction is to be ascertained.

In Teller v. Bay River Dredging Co. supra, the court discusses this matter, as follows: "This question thus turns upon the mode of ascertaining the value of the growing crop at the time of its destruction. The appellant contends that the rental value of the land, with the cost of labor and materials up to the time of the destruction expended in producing the crop, with legal interest at legal rate thereon, furnishes the correct method of arriving at this value. Such a method finds support from and has been adopted by the supreme court of South Carolina, in the case of Horres v. Berkeley Chemical Co. 57 S. C. 189, 52 L.R.A. 36, 35 S. E. 500. The objection to this method is that it is not a determination of value at all. It is but a determination of cost, which, while always an element of value, never furnishes its exact measure. By such a method of computation nothing is allowed for the fact that the crops, simply as growing crops, and before maturity, are necessarily an expense, and not a profit, to the owner. They are of value to him not as growing vegetation upon his land, but because in the course of nature they will come to fruition, and so have a market value, and thus will bring to him profit for his disbursement and expenses in their care and maintenance. Moreover, in taking cost as the measure of value, there is lost sight of the fact that by the destruction of the crop it cannot for that year at least be replaced, and that the very possibility, aside from the reasonable expectation, of future profit is forbidden to the agriculturist; and, finally, that cost cannot be the measure of the detriment under such circumstances ought to become patent from consideration of the fact that if you should, upon successive years, destroy the farmers' crops, and in full compensation therefor pay him only the money which he had expended in their growth up to the time of destruction, you could in a very short time starve to death every agricultural community in the United States." The court, after stating the above reasons for the adoption of the measure of damages in the court below, commended the rule contained in the following instruction: "In arriving at the value of the crops as they then stood (at the time of their destruction) and in the condition in which they were, the court has adopted as the best means available the probable yield of each tract multiplied by the market value of the crop, deducting therefrom the cost of producing and marketing said crops, and deducting therefrom the one fourth of such value as and for the landlord's share," etc.,

—while stated in different language, the measure of damages above stated is identical with that given the jury in the present case, except the reference to the landlord's share. As to that, however, the court below, in another part of his charge, informed the jury plainly that the landlord was to receive one half of the crops raised on the west 80 acres and the tenant all of the remaining crops, thus precluding the idea that the jury miscalculated the damages. The court states at the time of the trial that he would adopt and give the jury the measure of damages laid down by the Texas courts. On examination of the decided cases in that state, it is found that, up to and including 1894, the measure of damages for the destruction of growing crops was held to be "the difference between the value of the crops before and after injury, and is not ascertained by their probable worth at maturity less expenses in maturing." 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 950.

But, beginning with the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGowan, 73 Tex. 355, 11 S. W. 336, and including decisions rendered in the year 1904, the Texas courts have adopted a different rule (which is the rule laid down by the court below in this case), that the probable yield of the crops, with a deduction for the expenses of fitting for market, should be taken as the measure of damages. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGowan, supra; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Pape, 73 Tex. 501, 11 S. W. 526; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Parr, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 28 S. W. 264; Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Longbottom (Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 542; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Kiersey (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 1045; 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 950. In Shotwell v. Dodge, 8 Wash. 337, 36 Pac. 254, the measure of damages adopted was the market value of the crops over and above the cost of producing, harvesting, and marketing the same. In Carron v. Wood, 10 Mont. 500, 26 Pac. 388, the measure of damages was held to be the net profit which the owner would have realized from the crops planted on the land had the same been irrigated, after deducting the expense necessarily involved in raising and marketing them. In Candler v. Washoe Lake Reservoir & G. C. Ditch Co. 28 Nev. 151, 80 Pac. 751, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 946, the measure of damages was held to be "the probable yield of the crops under proper cultivation, the value of the yield when matured and ready for market, and deducting therefrom the estimated expense of producing, harvesting, and marketing them, and also deducting the value of any portion of the crops that may have been saved." The case of Northern Colorado Irrig. Co. v. Richards, 22 Colo. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

450, 45 Pac. 423, was a case involving a partial destruction of growing crops, and the measure of damages adopted by the court was "the difference between the amount realized from the crops and the amount that would have been realized had water been furnished, less the cost of raising, harvesting, and marketing." All of these cases are from the irrigation states, and are quite recent cases, and, while the language is slightly different, the measure of damages in all is substantially the same as the Texas rule given for the guidance of the jury in this case. The criticism of this rule by the courts adopting a different one is the element of uncertainty therein; but it must be conceded that there is more or less uncertainty in whatever measure of damages may be adopted in such cases, but it is reasonable to believe that the courts in the irrigation states take the view that the element of uncertainty as to the maturing of the crops planted is reduced to a minimum where water is provided by irrigation, and this may serve to explain the adherence to the measure of damages above referred to. Certain it is that the measure of damages contended for by appellant finds little or no support as a proper measure of damages under the circumstances of this case outside of the two cases from California above referred to, and the later cases from the same court do not sustain those cases.

The court permitted some witnesses to testify, over the objection of defendant, as to the value of matured crops of like kind with those planted in the neighborhood where the crops were planted; and this action of the court is assigned as error. This character of evidence is competent in a case of this kind, and such testimony has been held admissible in several of the cases above referred to. In Lester v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 27 Utah, 470, 101 Am. St. Rep. 988, 76 Pac. 341, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 761, the court says: "In cases of destruction of growing crops it is proper and important to introduce and admit evidence showing the kind of crops the land is capable of producing, the kind of crops destroyed, the average yield per acre of each kind on the land in dispute and on other similar lands in the immediate neighborhood, cultivated in like manner, the stage of growth of the crops at the time of injury or destruction, the expense of cultivating, harvesting, and marketing the crops, and the market value at the time of maturity, or within a reasonable time after the injury or destruction of the crops." At the close of the case for the plaintiff, counsel for the defendant demurred to the evidence, and at the close of the case defendant's counsel requested the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, for want of evidence to support a verdict for the plaintiff. The demurrer was overruled, the instruction was refused, and the action of the court is assigned as error. As there was sufficient competent evidence to support the verdict rendered, no error was committed in the action taken, nor was there error committed by the court in overruling of the motion for a new trial under the view we take of this case.

There being no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed, with costs. It is so ordered.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIAM BOSWELL, Appt.,

v.

SECURITY MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Reapt.

(193 N. Y. 465, 86 N. E. 532.)

Insurance — agent's contract — legislative interference.

1. A statute limiting the amounts which insurance companies may expend for securing new business does not apply to an existing long-term contract with a general agent, so as to reduce the amounts to be paid him under his contract.

Contract — obligation — impairment.

2. The legislature cannot require the reduction of the compensation of general insurance agents under existing contracts in view of the provision of the Federal Constitution forbidding the impairment of the obligation of contracts.

Case Note. — Effect of legislation limiting cost of new insurance on existing contracts with agents.

The foregoing opinion is valuable as being a final determination upon certain questions arising under the much-discussed new insurance laws of New York. It will be noticed that the court upholds the law so far as it restricts the cost of new insurance, but construes it so that it will not apply to any contracts made by the insurance company with its agents prior to the passage of the law. Were the act construed to apply to such contracts, it seems clear that it would be unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts.

A search of the authorities reveals no other case passing upon this particular question.

Corporation — legislative power — agent's contract.

3. A general agent of an insurance company taking charge of its business in another state does not become such a factor in its domestic affairs, mechanism, internal organization or policy, that his contract for compensation is subject to reduction by the legislature under its reserve power over corporations.

Contract — insurance agent — legislative interference.

4. A provision in a contract by a general agent of an insurance company placed in charge of the business in another state, that the contract is subject to the condition that the company continue to be legally authorized to transact business in said district, does not make the provisions of the contract as to compensation subject to future legislation of the state where the company is incorporated.

Police power — insurance agents — compensation.

5. The police power of the state does not extend to reducing the compensation of general agents of insurance companies under existing contracts.

Same — new forms — commissions.

6. Changes in premium rates or clauses in present forms of life-insurance policies are not to be construed as new forms, within the meaning of a provision in an agent's contract that the commissions specified in the contract shall not apply to any new forms of policies hereafter adopted.

(December 8, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, denying him a portion of the amount claimed in a controversy submitted under the Code upon an agreed statement of facts to determine the compensation to which plaintiff was enti-be cited in connection with the foregoing case. One section of the law provides that no life insurance corporation doing business in the state shall make any agreement with any of its officers, trustees, or salaried employees whereby it agrees that, for the services rendered or to be rendered thereafter by such official, trustee, or employee, he shall receive any salary, compensation, or emolument that will extend beyond a period of twelve months from the date of such agreement or contract; and the statute further provided for a penalty for any violation of the law. The court held that a contract made in violation of the law was malum prohibitum; but the prohibition in the statute was directed against the company only, and an agent could recover his salary under such a contract as upon an implied assumpsit. It will be noted that the decision in this case resembles BOSWELL v. SECURITY MUT. L. INS. CO. in that the agent in each case was protected in his contract.

Edward T. Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the questions submitted was decided below in favor of the defendant, but the appellate division awarded the plaintiff judgment for \$132.06; the defendant conceding that amount was due him. The plaintiff insists this award of judgment was insufficient in amount for reasons hereinafter stated. It was stipulated that, if both the questions submitted were decided in favor of the plaintiff, he should have judgment for \$191.54. The case presented involves the construction of § 97 of the insurance law (Laws 1906, chap. 326, p. 794, § 33), the material portions of which are as follows: "Sec. 97. Limitation of expenses.—No domestic life insurance corporation shall in any calendar year after the year 1906 expend, or become liable for, or permit any person, firm, or corporation to expend, on its behalf or under any agreement with it (1) for commissions on first year's premiums, (2) for compensation, not paid by commission, for services in obtaining new insurance exclusive of salaries paid in good faith for agency supervision either at the home office or at branch offices, (3) for medical examinations and inspections of proposed risks, and (4) for advances to agents, an amount exceeding in the aggregate the total loadings upon the premiums for the first year of insurance received in said calendar year (calculated on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality with interest at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per centum per annum and the present values of the assumed mortality gains for the first five years of insurance on the policies on which the first premium, or instalment thereof, has been received during said calendar year, as ascertained by the select and ultimate method of valuation as provided in § 84 of this chapter. . . . No such corporation, nor any person, firm, or corporation on its behalf or under any agreement with it, shall pay or allow to any agent, broker, or other person, firm, or corporation for procuring an application for life insurance, for collecting any premium thereon, or for any other service performed in connection therewith, any compensation other than that which has been determined in advance. . . . No such corporation, nor any person, firm, or corporation on its behalf or under any agreement with it, shall make any loan or advance to any person, firm, or corporation soliciting or undertaking to solicit applications for insurance without adequate collateral security; nor shall any such loan or advance be made upon the security of renewal commissions, or of other compensation earned or to be earned by the borrower, except advances against compensation for the first year of insurance."

The statement of facts contains, in part, the following: The plaintiff was, at the time of making the contract, and ever since has been, a citizen of the state of Ohio. The defendant is a domestic life insurance company with its principal place of business in the city of Binghamton, New York. The defendant is a mutual company on what is known as the "old line" basis. In the written agreement between the parties entered into on the 30th day of October, 1901, the defendant is party of the first part and the plaintiff party of the second part. The defendant appointed the plaintiff its general agent in the states of Ohio, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, for the purpose of procuring applications for insurance on the lives of individuals satisfactory to the defendant. It is provided that the contract is subject to the condition that the company continues to be legally authorized to carry on business in the territory named, and, if its authority is terminated in any section thereof, the contract is to be null and void so far as new business in such section is concerned. The plaintiff is obligated to devote his entire time and best energies to the service of the company; to have the exclusive right to appoint agents within said district, for whose fidelity and honesty he is to be responsible to the company. In consideration of the performance of this contract by the plaintiff, the company is to pay a brokerage commission on the cash premiums as collected for the first year, as follows: On certain participating policies from 70 per cent to 20 per cent; on other non-participating policies from 60 per cent to 30 per cent. There are also provisions for overwriting brokerage and other commissions and various regulations unnecessary to state in detail. The plaintiff is to give a bond with sureties for the faithful performance of the contract; also is to pay all the expenses of building up and conducting the business, subject to minor exceptions not now important. The contract further provides as follows: "During the continuance of this contract, said party of the second part shall not act as agent or broker for any other life insurance company or agent, except to place business which this company may have declined. . . . This contract is for the term of twenty years from its date, subject to its terms and conditions." It also appears in the statement of facts that, at the time the contract was entered into, the defendant had comparatively little business in force in the four states mentioned; that, upon the execution of the contract, the plaintiff entered upon the performance thereof and continues up to the present time; that he established agencies and rented offices for the conduct of defendant's business in numerous cities and towns in said territory, paying the resident agents and office rents; that he employed superintendents and instructors, paying their salaries and traveling expenses; that he advertised, at his own expense, the business of the defendant in various newspapers in the states named. In brief, it appears that the plaintiff has performed the contract on his part, and, as a result of his efforts and the expenditure of his money, he has built up for the defendant business aggregating about $5,000,000 now in force in said states.

There are two questions presented for our determination. The first is whether the plaintiff's contract with the defendant as to the rate of commissions which have been in existence for nearly five years, and having about fourteen years to run, at the time § 97 of the insurance law was enacted, in 1906, is affected by said legislation to the extent of changing its provisions as to the amount of plaintiff's commissions and materially reducing them. It is important to keep in mind the precise relations of the parties. The defendant company at the time the contract was executed, October 30, 1901, had comparatively little business in force in the states of Ohio, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky. The plaintiff, who was a resident of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, covenanted to devote his entire time and energies to building up a business for the defendant in the states named during the twenty years the contract was to run. He received no salary. He paid substantially the expense of the undertaking, and it is obvious that the long term of the contract was due to the fact that its initial years would be unproductive to a great extent; that the building up of a paying business was a work of time, hard labor, and large expenditure. It appears that, after the lapse of some five years, the plaintiff had secured the defendant business aggregating about $5,000,000 now in force in the states mentioned. The remaining fourteen years or more of the contract term evidently covered the period when plaintiff might well expect the reward for past labor and expenditure. The plaintiff and defendant at the outset had agreed upon the commissions to be allowed the former, which were, by legal construction, to be paid during the life of the contract, unless modified by the parties, or interrupted as to its future performance by the decrease or incapacity of the plaintiff, or the corporate death of the defendant. We thus have a contract in full force and effect satisfactory to the parties, and the sole question presented on this branch of the case is whether that has been abrogated or modified by the subsequent act of the legislature of the state of New York. We are of opinion that § 97 of the insurance law should not be construed as retroactive, and therefore it does not apply to the contract before us. If construed otherwise, it would contravene the provision of the Federal Constitution that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Article 1, § 10. The contract provides for an ordinary business arrangement between a citizen of Ohio and a private corporation of this state. It does not offend against public policy, and cannot be interfered with by the general or reverse powers of the legislature, or the exercise of the police power. At this late day it is unnecessary to quote largely from the authorities bearing upon the question when the obligation of a contract is impaired. In Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 197, 4 L. ed. 529, 549, Chief Justice Marshall said: "In discussing the question whether a state is prohibited from passing such a law as this, our first inquiry is into the meaning of words in common use. What is the obligation of a contract, and what will impair it? It would seem difficult to substitute words which are more intelligible, or less liable to misconstruction, than those which are to be explained. A contract is an agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. The law binds him to perform his undertaking, and this is, of course, the obligation of his contract. . . . Any law which releases a part of this obligation must, in the literal sense of the word, impair it." Applying this language to the contract before us, we have precisely the situation pointed out by the learned chief justice in his illustration of what constitutes the impairment of the obligation of a contract. In the present case definite compensation of the plaintiff by way of commissions was fixed by the contract for twenty years, subject to minor exceptions.

In 2 Story on the Constitution (§ 1385), the learned author lays down the rule as follows: "It is perfectly clear that any law which enlarges, abridges, or in any manner changes the intention of the parties resulting from the stipulations in the contract necessarily impairs it." See also People ex rel. Manhattan Sav. Inst. v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 256, 6 L. ed. 620. In New York v. Twenty-third Street R. Co. 113 N. Y. 311, 317, 21 N. E. 60, 62, Earl, J., states: "It is difficult to put precise limits upon the power of the legislature thus reserved over corporations created by it or under its authority. Under its reserved power it cannot deprive a corporation of its property, or interfere with or annul its contracts with third persons." People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L.R.A. 255, 7 Am. St. Rep. 684, 18 N. E. 692, deals with the legal situation presented when the Broadway Railway Company suffered legal death. It was held that its mortgages and valid contracts survived its dissolution. See also People v. National Trust Co. 82 N. Y. 283. In the case before us the corporation has not suffered legal death, but is a going company clothed with all its charter rights.

with the defendant company can be impaired by the act of the legislature of the state of New York long after the contract went into effect. The counsel seeking to sustain this legislation cites two cases, viz., People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 91 N. Y. 174, and People v. Formosa, 131 N. Y. 478, 27 Am. St. Rep. 612, 30 N. E. 492. The case of the Globe Mutual Life Insurance Company, held that, where a life insurance company had entered into a contract with its general agent for his services for a specified term, and, before any breach of the contract on its part, it was deprived of corporate life and its assets turned over to a receiver, the agent had no valid claim upon the fund in the receiver's hands for damages for an alleged breach of the contract because of the discontinuance of his employment. The case of People v. Formosa, supra, held that a foreign corporation seeking to do business in this state must obey its laws and conform to its public policy. And it was accordingly held that the provision of law in relation to life insurance companies doing business in this state which forbids them or their agents from paying or allowing any rebates of premiums as an inducement to any person to insure, and declaring any person violating the prohibition guilty of a misdemeanor, was constitutional; and the fact that a person indicted and found guilty of a violation of the act was acting in the transaction as an agent of a foreign corporation did not affect his liability.

Obviously these cases, having in mind what was actually decided therein, have no bearing on the question before us. The appellate division [119 App. Div. 728, 104 N. Y. Supp. 133], in discussing when the obligation of the contract is impaired, states: "The rule doubtless is, as contended by plaintiff, that the legislature, under this reserved power granted to it by the Constitution, cannot interfere with or annul a contract between a corporation and other parties." This concession is in accordance with the unbroken current of authority, either in the case of a contract terminated by the legal death of a corporation, where the agent may resort to the receiver for the collection of any amount due him at that time, or the case of an agent of a going corporation, where contract obligations for his benefit cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation. The ground upon which the court below rested its decision is best stated in its own language as follows: "Now, the plaintiff, when he became the general agent of the defendant, under his contract, became vitally and essentially connected with its 'domestic affairs.' He became an important part of its mechanism. The machinery of life insurance has largely been conducted through the instrumentality of agents. Such corporations have, through their agents, promulgated, performed, and perpetuated their policies, plans, and purposes, and through them the wrongs and abuses, if any, of life insurance have sometimes been inflicted on a confiding public. When plaintiff made his contract, he knew that he was to become an essential factor in the domestic affairs and internal organism of the defendant, and that such domestic affairs and internal organism were under the reserve power of the Constitution of this state, subject to legislative change. He became identified with the operation, development, and business life of the defendant and one of the organs of its corporate existence." The learned court then cites People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. and People v. Formosa, supra. Referring to the Formosa Case, the court said: "What was said in the above case is doubly emphasized when we recall that the act of 1906 was enacted in response to an aroused and urgent public sentiment as the result of grave evils and abuses disclosed by the processes of a legislative investigation. And, when it is also recalled that among such abuses were the methods employed by certain agents, the claim of plaintiff that his contract was not within the purview of the statute would seem to be completely refuted." We are unable to concur in this reasoning of the court below. The plaintiff, in executing his contract with the defendant, became its general agent in the foreign territory named, subject to the provisions thereof, nothing more nor less; and no inference is to be drawn that he became a factor in the domestic affairs, mechanism, internal organism, or policy of the defendant. The opinion of the court below then continues: "Were there otherwise any doubt that the legislation in question was within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, such doubt would be dissipated by reference to the following provision in such contract: 'This contract is made subject to the condition that the said company is and shall continue to be legally authorized to transact business in said district. Should authority to transact business in any section thereof be at any time terminated, this contract shall become null and void so far as new business in such section is concerned.' True, this provision in terms only relates to a total cessation of business. But the parties clearly had in mind the possibility that the legislature of this state might interdict the defendant from all business within the states, comprising the plaintiff's territory. They were also bound to know, what no one disputes, that said legislature might put the corporation to death. Knowing all this, it was a psychological impossibility for the parties not to include within their mental grasp the idea that the corporation might be limited or restricted in its operation in such a way as to affect the plaintiff's contract."

The court below in quoting from the contract, as above, is in error as to its terms only relating to a total cessation of business. The quotation is very clear when the other provisions of the contract are recalled. The defendant was entering upon an agreement with the plaintiff in regard to territory covering the four states named, and the first provision was that the contract was subject to the condition that the defendant should continue to be legally authorized to transact business in the district covered by these states; and, furthermore, it was provided that, should authority to transact business in any section thereof—that is, in any of the territory embraced by the four states—be withdrawn, the contract should become null and void so far as new business in such section is concerned. We cannot concur with the reasoning that this very proper provision in the contract relating to the four states named leads to the inference that the parties clearly had in mind the possibility that the legislature of the state of New York might interdict the defendant from all business within the states comprising the plaintiff's territory. It is doubtless true that the defendant, as a domestic corporation of this state, was bound to know the law that, if it violated the statutes of this state to such an extent as to merit corporate death, the legislature had full power and authority to inflict upon it that penalty. The result of such legislative action would terminate all contracts of agency which were, of course, dependent upon the continued life of both parties. We agree with the contention of plaintiff's counsel that the police power of the state cannot justify the reduction by law of the compensation which the defendant agreed in its contract with the plaintiff to pay him. We see nothing in the provisions of the contract, or in the surrounding circumstances of this case, that disclose a situation which warrants an appeal to the police power. While it has been frequently said that the police power cannot be defined, and it is not desirable to have it limited by a hard and fast definition, yet all the cases hold that it must be invoked in order to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort, and general welfare of the public. There is nothing in the facts of this case that brings it within any of the accepted definitions of the police power.

Referring to the nature of this power, Judge Peckham, in Health Department v. Trinity Church, 145 N. Y. 32, 27 L.R.A. 710, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

45 Am. St. Rep. 579, 39 N. E. 833, 835, said: "It has frequently been said that it is difficult to give any exact definition which shall properly limit and describe such power. It must be exercised subject to the provisions of both the Federal and state Constitutions, and the law passed in the exercise of such power must tend in a degree that is perceptible and clear towards the preservation of the lives, the health, the morals, or the welfare of the community, as those words have been used and construed in many cases heretofore decided." This general subject was considered in Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, at page 137, 38 L. ed. 385, at page 388, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499, at page, 501 the court said: "The legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business or impose unusual or unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police power is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts." See also Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 330, 333, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, 75 N. E. 404, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 263. The court below, at the close of its opinion, states that, "having reached the conclusion that the statute limits the amount which the defendant may lawfully pay the plaintiff, it is unnecessary to consider the further question raised by defendant as to the difference in the forms of policies."

We will now consider the second question, as to whether new forms of policies have been adopted upon which plaintiff is to recover changed commissions under the contract, subdivision "sixteenth," which reads as follows: "The commissions hereinbefore specified shall not apply to any new forms of policies hereafter adopted by the said party of the first part, but shall apply only to the policies now in use by said company, but changes in premium rates, or clauses in present forms of policies, shall not be construed as a new form of policy. It, however, is understood and agreed that the said second party shall be allowed and paid on any such new policies as large a brokerage and renewal commission as is paid to or allowed any other manager or agent of the company." The discussion of this question in the briefs and arguments of counsel has taken a wide range and considered many propositions that are irrelevant, in view of the fact that in deciding the first question we have reached the conclusion that § 97 of the insurance law (Laws 1906, chap. 326) does not apply to the contract between the plaintiff and defendant, as it is not retroactive. The sixteenth paragraph of the contract, already quoted, provides in part that "the commissions hereinbefore specified shall not apply to any new forms of policies hereafter adopted by the said party of the first part [the defendant], but shall apply only to the policies now in use by said company; but changes in premium rates, or clauses in present forms of policies, shall not be construed as a new form of policy." In subdivision "fifth" of the statement of facts it is agreed that "the words 'form of policy,' as used in the contract, have, prior to January 1, 1907, been interpreted by the parties as equivalent to 'plan of policy;' the whole life being considered as one 'form' or 'plan,' the limited payment as another 'form' or 'plan,' the endowment as another 'form' or 'plan,' etc." It is agreed that the policies on which the plaintiff seeks to recover his commissions (subdivision "ninth" in the statement of facts) are exhibits M and N, being the New York Standard Life Insurance policies. It is also agreed in said subdivision that, since January 1, 1907, the plaintiff has from time to time procured applications in his said territory for insurance which have been approved by the defendant company, and on which participating policies have been issued by the defendant, and for which the defendant has been paid in cash the first year's premiums thereon. It is further agreed that exhibit N is the twenty-year endowment; exhibit M embraces two "forms" or "plans" of policy, viz., 20-payment life and 10-payment life.

The defendant asks the court to hold that the foregoing policies are all new forms of policies under the contract, and, as such, are subject only to commissions as therein provided. Referring to the statement of facts, subdivision "ninth," it is agreed that since January 1, 1907, the defendant has received on policies procured by plaintiff in cash the first year's premiums on twenty-year endowment policies, exhibit N; 20-payment life policies, exhibit M; and 10-payment life policies, exhibit M. It appears these "forms" or "plans" of policies were not new. The 20-year endowment policy issued after January 1, 1907, is within the meaning of the contract the same "form" or "plan" as the twenty-year endowment policy issued prior to January 1, 1907. The same is true of the 20-payment life and the 10-payment life. In other words, changes in premium rates or clauses in present forms of policies are not to be construed as a new form. The various names applied to policies indicate the "form" or "plan" under which they are to be operated. We have in the statement of facts two illustrations of the rule above stated. It is agreed that, some years after the making of the contract and prior to January 1, 1907, the defendant issued a "new form of policy" called a "Coupon Bond," which both parties agreed was a new form within the meaning of the plaintiff's contract, and the defendant fixed the commissions thereon accordingly. It is also agreed that since January 1, 1907, the defendant has adopted for use outside of the state of New York a new form of policy known as the "five-year convertible term." We have, therefore, reached the conclusion that the policies involved in this submitted case are not new in "form" or "plan" as contended by the defendant. It follows that, under the stipulation of the parties, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for $191.54, without costs.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be modified by providing that the plaintiff should have final judgment for $191.54, without costs.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— N. D. —, 118 N. W. 826.)

Carriers — freight — exemptions from liability.

1. An inland common carrier is an insurer against loss of property consigned to it for carriage between its receipt at shipping point and arrival at destination when unaccompanied by the consignor, except from loss occasioned: (1) By an inherent defect, vice, or weakness, or spontaneous action of the property itself; (2) the act of a public enemy of the United States or of Headnotes by SPALDING, J.

Case Note. — Effect of shipper's negligence in loading car, or as to condition of car, upon the carrier's common-law liability.

It is the purpose of this note to show the effect upon the carrier's common-law liability to furnish a suitable car and properly load the goods, of some negligence upon the part of the shipper in loading the goods, or some act upon his part in permitting the goods to be negligently loaded, or to be loaded in a defective car, which act upon his part might be deemed contributory negligence so as to release the carrier from his common-law liability. Cases which treat merely of the right of the carrier to limit, by contract or otherwise, his common-law liability to furnish a suitable car, have been excluded, as have also cases which discuss the abstract question of the duty of the shipper to inspect the car. Upon the latter question, see this state; (3) the act of the law; (4) any irresistible superhuman cause; (5) and it may also be assumed that certain acts of the consignor may exempt the carrier from liability.

Same — injury — evidence.

2. On proof of delivery of the property to the carrier in sound condition, and of its redelivery at the end of the route in damaged condition, or a failure to redeliver it, a sufficient case is made to sustain a recovery for the damages or loss by the shipper.

Same — liability — burden of proof.

Upon the question of duty of carrier to furnish car adapted to the subject of the shipment, see case note to Forester v. Southern R. Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 508.

Numerous factors enter into the decisions, and it is frequently impossible to determine what the rulings have been under some different state of facts. Some of these different elements are shown in Leonard v. Whitcomb, 95 Wis. 646, 70 N. W. 817, where, after a review of numerous decisions upon the question, the court declared the following principles: "It is the duty of a railroad company: as a common carrier of live stock, to furnish suitable cars therefor, on reasonable notice so to do from a person desiring to transport such stock over its road: that this duty is absolute, and a contract exempting it from liability for damages arising from unsuitableness of cars so furnished, attributable to a failure on its part to exercise ordinary care, is void; that, if a car be furnished having defects rendering it unsuitable, which defects are not obvious or such as may be presumed that an inspection by an ordinary person will bring to his knowledge, and yet are such that a reasonably careful inspection by a person experienced in such business will lead to their discovery, an inspection and acceptance of the car by the shipper will not save the carrier harmless from damages caused by such defects, unless it be shown that they were actually pointed out to the shipper, and that he accepted the car with full knowledge of their existence."

Many of the cases hold that the mere knowledge on the part of the shipper that the car was defective would not exempt the carrier from liability for losses due to the defective condition of the car: but these cases do not pass upon the question of what the effect of actual negligence upon the part of the shipper would be.

Thus, in Ogdensburg & L. C. R. Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 123, 22 L. ed. 827, it was held that it was the duty of the carrier to furnish suitable vehicles for transportation; and, if he furnished unfit or unsafe vehicles, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — loss of freight — evidence.

4. The evidence in this case shows that a quantity of flax was loaded by the plaintiff and his servants into a car furnished by the defendant for such purpose, that inside doors were furnished by the defendant carrier, and used and fastened with appliances provided for that purpose by defendant, in the usual manner, and that the loss complained of occurred while such flax was en route to Duluth, some or all of it by reason of a small inside door used for retaining the flax in the car, hung on hinges at the top, coming open.

The defendant failed to show that the door opened by failure on the part of plaintiff to properly fasten it. It was closed by defendant's conductor at the station where the leak was discovered, but the inspector at Duluth reported a leak in the same he was not exempted from responsibility by the fact that the shipper knew them to be defective, and used them, even though there had been an agreement that it should not be liable therefor. This was an appeal from the supreme court of Massachusetts (102 Mass. 557), where the decision upon this point was to the contrary.

The principles of the Pratt Case have been followed by a number of other cases, some of which have cited it. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Marshall, 74 Ark. 597, 86 S. W. 802; Union P. R. Co. v. Rainey, 19 Colo. 225, 34 Pac. 986; Jones v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 115 Mo. App. 232, 91 S. W. 158; Potts v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 17 Mo. App. 394; Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 25 Mo. App. 473; Hunt v. Nutt (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 1031; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilhelm, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 558.

And in Peters v. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. 16 La. Ann. 222, 79 Am. Dec. 578, it was held that a carrier was bound to furnish a suitable and safe car, and was responsible for any loss arising from neglect of duty in this particular, and the mere presence of the owner and his knowledge of the defects did not lessen this responsibility, for he had no power over the train or right to make any change in the disposition of the cars, which were necessarily under the control of the defendant's agents.

So, in Forrester v. Southern R. Co. 147 N. C. 553, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 505, 61 S. E. 524, it was held that the fact that a shipper knew that the car to be used was unsuitable for the goods to be shipped was not sufficient to free the carrier from liability for losses due to furnishing such a car.

And in Welsh v. Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 65, 75 Am. Dec. 490, it was held that a carrier was liable for losses due to a defective car, notwithstanding the fact that it had stipulated against such losses, and the shipper had accepted the car with knowledge of the defects. And to the same effect was the decision in Gregory v. West Midland R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 944.

In Paddock v. Missouri P. R. Co. 60 Mo. App. 328, the same general rule was announced; but, on appeal, in 155 Mo. 524, 56 place on the arrival of the car at its destination. Held, that the evidence fails to bring the defendant within the exceptions to the law holding it liable.

Same — liability.

5. The shipper inserted in the car inside doors for retaining the flax, such doors being furnished by the carrier, and supplied with a fastening device. The evidence shows that these doors were properly fastened with the device so furnished, by the shipper and assistants, all of whom were familiar with the use of such doors and devices. The car, after being so loaded with these doors inserted, was receipted for, and the outside doors closed and sealed by the defendant's agent, who had full opportunity to observe, while closing the outside doors, whether the inside doors were properly fastened. Held that, if they were not properly fastened, in view of these facts, the carrier is not relieved from liability for loss occasioned thereby.

Same — loss of freight — evidence — jury — directed verdict.

6. Plaintiff showed by himself and other competent witnesses that the inside doors referred to were properly closed and fastened with the device furnished by defendant for that purpose.

The only evidence claimed to create a conflict arises from the fact that, a few miles after the car started on its journey, one of the inside doors referred to came open, and a quantity of flax with which the car was loaded ran out through the opening so made. Held, that such door opening may as readily be attributed to other causes as to the failure of the shipper to properly fasten it; and, had the question been submitted to a jury, a verdict for defendant, based upon the fact that such door came open in transit, could only have been arrived at by inference, and would have been mere guesswork on the part of the jury under the facts of this case, and that the opening of this door did not create a sufficient conflict in the evidence to constitute error on the part of the trial court in directing a verdict for plaintiff.

Directed verdict — motion for — conclusiveness — appeal.

7. On submission of all their evidence, both parties made motions for a directed

S. W. 453, the judgment was reversed; although this particular question was discussed, it was not determined, and the decision rests upon another ground.

In the following cases it was held that the act indicated would not prevent a recovery:

In Trexler v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 28 Pa. Super. Ct. 198, it was held that the act of the plaintiff in opening the door of a car for ventilation would not prevent a recovery for loss which was caused by the plaintiff's negligence, but which would not have occurred but for the open door, where the defendant's servants knew that the door was open, and acquiesced therein.

And in Wallingford v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 26 S. C. 258, 2 S. E. 19, it was held that the fact that the plaintiff accepted the cars furnished would not relieve the carrier from the duty of furnishing suitable cars.

So in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Townsend (Tex. Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 760, it was held that the plaintiff was not estopped from claiming damages by accepting a car with a defective roof, and refusing to allow the carrier, as it offered to do, to substitute a car with a good roof for the one in question, when it was about loaded, and before the journey began, where he had not absolutely refused to allow the substitution, but only had insisted that the roof of the car which he had been at great expense and trouble in loading, in ignorance of its defective condition, be repaired, which course was adopted by the carrier, and its agent had negligently made the repairs.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Brosius (Tex. Civ. App.) 105 S. W. 1131, it was held that a failure to furnish a safe car wherein to transport stock would be negligence on the part of the carrier, and such negligence, if any, would not be waived by the acts of the plaintiff in an attempt to remedy the defects of the car and to make it safer.

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Fairbanks, 33 C. C. A. 611, 62 U. S. App. 231, 90 Fed. 467, this question was not strictly involved, but the court said that it would not be conceded that the carrier could, by devolving upon the shipper the duty of selecting or inspecting the cars in which his goods are to be shipped, avoid the duty of furnishing fit and suitable cars for the carriage of goods.

Where a shipper himself assumes the duty of selecting the car, or of directing the loading, the carrier generally is not held liable for losses due to the kind of car, or its condition, or to negligence in the loading.

Thus, in Frohlich v. Pennsylvania Co. 138 Mich. 116, 110 Am. St. Rep. 310, 101 N. W. 223, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1140, it was held that if the shipper selected a car and loaded it with a commodity for which it was not suitable, and damage to the goods resulted, the carrier would not be liable on the ground of negligently furnishing an unsuitable car.

So, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hall, 58 Ill. 409, it was held that the carrier was not liable for injuries received because of the defective condition of cars belonging to another company, but selected by the plaintiff for the shipment in question.

And in Harris v. Northern Indiana R. Co. 20 N. Y. 232, it was held that where a shipper selects his cars for shipment, the carrier will be responsible for such injuries only as are caused by defects not palpable or not pointed out to him.

Where a shipper had a chance to hold his stock for another day or ship them in a box car, and elected to do the latter, it was held, in Huston Bros. v. Wabash R. Co. 63 Mo. App. 671, that the carrier was not liable for losses due to the fact that the box car was unsuitable.

So, where a shipper personally selected the vehicles by which certain perishable prop-verdict. Neither party requested the submission of any facts to the jury. Held, that they thereby waived any right which they might have otherwise had to an undirected verdict, and are estopped from assigning error for not submitting the facts to the jury.

(November 27, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Rolette County denying a motion for a new trial after judgment for plaintiff in an action brought to recover for the loss of a shipment of flax alleged to have been occasioned by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Murphy & Duggan, for appellant:

A carrier of freight is not liable for loss occasioned by the act of the shipper.

Hutchinson, Carr. §§ 265, 328; Van Zile, Carr. § 478; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Edins, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 639, 83 S. W. 253; Goodman v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 22 Or. 41. 28 Pac.

erty was to be transported, it was held, in Carr v. Schafer, 15 Colo. 48, 24 Pac. 873, that evidence tending to show that some of the vehicles were unsuitable was incompetent to show negligence on the part of the carrier.

Where, by the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs undertook to furnish and load the cars for the carriage of their animals, and reported themselves as competent to do the entire work of loading, it was held, in Fordyce v. McFlynn, 56 Ark. 424, 19 S. W. 961, that if the plaintiffs fulfilled this work in a careless manner, and caused the injury complained of, the defendant would not be liable, although there was a general duty resting upon the defendant or its agents to examine the trains under their control and see that they were properly loaded.

And in Ficklin v. Wabash R. Co. 115 Mo. App. 633, 92 S. W. 347, it was held that, conceding that the defendant was negligent in failing to furnish the kind of cars ordered, the negligence of the plaintiff in overloading the car would be deemed to be the proximate cause of an injury to the sheep; the court said that where experienced shippers knowingly and voluntarily took the risk of overloading the cars, they could not complain of the result reasonably to be anticipated.

In Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Word (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 14, it was held that if the shipper overcrowded the cattle in a car upon the assurance of the defendant that the car was larger than it was, the company would be liable for damages resulting therefrom; but if, with full knowledge of the size of the car, it was overcrowded by the direction and under the supervision of the plaintiff, there could be no recovery.

In the following cases it was held the acts of the shipper indicated would prevent a recovery:

894; Mitchell v. Champaign County, 5 Ohio N. P. 158; Camp v. Rogers, 44 Conn. 291.

The legislature cannot create absolute liability on the part of a railroad company in the absence of a statutory duty, and irrespective of negligence.

Catril v. Union P. R. Co. 2 Idaho, 576, 21 Pac. 416; Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Smalley, 1 Wash. 206, 23 Pac. 1008; Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Parsons, 100 Ala. 662, 27 L.R.A. 263, 46 Am. St. Rep. 92, 16 So. 602; Wadsworth v. Union P. R. Co. 18 Colo. 600, 23 L.R.A. 812, 36 Am. St. Rep. 309, 33 Pac. 515; Cairo & F. R. Co. v. Parks, 32 Ark. 131; Zeigler v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 58 Ala. 595; Jensen v. Union P. R. Co. 6 Utah, 253, 4 L.R.A. 724, 21 Pac. 904; Schenck v. Union P. R. Co. 5 Wyo. 430, 40 Pac. 840; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Morris, 65 Ala. 193; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. pp. 430, 436; Bielenberg v. Montana Union R. Co. 8 Mont. 271, 2 L.R.A. 813, 20 Pac. 314; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Lackey, 78 Ill. 55; Mathews v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 121 Mo. 298, 25 L.R.A. 161, 24 S. W. 591.

Thus, in Roderick v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 7 W. Va. 45, it was held that a common carrier would not be held liable for injury to a horse, occasioned by the improper interference of the plaintiff with the management of the car.

And in Lee v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 72 N. C. 236, it was held that a carrier is not liable for the loss of some horses which escaped through an unlocked door of a horse car, where the plaintiff told the carrier not to lock the door, as someone would accompany the stock.

So, in Hutchinson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 37 Minn. 524, 35 N. W. 433, it was held that the plaintiff's negligence in leaving open a car window through which his horse jumped and was injured, would prevent a recovery, even though the defendant was negligent in starting the train while the window was open. And the same general principle was followed in Newby v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 391.

Where the plaintiff's agent noticed the overcrowding of his hogs and the want of ventilation in the car, but did not mention the fact to the defendant's agents, and obtained a pass, so as to travel upon the same train, and, upon arriving at an intermediate station, did not insist upon having the cars detached so as to unload the hogs, it was held, in Squire v. New York C. R. Co. 98 Mass. 239, 93 Am. Dec. 162, that the plaintiff could not maintain an action against the carrier for damages due to the overcrowding.

And in Betts v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 21 Wis. 81, 91 Am. Dec. 460, it was held that no recovery could be had because of the unsafe condition of a car door where the agent of the plaintiff knew of the defective condition, and failed to notify the defendant's agents thereof. To the same effect taneous action of the property itself; (2) the act of the public enemy of the United States or of this state; (3) the act of the law; or (4) any irresistible superhuman cause." This section is, in the main, an enactment of the common law making common carriers insurers of property intrusted to them for transportation. In so far as it varies from the common law it does so in favor of the carrier. Many common-law authorities include the act of the shipper as among the exceptions relieving the carrier from liability, but even such authorities do not hold that all acts of every nature done by the shipper relieve the carrier. The liability of the carrier begins when he receives and accepts the goods, and continues until after their arrival at destination. The only defenses which the carrier can interpose, where property is lost in transit, are those named as exceptions relieving him from his liability as an insurer, except in cases where there is a special contract. This court cannot read into the statute an exception which existed at common law. State v. Smith, 2 N. D. 515, 52 N. W. 320. It will be presumed, by reason of the omission of the act of the shipper from the exceptions, that the legislature intended to still hold the carrier liable as against such actions as the principles of justice and fundamental law do not relieve it from. The difficulty lies in determining the line between those acts of the shipper which relieve the carrier from liability and those which, by reason of the evident purpose of the legislature, do not relieve it. The authorities on this subject are few in number. It is, however, clear that acts of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment by the shipper relieve the carrier. Fraud invalidates all contracts, and concealment or misrepresentation is fraud. Where the shipper interferes with the property after accepted by the railway company, and the loss is occasioned by such interference, it may well be contended that the carrier is also relieved; and we are disposed to the belief that, when the shipper assumes the responsibility of loading the car and seeing that it is properly prepared for the transportation of the particular article which he is loading, he assumes responsibility for all defects in package and loading which are necessarily invisible to the agent of the carrier who accepts the freight, or which he cannot discern by ordinary observation, or such inspection as he can readily make. In this case there is no evidence showing that the car was not properly coopered.

The question is whether it was the duty of the carrier, under the circumstances, to see that the small door referred to was properly fastened, and, if it did not do so, whether it is liable. As stated, the agent accepted the car and its contents for transportation, and he himself closed and sealed the outside doors. The devices for fastening the small doors were open to his inspection when he closed the outside doors, and were where he could not avoid seeing them if he looked at all, or even used ordinary care, or made the slightest effort to ascertain whether they were properly fastened. If he did not do so, or, doing so, failed to call the defect to the attention of the shipper or to remedy it himself, we think the fact, if it were a fact, that they were not properly fastened when he accepted the freight, under the circumstances of this case, does not relieve the defendant from its obligation as an insurer. The terms of the statute are very broad. It reads: "From any cause whatever."

The supreme court of Iowa passed upon this question in Kinnick Bros. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 665, 29 N. W. 772. The plaintiff in that case shipped a car load of hogs, some of which died in transit, and it was contended that their loss was occasioned by overloading the car. The court says: "Plaintiff's loaded the hogs on the car without assistance or direction from defendant's agents or employees. Defendant claimed that the car was overloaded, and that the injury was caused by such overloading. The court instructed the jury that, if defendant had knowledge of the number of hogs in the car, and of the condition of the car as to the loading when it received it, or if it might have known these facts, it could not escape liability for the damage on the ground that the car was overloaded. Exception is taken to this instruction, but we think it is correct. It is not claimed that there was any deceit or misrepresentation by plaintiff as to the condition of the car or to its loading. Defendant's agent, who made the contract for it, went to the car after the loading was done, and closed and sealed it. There was nothing to prevent him from seeing the manner in which it was loaded. As defendant received the property under these circumstances, and undertook to transport it to its destination, it should be held to have assumed all the liabilities of a common carrier with reference to it." This case is cited as authority in Swiney v. American Exp. Co. (Iowa) 115 N. W. 212. The case at bar is a stronger one in plaintiff's favor than the Iowa case, for the reason that most authorities recognize a distinction in favor of the carrier of live stock as against a carrier of dead freight. The doctrine of the Iowa case is followed in McCarthy v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 102 Ala. 193, 48 Am. St. Rep. 29, 14 So. 370, where the court says: "If the improper loading was apparent,—that is, was a fact which addressed itself to the ordinary observation of the carrier's servants,—or if it was not apparent, but the carrier was yet guilty of negligence, but for which the injury would not have happened, the carrier would be liable, notwithstanding the negligence of or imputable to the plaintiffs. If the cars used in this transportation were closed cars and came to the defendant with their doors closed, so that, without opening the doors, the condition of their contents could not be seen, we should say the improper loading, if they were indeed improperly loaded, was not apparent within the meaning of the rule we have stated." And in Ohio it is said: "The carrier may well refuse to receive the property unless it is properly packed; but, if he receives it, the duty attaches of exercising due care for its safe carriage. . . . Where . . . the carrier takes charge of the property for the purposes of carriage, the duty rests on him to show that the injury is attributable to the defective packing, and not to any fault or neglect on his part." Union Exp. Co. v. Graham, 26 Ohio St. 595.

On proof of the delivery of the property in sound condition, and its redelivery at the end of the route in damaged condition, or failure to redeliver all or a part of it, a sufficient case is made to sustain a recovery for damages or loss. The plaintiff may rest his case on evidence of these facts, and, unless the defendant then submits evidence showing the cause of the loss to be one or more of the excepted causes, the plaintiff must prevail. The burden of proof changes from plaintiff to the defendant when plaintiff has proven the delivery and the failure to redeliver. The authorities are practically uniform on this question, and the reason given is stated to be that, after delivery of the goods to the carrier, they are no longer subject to the shipper's supervision or observation. If they are lost by the carrier, the circumstances surrounding such loss are without the knowledge of the shipper. The means and proof of the facts causing the loss are ordinarily wholly within the control of the carrier and its servants. In most instances the shipper is compelled to do business with the carrier, and to intrust to its care on the road and in places distant from the shipper his property, and the burden of proving facts exempting itself from liability as an insurer rests upon the carrier, and requires it to show that the loss occurred by reason of one or more of the exceptions. Moore, Carr. 386; Hull v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 41 Minn. 510, 5 L.R.A. 587, 16 Am. St. Rep. 722, 43 N. W. 391; Norway Plains Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 61 Am. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Dec. 432, and note (1 Gray, 263); Wolf v. American Exp. Co. 43 Mo. 421, 97 Am. Dec. 406; Swiney v. American Exp. Co. supra; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Frankenberg, 54 Ill. 88, 5 Am. Rep. 92; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 518 (b), and cases cited. We see no reason for holding the statute in question unconstitutional by reason of the omission to include the act or fault of the shipper among the exceptions.

The second question raised by the appellant, namely, that, conceding the law to be constitutional, there was conflict enough in the evidence to require its submission to the jury, requires notice. As we have shown, the testimony of the plaintiff and his assistants who prepared and loaded the car and fastened the inside door with the appliances furnished by the carrier was all positive to the effect that the door had been properly fastened. It is contended that the fact that the door came open while the car was running creates a conflict in the evidence. We think there are two answers to this contention: First, the duty rested on the defendant to show that the loss was occasioned by the fault of the shipper, and the mere fact of the door coming open does not make the showing required. That the door was fastened is evident from the fact that it remained closed until some time after the car left Rolla. If it had not been fastened originally, the weight of the flax would have caused the door to swing open before the car started. The fact that it opened while in transit, in the absence of other proof as to the cause of its doing so, may be attributed just as logically to a rough track, or to the bumping of cars, or starting or stopping with a jar, or to a defect in the fastening, as to the failure to fasten it. Had it been given to the jury, any verdict which it might have found, based upon the fact that the door came open, would have been mere guesswork or conjecture, and, had it found this the cause of the loss, it could only have done so by inference. It will thus be seen that, at the most, the fact of its coming open, under the circumstances, furnished only a scintilla of evidence which might indicate a failure to fasten it. This court has long since, following the great weight of authority, rejected the scintilla theory of submitting cases to the jury. Fuller v. Northern P. Elevator Co. 2 N. D. 220, 50 N. W. 359. In Ogdensburg & L. C. R. Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 123, 22 L. ed. 827, the Supreme Court of the United States held that it is the duty of the carrier to furnish suitable vehicles for transportation, and, if he furnished defective or unsafe vehicles, he is not exempt from responsibility by the fact that the shipper knew them to be defective and used them. In Cleveland C.

C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Louisville Tin & Stove Co. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 924, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1034, 111 S. W. 358, it is said that the owner is not required to see that the cars are suitable or safe. He is not required to show negligence on the part of the railway company. All that he is required to show is the loss of his goods. No defect in the vehicle can excuse a common carrier from its common-law liability. See, also, Hutchinson, Carr. § 497; Elliott, Railroads, § 1478; Miller v. Northern P. R. Co. (N. D.) 118 N. W. 344.

At the close of the case, both parties submitted motions for a directed verdict. The court denied the motion of the defendant and granted that of the plaintiff. The defendant, after the denial of his motion, made no request to have any question of fact submitted to the jury. It is well established that, in such case, the party making the motion waives any right to insist that the court should consider other questions, and, in view of the fact that appellant did not call the court's attention to any other question, or request that any other part of the case be submitted to the jury, it is now estopped from making such claim. The language of Chief Justice Corliss, in Stanford v. McGill, 6 N. D. 536, 38 L.R.A. 760, 72 N. W. 938, as directly in point. He says: "The defendants having requested the court to direct a verdict in their favor, and the court having instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, on his motion, the defendants must be regarded as having submitted all controverted facts to the court for decision; no request having been made by them, after their motion for a directed verdict had been overruled, that any question of fact be submitted to the jury. It follows that if there is any evidence at all to support the verdict, in point of damages, the judgment must be affirmed. The defendants by their motion took the position that there was no question of fact which they desired to have submitted to a jury, and cannot complain of the decision of any question of fact on which the evidence is conflicting, which the court must be regarded as having made by instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff. After a party has moved the court that the jury be instructed to render a verdict in his favor, he must, if the court denies his motion, specifically request that there be submitted to the jury the questions of facts which he desires to have so submitted. Otherwise he is deemed to have acquiesced in the decision of such questions by the court; and, if the court directs a verdict in favor of the other party, on his motion, the defeated litigant is not in a position, in case of his failure to make such requests, to claim that any issue upon which the evidence is conflicting should have been left to the decision of the jury." See, also, First Nat. Bank v. Laughlin, 4 N. D. 391, 61 N. W. 473; Bank of Park River v. Norton, 12 N. D. 497, 97 N. W. 860; Larson v. Calder, 16 N. D. 248, 113 N. W. 103.

The order of the district court is affirmed.

Morgan, Ch. J., concurs.

Fisk, J., concurring specially.

I concur in the conclusion arrived at in the foregoing opinion; but, in doing so, I deem it unnecessary to express any opinion upon the question whether, by § 5690, Rev. Code, 1905, the legislative intent to depart from the well-established rule of the common law relieving the carrier from liability occasioned solely by the shipper's negligence. Conceding the law to be that the carrier is relieved from liability for loss occasioned solely by the negligence of the shipper, as at common law, which is the most favorable rule that is or can be contended for by appellant, still the order appealed from must be affirmed, for the reasons stated in the latter portion of the opinion, which meet with my approval.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

T. P. MELLON, Plff. in Err.,

Pleading — joinder of counts — election.

Case Note. — Right of attorney, in the absence of express agreement, to compensation for debarring himself from representing antagonistic interests.

Since it seems to be generally considered that the proper scope and application of the right to charge retainers is to remunerate counsel for being deprived, by being retained for one party, of the opportunity of rendering services for or receiving pay from the other, the question whether or not an attorney, in the absence of an express agreement, has the right to compensation for debarring himself from representing antagonistic interests, is simply another form of stating the question whether or not an attiff to elect upon which count he will stand is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court.

torney, in the absence of an express agreement on being employed generally or to prosecute or defend a suit, or series of suits, has the right to charge a retaining fee.

That he has such right has been recognized in several cases other than MELLON v. FULTON, and the cases therein cited and reviewed.

Thus, in Blackman v. Webb, 38 Kan. 688, 17 Pac. 464, it was held that an attorney and counselor at law, employed to defend one action already commenced and to prosecute another in contemplation, may recover from his client a retaining fee, although the contract of employment did not expressly or specifically mention such fee. The court, in this case, said: "When an attorney is engaged to prosecute or defend in an action, his entire services in that action are engaged for his client, and he cannot perform services for the adverse party. He is retained by his client for that entire action; and, whether his client may ever call upon him to perform services, or not, he cannot perform services in that action for the adverse party, nor can he receive any fee or compensation from the adverse party. All his skill and ability for that case are at the command of his client. A retainer of an attorney at law is presumably worth something to the client, and presumably a loss to the attorney, and, whether the attorney is ever called upon to perform any services, or not, in that case, he may, when the case is terminated, recover for whatever the evidence shows the retainer was worth." Whether an attorney may in any case recover a retaining fee, and also an additional amount for his services, was a question expressly left open by the court.

In Aldrich v. Brown, 103 Mass. 527, it was held that, after attorneys are retained, it is proper for them to charge a reasonable Statement by Turner, J.:

On February 12, 1904, M. Fulton, defendant in error, plaintiff below, sued T. P. Mellon, plaintiff in error, defendant below, in the district court of Oklahoma county, on open account for professional services rendered in the sum of $782.90, a copy of which is filed with his petition, which contains two counts, the first being upon an express contract and the second upon quantum meruit. On May 7, 1904, defendant filed motion to require plaintiff to elect upon which count he would stand, alleging the same to be inconsistent, which said motion was overruled by the court and exceptions saved. On November 2, 1904, defendant filed answer, in effect a general denial and set-off, evidenced by open account, alleged to be due from plaintiff to defendant, in the sum of $88.37. On November 4, 1904, plaintiff filed reply, in effect a general denial, and on May 12, 1905, by leave of court, defendant filed supplemental answer to plaintiff's petition, claiming a set-off in fee for retainer without any special contract. Eggleston v. Boardman, 37 Mich. 14, holds to the same effect, the court saying that retainers are uniformly and universally charged, and that the same may be recovered under the common counts.

It was also recognized in Blair v. Columbian Fireproofing Co. 191 Mass. 333, 77 N. E. 762.

In Perry v. Lord, 111 Mass. 504, it was held that the fact that one who had a claim which he intended to prosecute at law sent for an attorney and employed him as counsel through the whole case, the latter accepting, and giving him advice several times, was sufficient to warrant a recovery by the attorney in an action for retainer.

In California it is also held that, in estimating the value of an attorney's services, it is proper to include in the consideration a reasonable retaining fee. Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 19 Pac. 698; Roche v. Baldwin, 143 Cal. 186, 76 Pac. 956; Clements v. Watson, 7 Cal. App. 74, 93 Pac. 385.

However, in Re Schaller, 10 Daly, 57, where the question arose upon an application to confirm the report of a referee, it was held that an attorney who is employed to act as the general adviser of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, and who conducted several suits in the course of his regular duties, is not entitled to charge a retaining fee.

So, in McLellan v. Hayford, 72 Me. 410, 39 Am. Rep. 343, the right of an attorney to a retaining fee as a matter of law was denied: there being in this case no express or implied agreement to the contrary between the parties.

The necessity of an express agreement to recover a retainer was also recognized in Windett v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 144 U. S. 581, 36 L. ed. 551, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 751.

all the sum of $124.01 in full liquidation of plaintiff's claim. After supplemental reply, to wit, on May 4, 1905, on motion of plaintiff, the cause was referred to a referee "with full power to hear and determine all the matters in controversy between the parties and make his finding, his conclusions of law, and conclusions of fact, and report the proper judgment to the court," which he subsequently did, and which the court, on April 2, 1906, after overruling defendant's exceptions thereto, approved and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $673.63, together with costs, from which said judgment defendant appealed and prosecuted the same by petition in error and case made to the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma, and the same is now before us for review.

Messrs. Harris & Wilson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. M. Fulton and Selwyn Douglas for defendant in error.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first error assigned is that the court erred in overruling the motion to require plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action stated in his petition he would stand. It is urged in support of this contention that, as the first count declares upon an express contract and the second upon a quantum meruit, they are inconsistent, and for that reason the court should have required the election. We do not think so. It is a familiar rule of pleading that, when the plaintiff has two or more separate reasons for the obtaining of the relief sought, or when there is more or less uncertainty as to the grounds of recovery, the petition may set forth a single claim in more than one count. 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 321. Accordingly it has been expressly held in a large number of cases that a quantum meruit count may be joined with a count founded on express contract. See Id. 324; Ware v. Reese, 59 Ga. 588; Wilson v. Smith, 61 Cal. 209; Hawley v. Wilkinson, 18 Minn. 525, Gil. 468; Wagner v. Nagel, 33 Minn. 348, 23 N. W. 308; Plummer v. Mold, 22 Minn. 15; Manders v. Craft, 3 Colo. App. 236, 32 Pac. 836—where this is held to be the rule, although the Code provides, as in this jurisdiction, that the petition shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language, without unnecessary repetition, and that the question of overruling or sustaining such a motion is within the sound discretion of the court. That being the case, as we see no abuse of discretion in the action of the court in overruling the motion, we cannot say the court erred in so doing.

Plaintiff's account sued on, which does not contain many forgotten items of proper charge, contained, among other items, the following charge: "Retainer fee December 1, 1898, to December 1, 1903. $300.00,"—which was allowed by the referee in his report, as follows: "I further find that, in consequence of the conversation had by and between the plaintiff and defendant on the 1st day of December, 1898, that the plaintiff was given the right to believe that he was retained up to the 1st day of December, 1903; a retainer consisting, as it does, of giving the party retaining rights to expect professional services of the party retained in all respects. It binds the person retained not to take a fee from anyone against the party retaining, to do nothing except what he is asked to do, and that when a party places an attorney in a position in which he, as such attorney, is deprived from taking litigation against or giving advice against the party so retaining him, he is entitled to be paid therefor: all of which T. P. Mellon did in this case, and M. Fulton so acted and rendered services. And I further find that such retainer fee was reasonably worth the sum of $60 per year, and did continue for five years, and the same is allowed in the sum of $300." Which was excepted to by the defendant for the reason: "That there is no legal evidence presented in this record establishing a contract for a retaining fee between plaintiff and defendant for the period found by the referee; that such contract is by the statute of frauds required to be in writing, signed by the party to be charged, because being a contract not to be performed 'within a year.'" The court overruled the exception, and this is the next assignment of error.

As the findings of the referee upon the facts have the effect of a special verdict of a jury, and will not be set aside by this court unless clearly against the weight of the evidence (Erismann v. Kerwin, 8 Okla. 92, 56 Pac. 858), let us see if there is any testimony reasonably tending to support this part of the report. The testimony discloses that in December, 1898, defendant was a merchant just opening up his "Fair" store in Oklahoma city in a building belonging to one Pettyjohn: that he was at that time having some trouble with Pettyjohn over some goods and fixtures in said store; that plaintiff was a lawyer occupying offices above the store; that plaintiff was called on to assist defendant in the matter, at which time defendant retained plaintiff, in effect, to assist not only in that, but in all matters of a legal nature that might arise in the future, and said to plaintiff that he would tell his manager to come to plaintiff for his assistance from time to time as his services might be required, and requested plaintiff to attend to the business, all of which he agreed to do; that there was no contract in writing between them, and nothing was said at any time about the amount plaintiff was to receive for his services, or how long the arrangement was to continue, but he was given to understand that he was generally retained in a professional way; that, pursuant to the said understanding, from that time up to the date of the last item of the account sued on (some five years), defendant and those in his employ consulted plaintiff regularly; that he represented defendant in a number of matters in and out of court, always with the understanding from the beginning of the retainer that he would not advise or receive employment from others against defendant's interests; that, during that time, the account sued on accrued for services thus rendered, in which said account plaintiff made the charge complained of, and in support thereof showed to the referee, as stated, and that his services on this general retainer were reasonably worth $60 per year, or $300 for the five years he so served defendant. As defendant admits that, beginning December, 1898, he did employ plaintiff, and agreed to pay him a fee in the various cases as they might arise from time to time, but denies that he retained him generally or as regular counsel, the question of whether the employment was a general or special one was settled by the referee on conflicting evidence in favor of the former, and we do not feel disposed to interfere with the finding. That being the case, we do not see why the items should not constitute a proper charge.

It goes without saying that an attorney is as free to make any contract with his client on the subject of compensation for his services as is any other individual. Or, as said by Cooley, J., in Detroit v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 281: "The employment of counsel does not differ in its incidents, or in the rules which govern it, from the employment of an agent in any other capacity or business." In the absence of express contract, as in this case, he is entitled to what the services are reasonably worth. The referee, in effect, found, and correctly, that plaintiff was entitled to compensation, beyond the actual itemized services rendered, for debarring himself by implied agreement from accepting employment from others when their interests were antagonistic to those of defendant; that such was contemplated in the retainer, and that defendant was bound to compensate him for it in such sum as such service was reasonably worth. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

That such is a proper item of compensation in such general employment was held in Kelley v. Richardson, 69 Mich. 430, 37 N. W. 514. That was a suit for professional services rendered by plaintiff, on a general employment as attorney for an executrix, extending over many years. The question before the supreme court on appeal was whether the testimony of the various lawyers who testified contained such elements that they could show the value of plaintiff's services by their opinion. On this point the court, in passing, said: "If Mrs. Richardson had come to Judge Kelley now and then, or ever so frequently, without any general employment, and asked him to-day to draw a petition, or a deed, or an affidavit, or to go into court and argue a single case, and no more, there would be some reason for saying that for each of these detached services he should charge a separate price, and, in case of dispute, prove its separate value. But any such practice in regard to a general employment would be unreasonable and impracticable, and would be just as much so in everyday affairs as in legal affairs. . . . The employment means that he becomes professionally informed concerning private affairs of his client which he has no right to reveal, and that he has formed, perhaps on long study, an opinion concerning the right of his client, and the best remedy to enforce it. It means, further, that he debars himself from employment by any other person concerning the matters in controversy. Any standard of reward which leaves out any of these considerations would be wrong."

Yates v. Shepardson, 27 Wis. 238, was a suit on an itemized account for services rendered by plaintiff on a general retainer. In the trial court it was proposed to show that plaintiff was entitled to recover $1,000 per annum as an annual counsel fee from 1853 to 1868, inclusive, in consequence of this general retainer, and for advice given where no charge had been made and for which no bill of particulars had or could be given. On appeal the supreme court disallowed the item, and on a rehearing adhered to its former opinion, and, in passing, said: "What the plaintiff proposed to show was that, some time in 1853, he was generally retained by the defendant. . . . but without any price being stipulated therefor. . . . It was not proposed to show that he gave professional advice in any particular matter for which he had the right to claim a proper compensation, or that he had declined acting as counsel for others against the defendant, and thus lost the opportunity of performing services for which he might possibly have received a reasonable fee,"—thereby intimating very strongly, as we take it, that, had such been shown, as was done in this case, the charge would have been a proper one.

Hence we say that, under the testimony, the item was a proper charge in estimating the worth of plaintiff's services under the general employment found by the referee to exist; and to have failed to regard it would have been wrong. It was not disputed that such service was reasonably worth $60 per year, or $300 for five years, charged in plaintiff's account, and, as we are of the opinion that the finding is reasonably supported by the evidence, we do not think the court erred in overruling defendant's exception to it.

As there was nothing in this arrangement to prevent either party from terminating the retainer at any time, we do not think the contract was within the statute of frauds as one not to be performed in one year, as urged by plaintiff in error. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 952.

Among other items, plaintiff's account also contained the following charge: "December 10, 1903, mechanics' lien cases, suits in district court vs. Mellon, and mechanics' liens and legal services on lien filed, not sued, $300.00,"—which was allowed by the referee as follows: "I further find that the services rendered in mechanic lien cases, suits in the district court, and mechanic liens and legal services on liens filed, on which suit was not brought, was reasonably worth the sum of $200, and allowed the same in the sum of $200,"—which was accepted to by the defendant for the reasons: (1) "That said finding is not supported by sufficient evidence, and is against the weight of the evidence. (2) That, from the testimony, it appears that said work was never performed by the said plaintiff, and that he, after starting the work in said cases, refused to finish it, and defendant was compelled, for his own protection, to employ other counsel, which he did,"—and asks that plaintiff be allowed not to exceed $100 for his services in said cases. The court, however, overruled the exception, which constitutes the next assignment of error.

It is not necessary to enter into an elaborate discussion of the testimony bearing on this finding. We think it sufficient to say that it is amply supported by the evidence, which is, in short, that, during the existence of this retainer, plaintiff was engaged in the construction of a building in Oklahoma city: that his contractors became involved, and, as a consequence, several mechanics' liens were filed against the building; that one or more suits were brought to enforce the same, in which there were interventions by a number of lien holders; that plaintiff represented defendant in these suits and in interventions, and pursued a policy of delay in order to bring about an adjustment of the matter; that one importunate lien holder was settled with, and other liens were in course of settlement when defendant refused to pay plaintiff anything on account for services rendered; that friction then arose between them, at which time plaintiff had a conversation with defendant over the telephone in which he asked defendant whether he wanted him to continue as his attorney in the lien cases, and was informed that he did not, and that suit was then brought by plaintiff on this account in full for services rendered. Plaintiff testified that the value of his services in these cases was reasonably worth $300. Another witness, who was a lawyer, perfectly familiar with the extent and character of the services rendered, testified that they were reasonably worth $600. The referee found and reported them to be reasonably with $200, and we will not disturb the finding.

As these are the only items of the account allowed by the referee and specifically excepted to and urged as error in the brief of defendant, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in approving the report of the referee and entering judgment thereon in favor of plaintiff, and for that reason the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

In San Antonio Brewing Asso. v. Brents, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 88 S. W. 638, in holding that an existing lease of premises used for saloon purposes was not terminated by the subsequent adoption of local prohibition, the court placed its decision upon the ground that the lease did not restrict the lessee from using the premises for any other purpose; however, the court intimated that had the lease been such as to deny the right to use the premises for any other purpose, a different question would have been presented.

And this doctrine was applied in Kerley v. Mayer, 10 Misc. 718, 31 N. Y. Supp. 818, affirmed without opinion in 155 N. Y. 636, 49 N. E. 1099, where, after a lease was entered into, but before the commencement of the term, it became impossible for the lessee to obtain a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors because of the passage of an act prohibiting the granting of the same where the business was to be carried on within 200 feet of a building occupied exclusively as a church or schoolhouse. The court said: "It is only when the lessee is deprived without his fault of the use of the premises for any purpose that rent ceases; and, if the lessee was deprived in this instance, it was his own fault, for he should have stipulated against the contingency of a refusal of a license"

But it was held in Houston Ice & Brewing Co. v. Keenan, 99 Tex. 79, 88 S. W. 197, that a lease of premises for a term to begin at a future date, restricting the use thereof for saloon purposes only, is not terminated by the adoption before the beginning of the term of local prohibition so as to absolve the lessee from liability for rent. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Shields, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Complainant, on August 31, 1902, leased a certain house and lot situated in Knoxville, Tennessee, and owned by him, to the defendant for a term of eight years, to be used as a saloon or place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, as expressed in the written lease that day made and executed by both parties. The defendant entered into possession of the property, and paid the rent contracted for to November 1, 1907, but after that declined to further use it, or to pay any rent. Complainant sues to collect rent accruing since November 1, 1907. The contract of lease was exhibited with and made a part of the bill, and therein the terms of the contract and the purposes for which the property was to be used are fully set forth.

The chancellor sustained a demurrer to the bill upon the ground that, by chapters 17, 206, 207, pp. 81, 752, 755, Acts Gen. Assemb. 1907, the sale of intoxicating liquors was made unlawful and prohibited in the city of Knoxville from and after November 1, 1907, and therefore the purpose for which the lease was made was from that time illegal, and the contract void and unenforceable; and complainant has brought the case to this court for review.

There is no error in the action of the chancellor. When the contract was made, the purpose for which the property was leased—the sale of intoxicating liquors in Knoxville—was lawful, and the lease valid and enforceable. Afterwards, November 1,

The court stated that, as the local-option law was in existence when the lease was entered into, the lessee knew that the use of the demised premises might become illegal, and, in order to relieve himself from liability in that event, he should have stipulated therefor.

It was held in Miller v. Maguire, 18 R. I. 770, 30 Atl. 966, that, where there is no restriction as to the use of demised premises, the lessee is not constructively evicted, so as to absolve him from payment of rent, by reason of the fact of the establishment of a schoolhouse within such distance of the leased premises as to prevent a renewal of his license for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

It was held in Barghman v. Portman, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 342, 14 S. W. 342, that the lessee of a hotel and barroom took subject to legislative regulation; and that it was no violation of the terms of the lease for him to advocate and vote for a local-option law, which rendered the procurement of a further license for the sale of intoxicating liquors impossible.

See also on this subject Lawrence v. White, post, 966.

1907, that purpose was made unlawful by the acts of the general assembly above referred to, and thus, by operation of law, the lease became and is void and unenforceable at the instance of either party.

It is a principle of general application that all contracts are void which provide for doing a thing which is contrary to law, morality, and public policy. Yerger v. Rains, 4 Humph. 259; Wetmore v. Brien, 3 Head. 723; Henderson v. Waggoner, 2 Lea, 134, 31 Am. Rep. 591; Rhodes v. Summerhill, 4 Heisk. 205; Page, Contr. § 326.

It has been applied to contracts of this character, and held, for that reason, that the rent contracted to be paid could not be collected. Ralston v. Boady, 20 Ga. 449; Sherman v. Wilder, 106 Mass. 537; Mound v. Barker, 71 Vt. 253, 76 Am. St. Rep. 767, 44 Atl. 346; Riley v. Jordan, 122 Mass. 231; Holmead v. Maddox, 2 Cranch, C. C. 161, Fed. Cas. No. 6,629; 2 Taylor, Land. & T. § 521.

The rule is the same when the purpose of the contract, although lawful when made, becomes unlawful by statute enacted before the full performance of its terms. In Mr. Parson's work on Contracts (vol. 2, p. 674) it is said: "That the illegality of a contract is in general a perfect defense must be too obvious to need illustration. It may, indeed, be regarded as an impossibility by act of law; and it is put on the same footing as an impossibility by act of God, because it would be absurd for the law to punish a man for not doing, or, in other words, to require him to do that which it forbids his doing. Therefore, if one agrees to do a thing which it is lawful for him to do, and it becomes unlawful by an act of the legislature, the act avoids the promise; and so if one agrees not to do that which he may lawfully abstain from doing, but a subsequent act requires him to do, it [this act] also avoids the agreement."

In Hammon on Contracts, § 210, pp. 345, 346, it is said: "Where the performance of an executory agreement which was lawful in its inception is made unlawful by subsequent enactment, the agreement is thereby dissolved and the parties are discharged from its obligation."

Other text-books are to the same effect. Clark, Contr. 681; Lawson, Contr. §§ 423, 424.

The rule has also been frequently applied by this and other courts of last resort. In Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Green, 9 Heisk. 592, it was held that a contract for the payment of Confederate notes, lawful when made, but afterwards made unlawful by law, could not be enforced. It is there said: "The law had therefore made it impossible for the plaintiffs to perform that portion of the condition precedent which required them to demand payment in Confederate notes. The nonperformance of a contract will always be excused where it is occasioned by act of law."

The case of Gray v. Sims, 3 Wash. C. C. 276, Fed. Cas. No. 5,729, is directly in point. This was a suit upon a policy of marine insurance. The vessel insured was to be employed in importing goods from Calcutta or Madras into the United States, and the contract of insurance specified this as one of the purposes of the voyage. After the policy was written, and before the return of the vessel, it became by act of Congress illegal to import goods into the United States from those points. The master undertook to do so, and the ship was seized and confiscated. The loss was within the terms of the policy. A recovery was denied. The court said: "But, if the contract be legal when it is made, and the performance of it is rendered illegal by a subsequent law, the parties are both of them discharged from its obligation. The insured loses his indemnity and the insurer his premium."

Other cases in accord are: Sauner v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 41 Mo. App. 480; Corrigan v. Chicago, 144 Ill. 537, 21 L.R.A. 212, 33 N. E. 746; Jamieson v. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co. 128 Ind. 555, 12 L.R.A. 652, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 613, 28 N. E. 76; Presbyterian Church v. New York, 5 Cow. 538.

It is not necessary in this case to determine whether or not the contract contained in the lease restricts the use of the property for the sale of intoxicating liquors. It was the purpose of both lessor and lessee, as clearly expressed in the instrument, that it should be used as a saloon, and, this being made unlawful by law, the contract is no longer enforceable.

The decree of the chancellor is affirmed, with costs.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Richmond County to review a judgment refusing to abate the rent on certain premises. Affirmed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

James B. White leased to Bryan Lawrence a hotel in the city of Augusta, known as the "Albion Hotel," for the term of five years, to begin on the opening of the hotel for the reception of guests not later than April 20, 1901, with privilege of renewal. The stipulated rent was $10,000 per annum, payable in monthly instalments of $833.33. The only portions of the written contract of lease which need be set out are as follows: "The leased premises consist of the corridor, office, bar, barber shop, cigar stand, billiard room, on the first floor, boiler house and kitchen fronting on Ellis street; the second, third, fourth, and fifth stories of the hotel proper; the open court on the second floor; the open courts fronting on Ellis street, to which the tenants occupying stores fronting on Broad street are entitled to use in common with the tenant herein named. . . . The said Bryan Lawrence, tenant, subject to the provisions hereinafter stated, may sublet the news stand, cigar stand, barber shop, billiard room, and barroom; provided, that all such subletting shall be with the distinct contract and agreement on the part of the subtenants that the premises, or parts of the premises, sublet to them, shall be conducted, kept, and maintained in a quiet, peaceable, orderly, and reputable manner, the tenant herein especially agreeing that the bar and billiard room shall be kept free from disorder and all objectionable features and maintained in a quiet, peaceable, orderly, and reputable manner, and that, if there is any violation of this agreement, the said subtenant or subtenants failing to carry out the agreements herein shall at once be evicted by said Bryan Lawrence, or, upon his failure so to do, that the lease of the premises described herein may immediately, or at any time thereafter, at the option of the lessor, be declared at an end, and the lessor entitled to re-enter and take possession of the entire premises: Provided, also, and it is distinctly understood and shall be a part of the agreement with every subtenant, that if, for any reason, this lease is forfeited, abandoned, or terminated, that the rights of said subtenant or subtenants to the part of the premises sublet to him or them shall at once cease and become void, and such subtenant or subtenants may be evicted. . . . If at any time there shall be any disagreement between the parties as to the rights and duties of the parties, or either of them, or as to the meaning or construction of these presents, or if any dispute, difference, or issue shall arise between the parties touching the effect of these presents, or of any clause or thing herein contained, then every such dispute or matter in dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of two persons of kin to neither of the parties, one arbitrator to be appointed by each party. And both the parties hereto agree to stand to, abide by, and perform any award rendered under the provisions of this lease, and this paragraph. . . . It is distinctly agreed by the tenant that, as a material and essential part of this contract, the said Albion Hotel and the premises hereby leased shall be used, occupied, and operated for hotel purposes alone, and that the said Albion Hotel, in furniture, appointment, fare, and service, and in every other respect, shall be conducted and maintained as a first-class hotel, and that the same shall be conducted and maintained in a businesslike, orderly, and reputable manner, and substantially like other first-class hotels in the South. . . . But nothing herein shall deprive, or be construed to deprive, the lessor of the right to resort to the courts for the enforcement of any rights hereunder, nor shall this contract be construed to deprive the lessor of any statutory or common-law remedy for the collection of rents or damages for breach of the covenants herein stipulated." It was also provided that, if the premises should be wholly destroyed by fire before the expiration of the lease, the liability to pay rent should cease, and, in case of damages by fire, rendering the premises temporarily untenable, repairs were to be made, and no rent required while this was being done. The lease was renewed after the first term for five years more.

On August 6, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 81), an act passed by the legislature was approved, prohibiting the manufacture or sale of alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors in the state after the expiration of that year. After this act became operative, the lessee claimed that he was entitled to an apportionment and reduction of the rent, because of his inability to further conduct the business of a bar in the hotel. A correspondence ensued between him and his landlord on the subject. He sent to the landlord the key of the bar, writing him that: "As I have been prohibited from using this part of the property for that purpose, by the law of the land, and as I rented it for that purpose, I have no use for it for any other purpose." The landlord returned the key to the barroom, declining to make an abatement in the rent on account of the effect of the prohibition law, and demanded the payment of rent at the monthly rate stated in the lease. In one of his letters the lessee demanded an arbitration. The lessor declined to allow any abatement in the rent, and sued out a distress warrant for the past-due rent at the monthly rate stipulated, and also a dispossessionary warrant, for the purpose of evicting the lessee from the premises on account of the failure and refusal to pay the rent without abatement. The lessee thereupon filed an equitable petition, claiming an abatement of the rent to be made in proportion to the diminution in rental value because of the legal impossibility of operating a barroom on the premises, and praying that the lessor be enjoined from prosecuting the actions at law commenced by him, and for process and general relief. It is unnecessary to set out the evidence further than to state that the lessee testified that the agent of the lessor, in negotiating with him in regard to the lease before it was first made, had informed him that parties had endeavored to rent the bar for $5,000, and that, if the witness would lease the bar and hotel, he (the agent) would give him the names of the parties who had offered to rent it, so that the lessee could realize from the bar that amount, and that he could take that into consideration in making an agreement as to the amount of rental he was to pay; that the witness stated to the agent that, by reason of the location of the bar within the hotel, it was absolutely necessary that the witness should control the conduct and management of it if he should lease the hotel property; that the value of the bar was urged as a reason for increasing an offer made by him for the rent—19 L.R.A. (N.S.) al; and that it induced him to make the offer of $10,000 for the bar and other parts of the hotel property, as subsequently set out in the lease. In the correspondence between the parties the attorneys for the lessor denied the statement which had been made in a letter of the lessee, that the bar was largely the inducement which controlled him in making the lease at the price named, and stated that the lessor insisted that the hotel was leased as a whole, and that he was in no respect responsible or liable for the effects of state prohibition on the property leased. On the hearing of the application for interlocutory injunction it was denied, and Lawrence excepted.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The question in this case is whether the lessee of a hotel, including a barroom, was entitled to a reduction or proportional abatement of the agreed rental because, during the term of the lease, the legislature of the state enacted a law prohibiting the sale of alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, and thus the bar could no longer be used for that purpose. The adjudicated cases with unusual uniformity answer this question in the negative, though they do not all give the same reasons for the ruling.

It has been very generally held that the enforcement by public officers of restrictions or conditions in regard to the use of leased premises does not amount to an eviction of the tenant. And it has been suggested that a basic principle on which these rulings may rest is that, to constitute a constructive eviction by the landlord, the act complained of must have been done by the landlord or by his procurement, with the intention and effect (or perhaps with the natural effect) of depriving the lessee of the use and enjoyment of the demised premises, in whole or in part. Taylor v. Finnigan, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, and note; (189 Mass. 568, 76 N. E. 203).

In Abadie v. Berges, 41 La. Ann. 281, 6 So. 529, it was said that "a landlord cannot be held to warranty and indemnity against the 'acts of the law,' in the absence of express stipulation to that end. Should a tenant sustain damage in consequence of a constitutional police legislation adopted subsequently to his contract of lease, such as the 'Sunday law,' which forbids the use of the property rented to a particular use to which the lessee applies it, in a special way and on a special day, such damage is injuria sine damno, which is not compensable. Such legislation could have been foreseen, and does not impair rights under the contract." In San Antonio Brewing Assn. v. Brents, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 88 S. W. 368, it was held that "a lease which recited that the building was let for the purpose of conducting a first-class saloon, 'and shall not be used for any disreputable purpose,' and providing that the premises should not 'be sublet for any purpose other than for conducting a saloon, without the consent of the landlord, in writing,' did not limit the use by the lessee to saloon purposes, nor release him from liability for rent after the adoption of prohibition of that business under the local option law." In Teller v. Boyle, 132 Pa. 56, 18 Atl. 1069, it was held that "the lessee under a lease containing a covenant that, under penalty of forfeiture, he would neither occupy nor permit the premises to be occupied otherwise than as a saloon or a dwelling, without the lessor's written consent indorsed, is not released from liability for the rent by a failure to obtain a license to sell liquors." In Barghman v. Portman, 12 Ky.

L. Rep. 342, 14 S. W. 342, a contract of rental for a one-half interest in a hotel which had a barroom attached to it was made for a term of years. In the opinion it was stated that "a barroom was attached to the hotel, and, no doubt, was one of the principal sources of revenue to the proprietor. The local option law, passed by the legislature after the making of this contract, deprived the appellee of this source of profit, and reduced the proceeds from the hotel greatly. Barghman, who owned the hotel in conjunction with Portman, was an ardent advocate of the law, and it is urged that this act of his so far affected the contract as to authorize its rescission. Without discussing this question, we need only say that, if a renting, the lessee took it subject to legislative regulation; and it was no violation of the terms or the spirit of the contract for Barghman to vote either for or against the sale of liquor." In Houston Ice & Brewing Co. v. Keenan, 99 Tex. 79, 88 S. W. 197, premises were leased for three years "for the saloon business." Afterward prohibition was adopted in the county by an election held under the local option law. The tenant contended that the stipulation in the lease that the premises should be used for the saloon business constituted an express covenant that said premises should be used for no other purpose, and that, inasmuch as such use became illegal by the adoption of prohibition in the county by an election, this absolved him from liability for the rent. Under the stipulation in the lease then being considered, that the premises should be used for saloon purposes, the court was of opinion that the tenant covenanted to use them for no other purpose. But, in spite of this, it was held that "the fact that such business was rendered unlawful by the result of the election did not relieve him from his obligation to pay the rent;" and it was added: "The law being in existence when the lease was made, he should have provided in the contract against the contingency of its being put in force in the county if he wished relief from his obligation in that event."

In Miller v. Maguire, 18 R. I. 770, 30 Atl. 966, it was held that "the inability of a lessee to obtain a renewal of his license for the sale of intoxicating liquors on the leased premises because the power of the license commissioners to grant a license had been taken away by the erection of a public school by the city of Providence within 400 feet of the premises is not an eviction. To constitute an eviction which will operate either to annul a lease or to suspend the rent, some act must have been done by the landlord or by his procurement, with the intention and effect of depriving the lessee of the use and enjoyment of the demised premises, in whole or in part." In Kerley v. Mayer, 10 Misc. 718, 31 N. Y. Supp. 818, a lease was made of certain premises "to be used and occupied only as a strictly first-class liquor saloon." After the execution of the lease, but before the commencement of the term, the legislature enacted a law forbidding the sale of liquor within 200 feet of a church or schoolhouse. It was held that this did not release the lessee, as he was not deprived of the beneficial use of the premises. The court thought that the provision that the premises should be used only as "a strictly first-class liquor saloon" did not restrict the use of the premises to saloon business only, but merely restricted the character of that business conducted there, so that it should be first-class. In the opinion of Daly, Ch. J., it was said: "It is only when the lessee is deprived, without his fault, of the use of the premises for any purpose, that rent ceases; and, if the lessee were deprived in this instance, it was his own fault, for he should have stipulated against the contingency of a refusal of a license."

In the English case of Newby v. Sharpe, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 39, a landlord let the basement of a store to a tenant "with full and undisputed right and liberty to store cartridges therein," covenanted to keep the premises in proper repair and condition, so as to be available for storing cartridges, and also covenanted for quiet enjoyment. Other parts of the store were at that time let to other persons for storing gunpowder. Soon afterward what was known as the explosives act of 1875 was passed, making it illegal to store cartridges and gunpowder in the same building. The landlord, upon the act coming into operation, removed the tenant's cartridges out of the building. A correspondence ensued, and the landlord stated to the tenant that the basement was at the disposal of the latter, but that, if he stored cartridges there, the landlord must, to protect himself from liability, give notice to the authorities. The tenant thereupon commenced his action to restrain the landlord from obstructing the storing of his cartridges, and to compel him to do everything necessary to enable the plaintiff to store them there, and for damages. Fry, J., held that the tenant was entitled to damages for the loss of the use of the demised premises, on the ground that the landlord's acts amounted to an eviction. On appeal it was held that judgment must be entered for the defendant, for that (1) there had been no eviction, the removal of the plaintiff's cartridges being only a trespass; and (2) there had been no breach of covenant by the defendant, for that the covenant to keep the premises in proper condition for storing cartridges only referred to their physical condition, and that the grant of liberty to store cartridges there did not impart a warranty of the legality of so storing them, nor did anything in the lease bind the landlord to procure licenses to make the storage legal. In Nicholls v. Byrne, 11 La. 170, the plaintiffs alleged that they leased a lot of ground in the city of New Orleans, fronting on the Mississippi river, for the purpose of breaking up flatboats and cutting and selling firewood and lumber; that, soon after they took possession, they were notified by Warfanger to cease using the premises for that purpose, in pursuance of a city ordinance passed after the date of the lease, which expressly prohibited the demolishing of flatboats, rafts, etc., within the limits of the city; and that, in consequence of such order, they were dispossessed of their lease, and were entitled to a cancellation of it, together with damages. The court held that "lessees have no right to complain of the city ordinances which restrict them in some of the uses of the leased property, provided such ordinances are legal; and, if illegal, the lessee can protect himself. It does not invalidate his lease by dispossession, or otherwise disturb him in the enjoyment of the leased premises. . . . The restriction of privileges in using leased property by city ordinances affords no justification in withholding rent." See also Chase v. Turner, 10 La. 19. In Gazlay v. Williams, 210 U. S. 41, 52 L. ed. 950, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 687, it was held that a sale by a trustee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt's interest was not forbidden by, nor was it a breach of, a covenant for re-entry in case of assignment by the lessee or sale of his interest under execution or other legal process, where there was no covenant against transfer by operation of law; thus distinguishing between the act of the law and the act of the party. See also McLarren v. Spalding, 2 Cal. 510; International Trust Co. v. Schumann, 158 Mass. 287, 33 N. E. 509; Baker v. Johnson, 42 N. Y. 126; Kellogg v. Lowe, 38 Wash. 293, 70 L.R.A. 510, 80 Pac. 458; 24 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1133; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 627, 628.

The exact question here involved has not been determined in this state; but the analogies of the law point in the direction indicated above. Thus, Civil Code 1895, § 3135, declares that "the destruction of a tenement by fire, or the loss of possession by any casualty not caused by the landlord, or from defect of his title, shall not abate the rent contracted to be paid." In Fleming Bowles v. King, 100 Ga. 449, 28 S. E. 239, it was held that the tenant of a rented house is liable for the stipulated rent to the end of his term, although the house, before the expiration of such term, may be destroyed by fire, unless the landlord does acts which in law amount to an eviction of the tenant, and that "erecting an inclosure around the rented premises and pulling down the walls of the burned building, these things being done by the landlord under orders of the municipal authorities, for the purpose of insuring safety to the public, are not such acts." While the word "casualty," as used in § 3135 of the Civil Code of 1895, does not include an effect arising from legislative action, the hardship is no greater in the latter case than in those covered by that section. In either case the tenant may protect himself by proper agreements in the lease. In Fitzgerald v. Witchard, 130 Ga. 552, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 519, 61 S. E. 227, the municipal authorities received the prescribed fee and issued licenses authorizing certain persons to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors for the remainder of the year. Before the expiration of the year, the general assembly enacted a law requiring a much higher license fee for the right to sell liquors in the county where the city was located. The licensee thereupon ceased to engage in the sale of liquors, and applied to the municipal authorities for a return of so much of the money paid for his license as would be in proportion to the time in which he did not engage in such business. After the year covered by the license had expired, the mayor and council then in office granted the application, and resolved to refund the proportionate part of the money. Citizens and taxpayers filed an equitable petition to enjoin them from doing so. This court held that such a petition was not open to general demurrer. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Justice Atkinson said, if it be assumed that the licensees quit business because of the act of the legislature, "the agency which prevented the licensees from enjoying the privileges was the state law, separate and distinct from the municipal government."

It is urged that the facts in cases of the character cited above differ from those in the present case. This is true to some extent, but not so as to prevent the applicability of the principle involved in them to the case in hand. The mere fact that, when the tenant rented the property, it was thought that he could continue to sell liquor there, would not entitle him to a proportionate abatement of the rent because the legislature subsequently prohibited the sale of liquor in the state. If it would do so, why should not licensed druggists insist that they had been prevented from doing the business of filling prescriptions for liquors or for alcohol except under close restrictions? No doubt this was known to them and their landlords to be a profitable part of their business, which 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) has been cut off by the act of the legislature; but it would hardly be contended that every druggist who occupies a rented store could claim a reduction in the rental on that ground. Similarly, many grocers who formerly sold wines and liquors were prevented from doing so further by the act of the legislature; but it could not be said that if, when they leased their stores, it was anticipated that they would continue such sale, they would be entitled to an abatement in the rent because of the legislative prohibition.

It was urged that the lease now involved specifically named the bar, and that its operation was a material consideration entering into the lease of the hotel. In the illustrations just given it could no doubt be frequently proved that both landlord and tenant knew that the latter was selling wines, alcohol, or liquors, and that this was a material part of the business. The mere use of the word "bar" in the lease did not amount to a covenant or warranty on the part of the landlord that the law would continue to allow the tenant to conduct the business of keeping a bar and selling liquors, or a covenant by the tenant that he would do so. The property rented was known as the "Albion Hotel." In describing it the following language was used: "The leased premises consist of the corridor, office, bar, barber shop, cigar stand, billiard room, on the first floor; boiler house and kitchen fronting on Ellis street; the second, third, fourth, and fifth stories of the hotel proper; the open court on the second floor; the open courts fronting on Ellis street, to which the tenants occupying stores fronting on Broad street are entitled to use in common with the tenant herein named." From the last clause quoted, as well as from a statement appearing in the correspondence between the parties in regard to the controversy, it would seem that the entire building was not rented to the lessee, but that there were some tenants of stores on the first floor not included in the hotel proper. The language quoted was merely descriptive of what was rented, not a covenant on the part of the tenant to conduct the business of keeping a barroom, or a warranty on the part of the landlord that the law would permit him to continue to do so. Nor did other portions of the lease have that effect. It would be no more proper to hold that the employment of the words "bar" and "barroom" amounted to a covenant to use the place thus designated for the sale of wines, beer, or liquors, and for no other purpose, than it would be to declare that the words "billiard room," "barber shop," and "kitchen" imported a covenant on the part of the tenant to use the rooms so described for billiard and pool playing, barbering, and cooking, respectively, and for no other purpose, or that the place designated as the "office" should be put to no other use by the tenant than to keep an office there. And the provision in regard to keeping good order does not make a covenant of exclusive use for the business of selling liquors.

It was argued that, as to the bar, the tenancy was terminated; and cases were cited to the effect that where an apartment in a building is rented, and the building is destroyed, the tenancy ceases (Gavan v. Norcross, 117 Ga. 356, 360, 43 S. E. 771); also, to sustain the contention that, if there is a substantial destruction of the subject-matter of the lease by the act of God or the public enemy, rent ceases (9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 631); that eviction by the landlord results in suspension of rent, eviction by another from a portion of the premises, under paramount title, entitles the lessee to an apportionment of rent (24 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1186, 1187); that, according to some authorities, if part of the premises are taken by condemnation under the power of eminent domain, the rent may be apportioned, and that to the general rule that a party to a contract is not discharged by subsequent impossibility of performance there is an exception where the performance becomes impossible by law (9 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 629-631; Civil Code 1895, § 3725). These propositions, as abstract rules, do not require discussion. They do not aid the plaintiff in error, because they do not apply to the facts of this case. Neither the leased premises nor any part of them have been destroyed. No act of Providence or of the public enemy has affected the status. The only act complained of is that of the Georgia legislature. There has been no eviction of the tenant from the premises by the landlord or by one holding paramount title, and no condemnation of any part of them. Nor has the law prevented the carrying out of the written contract between these parties. An underlying error in the contention of the plaintiff in error arises from dealing with the contract of lease as different from what it really was. The landlord leased to the tenant a certain hotel, including a bar-room, cigar stand, etc. The tenant contracted to pay certain rent, that the premises should be used for hotel purposes alone, and that it should be a first-class hotel, with other agreements not material now to recite.

The argument for the plaintiff in error treats the lease, so far as relates to the bar-room, as a lease of the "bar privilege" or the right to sell liquor. Such is not the effect of the written lease. The landlord leased the premises to the lessee. So far as he was concerned as landlord under the law as it then stood, he gave the lessee the privilege of using a portion of them for a bar, or of subrenting. But he did not contract or warrant that the law would remain unchanged, or that there should be any diminution of rent if a change occurred. It may be unfortunate for the lessee that he did not anticipate the possibility of the passage of a prohibition law and provide for such a contingency; but that he did not do so does not alter the contract as made. The lessee is still entitled to the occupancy and use of the premises. The landlord, who had nothing to do with making the sale of liquor by the lessee impossible under the law, is entitled to his rent. The law has not made it impossible to perform the contract of rental of premises. That must not be confused with the prohibition by law of selling liquor on the rented premises. See, on incidental injury from police laws, Menken v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 668, 2 S. E. 559; State v. Griffin, 69 N. H. 1, 41 L.R.A. 177, 76 Am. St. Rep. 139, 39 Atl. 260.

It might be remarked that, prior to the passage of the prohibition act, there existed in Georgia a local option law, and all persons were bound to know that there was a possibility that the sale of liquors might be prohibited in any county under an election held for the determination of that question: also the sale of liquors has, for a great many years, been the subject of legislation, regulating, restricting, or prohibiting the business in different localities, and this must have been known to all men. But the argument of notice from special facts is unnecessary. The sovereign state, in its police power, may pass laws restricting or prohibiting the sale of liquors. Landlords and tenants who make contracts of leases of premises are bound to know that the state has such a power, and, in the absence of any provision in a lease for an abatement of the rent in case of the exercise of it, or similar provision, the landlord will not be held to warrant against the possible action of the state in that regard, and the tenant who leases the premises will not be entitled to an abatement of rent because the state prohibits the sale of liquors.

Long before the passage of the prohibition law, a person desiring to conduct the business of selling intoxicating liquors had to obtain a license. The licensing authorities had certain powers in regard to granting or refusing it. Suppose that a landlord had rented a room to a tenant who expected to keep a bar there, the landlord agreeing to let him have the room, and the tenant agreeing to pay a stipulated rental therefor; but suppose, upon application, the tenant failed to obtain a license, and could not conduct a bar on the premises; would it be contended that the landlord could not collect his rent? If the landlord delivered the rented premises to the tenant, and did not obstruct their lawful use by the tenant, the latter could not claim an abatement of rent because of his own inability to obtain a license. The landlord did not guarantee that the tenant could obtain a license, unless it was so expressed in the contract. The loss from inability to conduct a certain business would fall on the tenant desiring to do so, not on the landlord, who had nothing to do with causing such loss. So likewise if, after commencing the business of keeping a bar, the license of the tenant should be revoked, in the absence of an agreement on the subject, he would not be entitled to a diminution of the rent. And this would be true whether the revocation of the license by the authorities was on the ground of misconduct of the tenant, or in the lawful exercise of the police power on other grounds. Similarly, if the legislature substantially terminates all licenses, or prohibits the issuance of future licenses, or the conduct of such business, by the passage of a general prohibition law, the inability to procure a license or to conduct the business of selling liquors without it furnishes no reason in law for refusing to pay the rent agreed for the premises on the theory of an eviction, a breach of covenant, or a failure of consideration. If it was desired to provide against contingencies or possibilities of this character, such provision should have been made a part of the contract. Mere anticipation or expectation that the tenant will be able to procure a license, or to keep it, or that the state will not restrict or prohibit business of the character which he expects to conduct, does not, upon disappointment, cast the loss upon the landlord, unless it be so provided in the contract. The tenant can still use the premises for other purposes not prohibited by law or the contract.

It was argued by counsel for the defendant in error that the contract was entire, not severable; that the tenant retained possession of all of the rest of the premises, and only offered to surrender the barroom; and that this could not be done so as to claim an apportionment of the rent. As the case is controlled by what has been said already, it is unnecessary to deal with this contention. The doctrine of equitable mistake was also invoked by the plaintiff in error; but the case made was not such as to render it applicable.

2. The contract contained a provision that if, at any time, there should be any disagreement between the parties as to their rights and duties or those of either of them, or as to the meaning or construction of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contract, or if any dispute, difference, or issue should arise between them touching the effect of the contract or of any clause contained in it, "then every such dispute or matter in dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of two persons akin to neither of the parties, one arbitrator to be appointed by each party." The tenant requested an arbitration of the matter of apportioning the rent; and the landlord, instead of agreeing thereto, brought suit. The argument was that this was in violation of the stipulation quoted. In regard to this contention two points may be suggested: (1) The contract contains the following: "But nothing herein shall deprive, or be construed to deprive, the lessor of the right to resort to the courts for the enforcement of any rights hereunder, nor shall this contract be considered to deprive the lessor of any statutory or common-law remedy for the collection of rents or damages for the breach of the covenant herein stipulated." (2) The stipulation in a contract providing that, in case of difference between the parties, it shall be referred to arbitration, does not prevent either party from resorting to the courts in the first instance without such reference, unless such stipulation amounts to a condition precedent to the right to sue, or (what is substantially the same thing) makes such submission the only mode by which the amount of damage may be ascertained, or by which liability can be fixed. When an agreement having the effect of ousting the courts of jurisdiction might be against public policy is not now involved. Leonard v. House, 15 Ga. 473; Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Creighton, 51 Ga. 95; Adams v. Haigler, 123 Ga. 659, 51 S. E. 638; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 570-573. Judgment affirmed.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

MARY SHUM, Admr., etc., of W. H. Shum, Deceased,
v.

RUTLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Vt. —, 69 Atl. 945.)

Evidence — presumption of care.

1. One killed at a railroad crossing under circumstances of which there was no witness cannot be presumed to have been in the exercise of due care in an action to hold the railroad company liable for his death, where the burden of showing due care is on the plaintiff.

Railroad — crossing accident — precautions — availability.

2. If a pedestrian struck on a railroad crossing by an engine running 60 miles an hour could, in approaching the crossing, have seen 165 feet along the track when 4 feet therefrom, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that any prudence he might have exercised in looking along the track would not have avoided the accident because of the excessive speed of the engine.

Appeal — directed verdict — view by jury — effect.

3. A verdict directed for defendant in an action against a railroad company for killing a person at a railroad crossing will not be reversed where nothing in evidence before the court tends to show the exercise of care by the person killed, or anything that in law would excuse it, merely because the jury viewed the premises and might have seen something not disclosed by the evidence which would have warranted a recovery.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to the direction by the Rutland County Court of a verdict in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Judgment affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Butler & Moloney for plaintiff.

Messrs. H. Henry Powers and P. M. Meldon, for defendant:

The absence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, contributing to the injury, must be affirmatively shown by the plaintiff; and no presumption of freedom from such negligence arises from the happening of the injury.

If the traveler could have seen, or by listening could have heard, the train, it will be presumed, if a collision occurred, that he did not look or listen, or did not heed what he might have seen or heard; and such conduct is negligence per se.

A traveler upon a highway, when approaching a railroad crossing, ought to make a vigilant use of his senses of sight and hearing in order to avoid collision; and if, by neglect of this duty, he suffers injury, he cannot recover from the company, although it may itself be guilty of negligence, or fail to give the signals required by statute, or be running at the time at a speed exceeding the legal rate.

Central Vermont R. Co. 72 Vt. 190, 47 Atl. 797.

Munson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's intestate was killed in the Wallingford yard, at the first crossing north of the station, on Sunday, the 3d day of January, 1904, about a quarter past 5 in the afternoon, while walking westwardly directly across the track, by a "wild engine" coming from the south at a great speed, called by one witness full 60 miles an hour, and without a headlight or any signal other than a whistle nearly half a mile south of the station. There had been a considerable fall of light snow the day and night before, and it was then very cold, with some wind from the north, and some snow in the air. The engine passed, with sounds described as unusually loud, emitting clouds of smoke and steam, which settled down and around it, and producing a jarring effect, noticeable in houses near the crossing, but not noticed by a witness, who stood on the west side of the crossing 7 or 8 rods from the track. Witness placed this in the edge of the evening,—just about dusk,—while it was light, but not as light as in broad day, and spoke of the objects testified to as plainly visible.

Note. — Presumption of care of person killed at railroad crossing, see case note to Hanna v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 344.

As to right to rely on presumption of self-preservation in an action for negligent killing, in order to prevent nonsuit, where there were no eyewitnesses, see case note to Adams v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. Co. 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 844, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The line of the railway through this yard is a long curve with the bend to the west. The station is south of the crossing, on the easterly or inner side of the curve. The distance from the crossing to the station is not given, but one witness gives the distance to the water tank as 10 or 12 rods, and the station is said to be a little farther south. The size of the building does not appear. There is a side track east of the main track, extending from the station to and beyond the crossing, and east of the siding is a spur track, which ends 30 or 40 feet south of the crossing. Along the east side of the spur is a loading platform 5 feet high. Estimates of the space between the main track and the siding range from 5 to 10 feet. At the time of the accident there were 3 or 4 box cars on the siding south of the crossing, and 2 or 3 on the spur. The cars on the siding came within about 30 feet of the crossing, and the nearest car on the spur may have been anywhere from 10 to 50 feet further south. There is nothing to show how far the side of a box car projects over the rail. There was a pile of wood east of the platform, containing 15 or 20 cords, which extended north of the platform to within 10 or 15 feet of the crossing, and was about 8 feet high at the north end. Of the witnesses who gave their recollection of the number and location of the cars, one testified that the view of a person making a turn from the south onto the crossing would be so obstructed by the cars that he could not quite see to the main line, but that he could probably see down towards the depot between the cars; and another testified that a person 4 feet from the east rail of the main track could not see along that track to the south more than 10 or 12 rods. The radius of the curve is not given.

A street runs north from the station alongside the yard, with houses on the easterly side facing the tracks. The deceased lived in one of these houses, a little distance north of the crossing, and was employed in shops just over the railroad near the end of the crossing. He had lived and worked in these places for twenty years, and had passed over the crossing four times a day 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nearly every week day during that time. There have been a few regular trains on Sunday, and occasionally an extra, for several years. The passing of trains usually produced a jarring sensation in the vicinity of the crossing. The deceased was very deaf, and had been so for at least thirty years. He could not hear ordinary conversation, but could be communicated with by one standing close to him and speaking very loudly. His son was accustomed to attract his attention by stamping on the floor. He could hear a railroad whistle near by, and knew of the passing of trains by the jarring sensation produced.

The railroad crossing is in a street which runs east and west, crossing the street running north from the depot substantially at right angles. On the occasion of the accident the deceased came up the street from the south, and turned to the left to go over the crossing. A witness, who lived in the second house on the south side of the street running east, saw him from her window as he made the turn and approached the side track. She states that he wore a cap pulled down over his ears, and was walking rapidly, and looking straight ahead. The witness watched him until he had crossed the side track, and then looked south for the engine, and so was unable to say whether he looked to the right or the left before coming to the main track. Another witness, who lived in the first house on the south side of the street running east, saw him for a second while sitting by her window, and looked away, fearing an accident. She described him as between the two tracks going straight ahead, and could say no more. The deceased's cap had a flap that could be pulled down to cover the ears, and he was wearing it in that manner a few minutes before the accident. The cap was found the next morning between the main track and the siding, nearly 9 rods north of the crossing, with the flap turned down. The body was found soon after, in a dismembered condition, about a quarter of a mile from the crossing, on the same side of the track. A verdict for the defendant was directed on motion at the close of the plaintiff's case.

The general rules applicable in cases of this character are well settled. One who is about to cross a railroad track must look and listen for an approaching train, and must stop to listen if that is necessary to enable him to listen effectually. If his vision is obstructed, he must be specially vigilant as regards his hearing. If circumstances are such that his hearing cannot be relied upon, he must look with special care. He must continue to look and listen, as he approaches the track, until the last moment when the discovery of a train would avail for his protection. Manley v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 69 Vt. 101, 37 Atl. 279; Carter v. Central Vermont R. Co. 71 Vt. 190, 47 Atl. 797.

The plaintiff says it is to be presumed that the deceased was exercising the required care at the time he was killed; but the cases cited in support of this claim are from other states. The rule in this state puts the burden as to contributory negligence on the plaintiff. It is said in Walker v. Westfield, 39 Vt. 253, that to make a case upon which the plaintiff can safely rest he must submit evidence upon which the jury would be authorized to find affirmatively that no want of care on his part contributed to the accident. In Bovee v. Danville, 53 Vt. 189, the court declared this to be the doctrine of all our cases, and expressly repudiated any language that might seem to indicate the contrary. This court has applied the rule in cases where death has resulted from an unobserved accident. In Hyde v. Jamaica, 27 Vt. 445, the intestate was drowned while attempting to drive through a stream at a ford way. No one saw him after he entered the stream, and there was nothing to indicate the particular manner in which the accident occurred. It was assumed, in disposing of the case, that the intestate was not in fault in attempting to cross the stream. But it was considered that the law required the exercise of due care while in the stream, and that this could not be presumed, but was a fact for the plaintiff to establish. But it is not necessary that the evidence be that of an eyewitness. In Lazelle v. Newfane, 69 Vt. 306, 37 Atl. 1045, the plaintiff was so injured that he lost all recollection of what occurred, and the person riding with him was killed. The accident occurred on a bridge, and the injuries were caused by going over the log which formed a guard rail on the side of the bridge. The plaintiff had a gentle, manageable, and safe horse, with which he was familiar, and was driving towards the bridge on a walk when last seen. The wheel tracks showed that the horse came upon the bridge properly, and then cramped the wagon and backed it against and over the log. The court considered that these circumstances were evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care. The opinion says that from these facts "the jury might well infer that the plaintiff, presumably possessing the common instincts of self-preservation, did not contribute in any degree to the accident." The writer of this opinion dissented in that case, but his dissent failed to be noted. It would seem, however, upon a review of the opinion, that the clause quoted does not refer to a presumption in aid of the finding that the plaintiff was driving with due care, but to a presumption that the plaintiff, when suddenly imperiled by the backing of a horse without his fault, did all that he could to save himself. This view relieves the opinion of any erroneous suggestion that might otherwise be found in it. It certainly was not intended to limit the opening proposition of the opinion that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence in any degree.

The Lazelle Case was cited in Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt. 89, 47 Atl. 409. In that case the intestate and his three companions were killed while attempting to cross a double-tracked road after the passage of a train on the nearer track, by a train coming from the opposite direction on the farther track. It was stated at the outset that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that the intestate and his companions were not guilty of contributory negligence. But, in passing upon defendant's motion that a verdict be directed for a failure in this respect, after referring to evidence which tended to show that the track could have been seen in the direction of the approaching train for a considerable distance, the court said: "It may be reasonably inferred from the circumstances, taking into consideration the disposition of persons to take care of themselves and avoid injury, that, while waiting for the freight train to pass, and until they started along, the decedent and his companions looked and listened to guard against any westbound train which might be approaching on the northerly track." This follows the Lazelle Case, as it might naturally be construed, but is clearly inconsistent with our established doctrines. The instinct of self-preservation cannot be made the basis of a presumption that due care was exercised, where the burden of proving due care is placed on the plaintiff. Nor do we consider this instinct entitled to a recognition inconsistent with our rule. The presumption that one who realizes his peril will do what he can to save himself is quite different from a presumption that one will be prudent and not incur danger. A multitude of accidents result from the occasional carelessness of people who are generally prudent. "The careless act usually precedes the moment when the natural instincts of self-preservation are aroused." Chase v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 62, 52 Am. Rep. 744. Moreover, the requirement of due care cannot be satisfied in this jurisdiction without looking and listening, and the performance of this duty cannot be inferred from the fact of opportunity without relieving the plaintiff from the burden of showing the required care. We could not follow the courts which make an exception in cases where the injured party is killed and there is no evidence regarding his conduct, without departing from the holding in Hyde v. Jamaica. But, if the views expressed in the Boyden Case were held to be consistent with our decisions, the application made of them could not be sustained; for there were witnesses in that case who saw the occurrence, and all the authorities hold that there is no room for a presumption of due care when there is direct evidence on the subject. We conclude, therefore, that there is no presumption that plaintiff's intestate was in the exercise of due care, and that the case must be disposed of on the evidence submitted. The intestate was under observation as he approached the track, and almost until the moment of the accident. The undisputed testimony is that he was walking rapidly, and looking straight ahead as he passed along the crossing, and that, when last seen, he had entered the space between the siding and the main track, and was still looking and walking straight ahead. There is no circumstance disclosed by the evidence that tends to show that he was mindful of the risk incurred.

It is claimed, further, that the view was so obstructed by the cars, and the speed of the engine so great, that, if the deceased had looked for a train, his looking would have been of no avail. This leaves out of consideration the fact that the deceased, very hard of hearing at best, had his cap pulled over his ears. But the question will be taken up independently of this circumstance. It is said that, if the deceased had seen the engine, he would not have had time to get off the track. The question is rather whether he could and should have seen the engine in time to have kept off the track. The deceased was familiar with every feature of the situation. The case leaves the side track to the north unobstructed, so the last look should have been to the south. The deceased's movements were not dependent on the control of a team, and the arrest of his forward movement could have been practically instantaneous. There is no evidence that brings the end car on the siding nearer to the crossing than 30 feet. Here we are met by the fact that there is no evidence as to the degree of the curve. The only evidence in the case that covers this point, and thus completes the description of the location, is the testimony of two witnesses, who gave the position of the cars and their judgment as to the distance a person approaching the track could have seen to the south. The witness most favorable to the plaintiff stated that in his judgment a person 4 feet from the east rail could not have seen down the track more than 10 or 12 rods. The plaintiff ignores this evidence, and bases her claim wholly upon mathematical calculations, in which assumptions supply the place of satisfactory information regarding the curve. But we have evidence sufficiently definite to enable us to use the estimate of the witness understandingly. If we treat the speed of the engine as 60 miles an hour, the highest estimate, and assume that a person walking rapidly covers 4 miles an hour, as is assumed by the plaintiff, the deceased would go 1 foot while the engine was going 15, or $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet, the ordinary step of a man walking rapidly, while the engine was going $37\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Then, if we assume that the deceased had just stepped over the east rail when struck, which is as far as the evidence can be claimed to indicate, the engine would have been 75 feet away when the deceased was 4 feet from the track, or 2 steps back from the position in which he was struck. Upon this basis it would seem that the deceased must have taken the step preceding that which brought him over the nearest rail, with the engine in plain view. If, instead of taking that step, he had taken a step to the rear, he would have remained in safety. But this treatment of the matter is not presented as the basis of our conclusion. The niceties and assumptions of the calculation are not essential; for if the deceased, when 4 feet from the rail, could have seen the track for the 10 rods estimated by the witness, 165 feet, it certainly cannot be said that, if he had been looking as he reached that point, his prudence would have availed him nothing.

It is also claimed that a verdict cannot be directed in a case where the jury have been permitted to view the premises, inasmuch as the things they have seen are evidence, and may embrace matters that are not, and perhaps could not be, included in the case as sent up. We cannot accept this view. If there is nothing in the case submitted to the court that tends to show an exercise of care, or something that in law excuses it, the court will not reverse the judgment on the conjecture that the jury may have seen something not shown by the exceptions.

Judgment affirmed.

Hall, Superior Judge, dissenting:

I am unable to assent to the opinion of the majority of the court, because in my view it fails to recognize a sound principle of law accepted by this court a decade ago, and, in effect, overrules two well-considered cases of this court. On trial of said cause, after plaintiff rested, the court, on motion of defendant, directed a verdict for the defendant, upon the ground that the plaintiff had not shown that her intestate was free from contributory negligence. In considering the question whether the court erred, the evidence must be taken in its most favorable light for the plaintiff. Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt. 89, 47 Atl. 409; Smith v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 177 N. Y. 224, 69 N. E. 427. If there are opposing inferences to be drawn from the evidence and circumstances bearing upon the question of contributory negligence, it was the duty of the court to submit that question to the jury. This proposition has been too long and too well settled to call for authorities. The inferences which a court might draw from the evidence are not controlling. The question is, What inferences might a jury legitimately and reasonably draw therefrom? Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt. 85, 47 Atl. 409.

While the statement of facts in the majority opinion does not differ materially from the following, I have recited certain facts appearing in the record (not recited in the majority statement), especially with reference to the character, habits, and caution of plaintiff's intestate, which seem to me to have an important bearing upon the question of contributory negligence. At Wallingford yard on the date in question the defendant's main line ran northerly and southerly on a curve, with the bend towards the west,—the degree did not appear. On the east side of the main line, running to a point north of where the accident occurred, there was a switch track or siding. Running from the depot on the east side of the switch track to a point near the crossing where the accident occurred was a spur track. On the switch track or siding there were 3 or 4 box freight cars, on the south side of the crossing, the nearest within 30 feet of it. At the north side of the spur track there was a platform for loading cars. Beside it was a pile of pulp wood (the north end within 15 feet of the crossing) of 15 or 20 cords, ranging from 5 to 8 feet in height; and there were a few cars on the spur track. It did not appear how far it was from the spur track to the siding, but from the siding to the main track was about 10 feet. (The majority opinion adopts "5" feet. There was evidence tending to show that it was "5" feet and that it was "10" feet. I adopt that most favorable to plaintiff.) It was in evidence that you could not see southerly from the crossing, on the main line, until within 3 or 4 feet of it (and when within the zone of danger), and then only 10 or 12 rods. It did not appear how far south of the crossing the depot was, or the size of exact location of it, except that it was on the east side of the main line. From south of the depot running along beside the spur was a traveled road leading north of the crossing, called "Railroad street." The crossing, where the accident occurred, was on a street called "Mill lane," running in an easterly and westerly direction.

On the evening of the accident, Sunday, January 3, 1904, it was cold and blustering, with the thermometer 20 degrees below zero, and the wind blowing from the north; there had been a fall of light snow, and snow was in the air; some lights had been lit. The accident occurred from a quarter to half past 5 in the evening. Defendant was running a "wild engine" towards the north very fast,—two witnesses say at the rate of a mile a minute; several witnesses, located at different places, say it was running very, very fast, that the fact was commented upon at the time,—and the engine did not slow up while passing through the village. There was no headlight and no warning by blowing a whistle (except at a crossing about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile below and southerly of the station) or ringing the bell. When the engine passed through the yard it was emitting clouds of smoke and steam, that settled down around it so that it could hardly be seen; the smoke and steam remaining for a minute or more after the engine passed. Some said there was a loud rumbling noise, but this was not noticed by a witness 7 or 8 rods west of where the accident occurred. He testified that clouds of steam and smoke were all around the engine; that the smoke and steam from the engine, when 7 or 8 rods away, was what attracted his and his brother's attention. While two regular trains ran through Wallingford Sunday, it was unusual to run "wild engines on Sunday." It must be conceded that, by reason of the location of the track, the pile of pulp wood and cars, as well as the curve that obstructed the vision until close to the main track, the speed at which this "wild engine" was run on Sunday evening, without headlight, not slowing up in the village, nor giving warning, was gross negligence.

The decedent was a man forty-six years old, sober, industrious, with a wife and three children, and a good provider. His son, who was nineteen years old when his father was killed, testified that, while he was deaf, they had no difficulty in conversing with him; that he was more cautious than people generally. In cross-examination he was asked, "So that any person about to cross that crossing would feel it jar?" He answered: "Yes, sir; and he (referring to his father) naturally would, because he was very cautious; he was more cautious than people generally." In re-direct he said, "Always very cautious, any noise, when a train would be going by the house, he would always know just as quick as the rest of us." Decedent's house was a short distance east of the crossing, and he went over that crossing for years, four times a day to and from his work, and was perfectly familiar with it. On the night in question he left his house to get a Sunday paper, somewhere down on Railroad street. Returning, he started to cross the tracks, and his body was found, with the left leg severed, about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north, on the following morning. No one saw him when the accident occurred, or could tell just how it occurred.

Railroad street was 4 or 5 rods wide at the crossing. A lady in the corner house on the east side, southeast of the crossing, looking diagonally through the north window, saw the back and side of a man for an instant only, but not plain enough to know who it was. She thought he was tall, but could not tell whether he was large or small,—she emphasizes that it was only a second by repeating that word several times. She thought he was between the main track and siding. She did not testify whether standing still or walking. She could not tell whether he had on a cap or not. She heard the engine, but did not see it. She was not much alarmed; for she thought if he went straight across he would get across, but if he did not go straight across, he might get hurt. Another lady, who was a witness, lived in the second house east of the corner, on Mill lane. She heard the engine, and got up and went and looked out of the window, and saw a tall, slim man, whom she did not know, going west towards the railroad crossing, almost onto the switch. When the engine passed, the smoke and steam hid him. The smoke and steam was down towards the track, and lingered for a minute or two. There was lots of fire as the engine passed, and the snow flew. She said the man she saw was walking fast, with his cap pulled down over his ears, with his hands in his pockets, looking straight ahead, so that he could see anything in his way. The thought came into her mind that he might be harmed by the engine. The witness before alluded to, who, with his brother, was a short distance west of the track, did not see Shum at all.

It cannot be claimed, in the circumstances, the location of the houses, the time in the evening, the casual seeing of a man whom they did not recognize, that the tenor of the evidence of the two ladies is very satisfactory, or that a jury would have found, from such evidence, that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence. Still the majority opinion, with no other basis than the evidence of the two witnesses just referred to, who were in houses east of Railroad street, says: "The intestate was under observation as he approached the track, and almost until the moment of the accident. The undisputed evidence is that he was walking rapidly, and looking straight ahead as he passed along the crossing, and that, when last seen, he had entered the space between the siding and the main track, and was still looking and walking straight ahead." An instantaneous looking through a window, diagonally, without being able to distinguish the person, can hardly be called "observation." At the time these witnesses saw him it would have been absolutely useless to have looked south, for he could not have seen past the wood cars until he had walked several feet farther, and then only when so near the main line as to be in the "zone of danger." The fact is beyond cavil that no one saw him when decedent could have seen or apprehended danger.

Again, the majority opinion assumes that he was traveling at the rate of 4 miles an hour. If so, witness Pickett and his brother must have seen him. While one witness uses the word "rapidly" as applied to his walking, it must be borne in mind that it was very cold, the wind was blowing from the north, and the ground was frozen. It is submitted that 3 miles an hour would be rapid under such conditions. The engine was running at the rate of about 85 feet per second. It would only take two seconds from the time it came in sight, near the main track, for it to pass. The witnesses on the opposite side heard no signal, and their attention was attracted only by the escaping smoke and steam. Just what transpired in two or three seconds no one knows. As that "wild engine" came bowling along, surrounded by smoke and steam and snow, without warning plaintiff's intestate was caught, and carried to his death, just how no one can conjecture. We know that his left leg was cut off, his right arm broken, and he was badly bruised, but none of these injuries give a clue as to how he was struck or caught.

The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that decedent was not guilty of contributory negligence. While in this state it cannot be presumed, as matter of law, that the decedent was in the exercise of due care and prudence, it must be conceded that, if the facts and circumstances tend to show that plaintiff's intestate was in the exercise of due care and prudence, that question should have been submitted to the jury. Dresser on Employer's Liability (page 376), referring to states where the rule is similar to our own, says: "It must in some way appear from the plaintiff's evidence that he exercised care. But . . . direct affirmative evidence of the plaintiff's care is not required, and his due care may, upon all the circumstances, be inferred from absence of fault." In Mayo v. Boston & M. R. Co. 104 Mass. 137, it is held that, "to sustain an action for an injury received by the plaintiff through the defendant's negligence, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove due care on his part by directly affirmative evidence, but the inference of such care may be drawn from the absence of all appearance of fault, either positive or negative, on his part, in the circumstances under which the injury was received." Robinson, J., in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Parish, 28 Ind. App. 189, 91 Am. St. Rep. 120, 62 N. E. 514, well says: "Slight, positive testimony, whether circumstantial or otherwise, when taken in connection with the instincts of self-preservation, and the desire to avoid pain or injury to one's self, may be sufficient to support a conclusion that one who suffers injury did not help to bring it upon himself;" and cites Allen v. Willard, 57 Pa. 374; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gunderson, 174 Ill. 495, 51 N. E. 708; Hopkinson v. Knapp & S. Co. 92 Iowa, 328, 60 N. W. 653; Greenleaf v. Illinois C. R. Co. 29 Iowa, 14, 4 Am. Rep. 181; Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153; Evansville Street R. Co. v. Gentry, 147 Ind. 408, 37 L.R.A. 378, 62 Am. St. Rep. 421, 44 N. E. 311; Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen, 117 Ind. 439, 10 Am. St. Rep. 67, 20 N. E. 287; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Nowicki, 148 Ill. 29, 35 N. E. 358; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Ballard, 22 Ind. App. 151, 52 N. E. 729.

What are the facts and circumstances making in plaintiff's favor? Negligence is a shortage of duty which one owes to another. It is not presumed. Contributory negligence has this additional feature: It is a shortage of duty which one owes to himself. If negligence cannot be presumed, how much less can contributory negligence. Mr. Shum approached that crossing with full knowledge as to conditions, so far as pulp wood, cars, and obstructed vision were concerned. This was a circumstance prompting care. He was of mature age, with a family dependent upon him, temperate, prudent, and "more cautious than men in general." While it is true that he was deaf, it is common knowledge that, when one faculty is impaired, others take up its work. And the evidence shows that "any noise, when a train would be going by the house, he would always know just as quick as the rest of us." His wife said he always felt a jar; they attracted his attention by stamping on the floor.

It is said in the majority opinion that "the case leaves the side track to the north unobstructed, so the last look should have been to the south." I cannot subscribe to this. It is the calm deliberation of the jurist, not upon the ground, nor in the presence of danger, but in the quiet and security of his study. Such deliberation has never been, and, in my opinion, never should be, the test. No man is required to use greater caution than that of a man of ordinary care and prudence in the same circumstances. Had he looked south and seen nothing, and then looked north, during the time occupied, the engine would have been down upon him without warning.

The majority opinion says that "it is not necessary that the evidence be that of an eyewitness," and quotes from Lazelle v. Newfane, 69 Vt. 306, 37 Atl. 1045: "The jury might well infer that the plaintiff, presumably possessing the common instincts of self-preservation, did not contribute in any degree to the accident,"—but criticises and attempts to limit the scope of that decision. "In my opinion the quotation is a sound proposition, and the instinct of self-preservation should have been weighed with other evidence and circumstances in the case tending to show that plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence. Had this been done, who will question but what there were opposing inferences to be drawn from the evidence? What would a jury, whose special province it is to pass upon such questions, have said? The answer is self-evident. After the decision in Lazelle v. Newfane, supra, and the decision in Boyd v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt. 89, 47 Atl. 409, the profession understood that Vermont was placing herself in line with the decisions of other states, and that, if no one saw the decedent when killed, it would be presumed that he was exercising due care; but, if those cases are not to be construed as going to that extent, if the case at bar is to be measured by the standard of either, it should have been submitted to the jury upon the question of contributory negligence. Quoting from the opinion of Taft, J.: "To entitle the plaintiff to recover, it was not necessary that there should have been an eyewitness to the transaction, who can be called to testify to the circumstances attending the accident. The direct testimony of a person witnessing the accident is not required. The manner of the accident, the cause of it, and the fault, if any of either party, may be inferred from the facts shown and detailed by the witnesses."

In another part of the opinion the court

says: "The jury might well infer that the plaintiff, presumably possessing the common instincts of self-preservation, did not contribute in any degree to the accident." Again: "They could infer, from the circumstances shown by the testimony, the neglect of the town, the proximate cause of the accident, and that the plaintiff was without fault." In Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. Watson, J., on page 94 of 72 Vt., after referring to the negligence of defendant, says: "It may be reasonably inferred from the circumstances, taking into consideration the disposition of persons to take care of themselves and avoid injury, that, while waiting for the freight train to pass, and until they started along, the decedent and his companions looked and listened to guard against any west-bound train which might be approaching on the northerly track." Lazelle v. Newfane and Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Griffith, 159 U. S. 603, 40 L. ed. 274, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105, are cited, and the court concludes, "and, not seeing nor hearing any, thought it safe to cross." Further on: "A jury might find from the evidence, and the legitimate and reasonable inferences therefrom, that, when the team started along, the express train had not come in view, with the track unobscured, and when approaching, the noise made thereby so mingled with or was drowned by the noise of the freight train that, in the absence of the usual warning by whistle or bell, the decedent and his companions were deceived into thinking there was no train approaching." The decisions in Lazelle v. Newfane and Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co., were apparently given after mature deliberation. More than a decade has elapsed since the first, and nine years since it was followed and quoted from with approval in the second case. In the first case Start, J., submitted the question to the jury. The opinion of the court was by Taft, J., and was concurred in by Ross, Ch. J., and Rowell and Tyler, JJ. The opinion in the last case was by Watson, J., and was concurred in by Rowell, Tyler, Start, and Thompson, JJ. While it is true that Munson, J., appears as dissenting, no dissenting opinion was given by him.

The majority opinion, referring to these decisions, says they are "clearly inconsistent with our established doctrines. The instinct of self-preservation cannot be made the basis of a presumption that due care was exercised, where the burden of proving due care is placed upon the plaintiff. Nor do we consider this instinct entitled to recognition inconsistent with our rule." As I read the opinion, it does away with the settled and accepted law since Lazelle v. Newfane and Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co., but the majority opinion leaves the profession to speculate as to how much, if any, of the law laid down in those cases is still the law in this state. These decisions are in line with the judicial utterances of the highest court in the land, and with the later decisions of a large number of states, among which may be numbered the United States Supreme Court, the Federal courts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Michigan, Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Maryland, Indiana, California, and others. If our decisions are in conflict with doctrines established by our court before the decisions were rendered, is that a reason why they should be reversed, the hands turned back upon the dial, and we go back to a decision that is arbitrary, and so severe that, regardless of the fact if there was no eyewitness to the circumstances attending death by negligence, the decedent's next of kin are without remedy, because they cannot show, by direct and positive evidence, freedom from negligence? Mr. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence (volume 4, § 2570), says: "The natural instincts of human conduct, with reference to care or negligence at the time of danger, may be considered."

It may be well to quote from some of the decisions. Mr. Justice McKenna in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 461, 48 L. ed. 262, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 137, says: "There was no error in instructing the jury that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, there was a presumption that the deceased stopped, looked, and listened. The law was so declared in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gentry, 163 U. S. 353, 366, 41 L. ed. 186, 192, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1104. . . . The presumption is founded on a law of nature. We know of no more universal instinct than that of self-preservation,—none that so insistently urges to care against injury. It has its motives to exercise in the fear of pain, maiming, and death. There are few presumptions based on human feelings or experience that have surer foundation than that expressed in the instruction."

Doe, Ch. J., in Huntress v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 185, 49 Am. St. Rep. 600, 34 Atl. 154, says: "When there is no evidence of insanity, intoxication, or suicidal purpose, and no evidence on the question of his care, except the instinct provided for the preservation of animal life, it may be inferred from this circumstantial proof that, for some reason consistent with ordinary care and freedom from fault on his part, his attempt to cross was due to his inadequate understanding of the risk." This opinion is criticized in Wright v. Boston & M. R. Co. 74 N. H. 128, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 832, 65 Atl. 687. The learned judge delivering the opinion concludes as follows: "Whether the fact that the deceased in this case was traveling on foot, while in the Huntress Case the deceased was riding in a team, constitutes an important distinction between the two cases, it is unnecessary to inquire. If it does not, the Huntress Case must be overruled." Both opinions are cited that the profession may determine which contains the better reasoning. Many New Hampshire cases are in line with the Huntress Case. This presumption is in the nature of evidence, and may be weighed as such.

In Lyman v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 200, 11 L.R.A. 364, 20 Atl. 976, it is held that, although proof of due care is essential for a nonsuit, upon the ground that the plaintiff had not shown that the deceased himself was free from contributory negligence. No witness saw the accident. The court said: "The absence of any fault on the part of the plaintiff may be inferred from circumstances, and the disposition of men to take care of themselves and keep out of difficulty may properly be taken into consideration."

In Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co. 20 N. Y. 65, 75 Am. Dec. 375, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground that the plaintiff had not shown that the deceased himself was free from contributory negligence. No witness saw the accident. The court said: "The absence of any fault on the part of the plaintiff may be inferred from circumstances, and the disposition of men to take care of themselves and keep out of difficulty may properly be taken into consideration."

In Broadbent v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1896) 64 Ill. App. 231, it was held that there is in all men a natural instinct of self-preservation, and such instinct is an element of evidence of which the jury may take notice, and, in the absence of all testimony upon the subject, find that a deceased party, in obedience to the ordinary instincts of mankind, exercised that care for his safety which a prudent man in the same circumstances would have made use of.

In Way v. Illinois C. R. Co. 40 Iowa, 345, the court said: "The instincts prompting to the preservation of life are thrown into the scale as evidence, like the presumptions of sanity and innocence."

In Northern C. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 438, 96 Am. Dec. 545, it is said: "These facts and all the circumstances of the case were proper to be considered by the jury; and, in connection with these facts and circumstances, it was competent to the jury to infer the absence of fault on the part of the deceased, from the general and known disposition of men to take care of themselves, and to keep out of the way of difficulty and danger."

In Strong v. Stevens Point, 62 Wis. 255, 22 N. W. 425, deceased was last seen approaching a bridge, in which was a hole, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where he fell and was killed. It was held that the jury might find that the accident occurred without culpable negligence on the part of the deceased. This case is cited with approval in Schrunk v. St. Joseph, 120 Wis. 229, 97 N. W. 946.

In Allen v. Willard, 57 Pa. 375, it was held that the natural instinct, which leads men in their sober senses to avoid injury and preserve life, is an element of evidence.

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Weber, 76 Pa. 157, 18 Am. Rep. 407, where one Weber was killed while crossing a track, the judge delivering the opinion says: "Whether he stopped or not before driving on the track is matter of mere inference or conjecture, and cannot with certainty be known. On the one hand is the presumption that he stopped to look and listen. He was well acquainted with the crossing, having been accustomed to drive over it every day, and must have known the time at which the regular trains passed. He had the highest motive to take the necessary precaution to insure his safety, and the presumption is that he did. On the other hand, it may be inferred from the circumstances that, if he had stopped to look and listen, he would have seen or heard the approaching train. But, whether he stopped or not, it was the province of the jury to determine as a question of fact, and not a matter of law for the decision of the court."

In Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153, it is held that in cases where the negligence of the defendant is affirmatively shown, and there is no proof of the conduct of the deceased or person injured, the jury are at liberty to infer ordinary care and diligence upon his part, taking into consideration his character and habits as proved, and the natural instinct of self-preservation.

The case should have been submitted to the jury upon the point of no warning. Plaintiff's intestate had the right to believe that the defendant's engineer would obey the law by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell, but there was no evidence of any warning, except the blowing of the whistle more than half a mile away, with the wind blowing away from the crossing.

Watson, J., in Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt., at page 93, 410, says: "Although such negligence [failure to blow the whistle or ring the bell] on the part of a railroad company affords no excuse to the traveler upon the highway for his not exercising due care and prudence to avoid injury, yet the absence of such warning is a circumstance to be taken into consideration in determining whether he did exercise the degree of care and prudence required or not; for negligence cannot be imputed to a person who is deceived under circumstances calculated to deceive a prudent man."

Collins, J., in Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 49 Minn. 245, 16 L.R.A. 261, 32 Am. St. Rep. 540, 51 N. W. 1044, says, in substance: "Assuming, then, as we must, for the jury might have so determined, that no cautionary or warning signals were given, it must be held that if, by reason of this omission or neglect, . . . Mr. Hendrickson was led to be less vigilant when drawing near to the railway, his view along the tracks being obscured until he reached a place or situation in which his life was jeopardized and finally lost, his want of vigilance cannot be pronounced culpable or concurring negligence as a matter of law."

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 71, 78 Am. Dec. 322, it is held, in substance, that if, by reason of the negligence of those in charge of the train, one is less vigilant, the company is not at liberty to impute the consequences of their acts to his want of vigilance, a quality of which they deprived him.

The case at bar is very similar to one in Michigan, in which an eminent jurist gave the opinion (in Teipel v. Hilsendegen, 44 Mich. 461, 7 N. W. 82, per Cooley, J.): "Nor is it necessary that the absence of contributory negligence should be shown beyond cavil or question. If the circumstances are such that reasonable minds might draw different conclusions respecting the plaintiff's fault, he is entitled to go to the jury upon the facts. . . . In this case there were no eyewitnesses, and the injury resulted in death. . . . There was some evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, and there was some ground for an opinion that intestate was negligent also. But the plaintiff put in such proofs of the attendant facts as were attainable under the circumstances, and from these it was by no means clear that the intestate was in fault at all. There was room for the conclusion that he was not. We think the case ought to have gone to the jury."

That other respectable authorities hold the converse view is not questioned, but the cases quoted from indicate the trend of the decisions, and are based upon sound reasoning and common sense. That this court made no mistake in going to the extent it did in Lazelle v. Newfane and Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. is amply confirmed by the decisions quoted from. The defense rely largely upon Carter v. Central Vermont R. Co. 72 Vt. 190, 47 Atl. 797,—a case entirely unlike the case at bar in its 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) controlling facts. In that case the court lay down the same rule, contended for by the plaintiff in the case at bar, as to when it is the duty of the court to submit a case to the jury, and quote with approval from the opinion of Start, Ch. J., in Scheiber v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 61 Minn. 499, 63 N. W. 1034: "This rule must be applied in practice with caution, lest the courts usurp the functions of the jury, and unwittingly deprive a party of his constitutional right to a trial by jury; and, if there is a fair doubt as to the inferences to be drawn from an admitted state of facts, the question must be submitted to the jury, but, in the absence of such fair doubt, it is equally the duty of the court to decide the question as one of law, and instruct the jury accordingly." It may not be out of place to say that, when two judges, honestly aiming to arrive at the truth, with the same opportunities for analyzing the evidence, arrive at different conclusions as to the inferences to be drawn therefrom, it is a strong indication that reasonable minds might draw different conclusions respecting the plaintiff's fault, and that, if so, the case should have been submitted to the jury. This view was taken in Smith v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 177 N. Y. 224, 69 N. E. 427. In the opinion of Werner, J., concurred in by Parker, Ch. J., and Bartlett, Martin, and Vann, JJ., decided January 19, 1904, the court says: "The facts of this case, fairly stated and considered in the light of the inferences most favorable to the plaintiffs, do not so clearly establish the contributory negligence of plaintiffs' intestate as to remove the question from the domain of doubt into the realm of undebatable fact. In support of this suggestion we have but to refer to the persuasive, if not conclusive, circumstance that learned judges have differed as to the effect of the evidence in this record."

I concur in the majority opinion that, notwithstanding the fact that the jury had viewed the premises, as the record stands the court might order a verdict if the case was not one which, in other respects, showed that it should have been submitted to the jury.

In my opinion the judgment should be reversed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

MADELINE L. EMERY, Resp.,
v.

SYLVESTER KIPP, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 97 Pac. 17.)

Judgment—jurisdiction—res judicata.

1. One made a party to a suit by substituted service of process, who, after judgment, appears and moves to set aside the judgment for lack of jurisdiction, which motion is denied, cannot raise such question in a collateral proceeding to quiet title to property involved in that suit.

Parties — nonjoinder — waiver.

2. Nonjoinder of the husband in a suit against a married woman is waived by her suffering a default judgment to go against her.

Same — married woman — name.

3. A judgment quieting title to real estate against a married woman is valid although she was sued in her maiden name, in which stood the title to the property,— especially where, for the purposes of the marriage contract, she had changed the form of her Christian name so that there was nothing of record to indicate that she had married or changed her name.

Writ — publication — married woman — name.

4. Jurisdiction of a married woman may be secured in an action to quiet title to real estate by publication of a summons against her in her maiden name, in which she took and held the title to the property.

(July 29, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in plaintiff's favor and from an or-

Case Note. — Publication of process against married woman in her maiden name.

An extensive search has disclosed but little authority upon this specific question, and there is some conflict among the few cases in point. The conclusion reached in EMERY v. KIPP, however, is supported by Jones v. Kohler, 137 Ind. 528, 45 Am. St. Rep. 215, 37 N. E. 399, in which it was held that a notice was sufficient which was given by publication to one Mary Jackson, a nonresident, whose whereabouts had been unknown to her friends and acquaintances in the state for about thirty-five years, though her former husband, Jackson, had died, and she had since married, and was at the time of the notice the wife of one Jones. The court said that, if a person was known by more than one name, it was the common rule that service of process by either name was sufficient, and that the person sought to be served by publication could not complain where a notice was given her in the only name by which she was known within the jurisdiction of the state, and the only name by which, as she well knew, she would be dealt with in the state, that name in which she would necessarily be notified of the pendency of legal proceedings, and that name which, when reading the notice, she would, of course, understand to apply to herself.

der denying a new trial in an action brought to quiet title to real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stearns & Sweet, for appellant:

The name in which respondent acquired and holds the title is sufficient, and she has no reason to complain if she was sued by that name in any case affecting that title.

Blinn v. Chessman, 49 Minn. 140, 32 Am. St. Rep. 536, 51 N. W. 666; Elting v. Gould, 96 Mo. 535, 9 S. W. 922; Nolan v. Taylor, 131 Mo. 224, 32 S. W. 1144; Mosely v. Reily, 126 Mo. 124, 26 L.R.A. 721, 28 S. W. 895; Waltz v. Barroway, 25 Ind. 382; Lane v. Innes, 43 Minn. 137, 45 N. W. 4; Fanning v. Krapfl, 68 Iowa, 244, 26 N. W. 135; Peterson v. Little, 74 Iowa, 225, 37 N. W. 169; Mallory v. Riggs, 76 Iowa, 748, 39 N. W. 886; Wooster v. Lyons, 5 Blackf. 60; 1 Black, Judgm. § 213; Linton v. First Nat. Bank, 10 Fed. 894; Graham v. Eisner, 28 Ill. App. 269; Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 99 Am. Dec. 347; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 24 Pac. 114.

Freeman v. Hawkins, 77 Tex. 500, 19 Am. St. Rep. 762, 14 S. W. 364; Dunlap v. Southerlin, 63 Tex. 38; McRee v. Brown, 45 Tex. 506; Entrekin v. Chambers, 11 Kan.

This conclusion, however, would seem to be opposed by Morris v. Tracy, 58 Kan. 137, 48 Pac. 571, which was an action for partition of lands, though the case contained the further element of an ambiguous description in the published notice of the lands sought to be reached. It was specifically held that service of summons by publication upon one Emma H. Morris was not a good service on Emma H. Durham, a married woman, who had borne the name of Durham for nearly twenty years, though her maiden name was Emma H. Morris. The court went on to say that it was not like a case where a personal service was made in a wrong name: but that, as the only service was by publication, the only information that the defendant could have that service on her was intended was derived from the name used and the description of property, and that, therefore, she was entitled to have the service set aside on her motion.

The conclusion reached in Freeman v. Hawkins, 77 Tex. 498, 19 Am. St. Rep. 769, 14 S. W. 364, sufficiently set forth in EMERY v. KIPP, would seem to be based upon a statutory requirement that notice by publication must contain the names of the parties to the action; and, as the law conferred upon the marriage of the defendant the surname of her husband, she must be sued in that name.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff commenced this action to quiet title to lands situate in the county of San Diego. She obtained judgment, and from that judgment and from the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals.

Upon the trial the following facts were established without conflict: The maiden name of plaintiff, who is an Englishwoman by birth, is Madeline Louisa Munro. In England she was usually called Louisa. After coming to California she was usually called Madeline by her friends and family, although she was sometimes addressed and spoken of as Louisa. In 1888 one Phipson, the then owner of the land in controversy, executed a deed thereof to this plaintiff, naming her therein as Louisa Munro. In December, 1894, under the name of Madeline L. Munro, she married Alfred A. Emery, and continued to be his wife until the time of his death in 1903. In the marriage license she was named and designated Madeline L. Munro, and in the certificate of the minister who performed the marriage ceremony her name was written Madeline L. Munro. She had never executed any conveyance of the property, and, so far as her title is concerned, since the date of her deed, it has always stood on the records of the recorder's office in San Diego county in the name of Louisa Munro, and not in the name of Madeline Louisa Munro or Madeline L. Munro. Defendant's title comes by mesne conveyance from a judgment obtained in an action to quiet title to the land in controversy prosecuted by Nellie Rue against Louisa Munro. Proof of plaintiff's title having been made as above outlined, defendant, to establish his interest in the land, offered the judgment roll in the action of Nellie Rue v. Louisa Munro, and, upon objection of plaintiff, the judgment roll was refused admission in evidence. The soundness of the court's ruling upon this proffer embodies the questions presented for consideration upon this appeal. Respondents' objections to the admission of the judgment roll, while couched in different forms, resolve themselves into two: First, that the judgment is void because of the insufficiency of the facts set forth in the affidavit for publication of summons; second, that the court acquired no jurisdiction of this plaintiff by the substituted process and constructive service, she being a married woman, and her husband not having been joined with her (Code Civ. Proc. § 370), and she not having been sued in her true name, which at the time of the commencement of the action of Rue v. Munro was Madeline L. Emery, and not Louisa Munro.

The first objection thus advanced needs little consideration. This plaintiff connected herself with the action of Rue v. Quinn, by making a motion therein, after judgment by default had been entered against her, to set the judgment aside upon the ground that it had been entered without any jurisdiction having been obtained over her person. The ground there urged was the same as that here presented, that the facts set forth in the affidavit for the publication of summons were entirely insufficient. The trial court granted her motion, but, upon appeal to this court, its order was reversed; it being here held that the affidavit was sufficient. Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732. The ruling and determination in Rue v. Quinn have subsequently been approved in numerous cases. Weis v. Cain (Cal.) 73 Pac. 930; People v. Wrin, 143 Cal. 13, 76 Pac. 646; People v. Norris, 144 Cal. 424, 77 Pac. 988; Cargile v. Silsbee, 148 Cal. 260, 82 Pac. 1044; Shepard v. Mace, 148 Cal. 272, 82 Pac. 1046.

The questions presented under the second objection are both more interesting and more important. Preliminarily, it is to be borne in mind that the attack here made upon the judgment in Rue v. Emery is collateral, and, to be successful, it must be established that the judgment is void on its face. Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742; Sharp v. Daugney, 33 Cal. 505; Galvin v. Palmer, 134 Cal. 426, 66 Pac. 572; Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, §§ 3, 614, 616. That the judgment was not void for nonjoinder of the husband as party defendant is established by the case of Bogart v. Woodruff, 96 Cal. 609, 31 Pac. 618. The facts in that case were that a married woman, while a feme sole, had executed a promissory note. Suit was brought upon this promissory note against the maker. She was sued in her maiden name, and her husband was not joined. Personal service upon her was had, and judgment went for plaintiff upon her default. The original plaintiff then commenced another action to enforce the judgment against the wife sued under her married name; her husband being joined as defendant. There, as here, a collateral attack was made upon this judgment; it being contended that it was void, first, because of the misnomer of the married woman defendant, and, second, because, being a married woman, her husband was a necessary party, without whom the court could not obtain jurisdiction of the person of the wife. The trial court took this view, but upon appeal the judgment was reversed by this court, holding that, when the wife suffered such a judgment to be given against her, either after trial on the merits or by default, the objection of the nonjoinder of the husband was waived, and holding further that the judgment was not void because of misnomer in describing her by her maiden name, the name under which she executed the contract; she being sufficiently identified by the name under which she was sued. The only distinction between the Bogart Case and the case at bar is that in the former personal service on the defendant was had, while in the latter substituted service by publication of summons was the mode adopted for acquiring jurisdiction. Whether or not any different conclusion is necessitated by reason of this fact is a matter for later consideration.

The rule as laid down in the Bogart Case, namely, that a judgment is valid when obtained against a married woman sued as a feme sole and in her maiden name, particularly upon any contract which she has executed in such name, is a rule of general acceptance. 1 Freeman, Judgm. § 150; Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, §§ 603, 616; Hartman v. Ogborn, 54 Pa. 120, 93 Am. Dec. 679; Winchester v. Everett, 80 Me. 535, 1 L.R.A. 425, 6 Am. St. Rep. 228, 15 Atl. 596; McCaffrey v. Corrigan, 49 Ind. 175. This is in consonance with the principle of common law that a man may change his name at will and sue or be sued in any name in which he is known and recognized. Linton v. First Nat. Bank (C. C.) 10 Fed. 894. So a person may adopt any name in which to prosecute business, and may sue or be sued in such a name. Graham v. Eiszner, 28 Ill. App. 269. This principle has been applied in this state, where it is held that, if the owner of property convey by any name, the conveyance as between himself and his grantee is valid and will transfer title. Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 99 Am. Dec. 347; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 24 Pac. 114. So, when it comes to examining the authorities dealing with actions affecting real estate, this same principle, it will be found, is universally applied. If a man chooses to take the title to real estate in a name other than his true name, so far as that property is concerned, he has assumed the name in which he takes title as his true name, and in suits affecting the property he may be sued by such designation. A leading and well-considered case upon this subject is that of Blinn v. Chess-man, 49 Minn. 140, 32 Am. St. Rep. 536, 51 N. W. 666. In that case the purchaser was George Chessman. He accepted a deed executed to him in the name of George Cheeseman, and the deed was so recorded. Thereafter an action was brought by one Leonard against George Cheeseman to determine adverse claims to the property. Summons was served by publication, and judgment by default was rendered in favor of Leonard that he was the owner of the property. In time plaintiff Blinn succeeded to Leonard's title and brought suit against George Chessman, and, as the court stated, the question presented in that case "was whether a judgment against Cheeseman was of effect as to this defendant Chessman as respects his title to the land." The reasoning of the court is full and convincing. It declares the presumption to be that a grantee who personally accepts, retains, and records a deed of conveyance does so with knowledge of its contents. It affirmed the trial court in holding that the Leonard judgment against Cheeseman was binding upon Chessman, who had taken title to the property in the name of Cheeseman, saying: "This conclusion is not based upon the ground of the likeness of the two names, either in spelling or in sound; but upon the ground—upon which also the decision of the court below was placed—that the defendant is to be deemed to have adopted the name of Cheeseman for the purpose of acquiring and holding the title to this land, and he can have no reason to complain that he is so designated in legal proceedings calling in question the validity of the title so acquired and held. From the fact that this was not his true name, it does not follow that the court did not acquire jurisdiction. If he had assumed this name, or any other, generally, and for all purposes; and especially if he had come to be known by the name assumed,—there would be no doubt that legal proceedings against him in such name would, in general, be sustained. The name is not the person, but only a means of designating the person intended; and where one assumes and comes to be known by another name than that which he properly bears, that name may be effectually employed for the purpose of designating him. . . . In this case it is probably true that the defendant did not intend to change his name, nor to adopt for general purposes the name of Cheeseman, but he did—if he knew the misnomer, as we must assume he did—most effectually assume that name for the purpose of taking and holding the title to this land. He not only accepted the conveyance made to himself by that name, but he placed it on record, for the purpose, and with the effect, presumably, of giving notice to the world that the title had been so conveyed and was so held. . . . In proceedings concerning this land it would be at least quite as likely that the name disclosed by the record as the grantee would be used in a summons or notice intended to be addressed to such grantee as that the record should be disregarded, and the true name of the defendant used. Hence, there was as much reason why his attention should be arrested by the name of George Cheeseman in a published summons or notice as there would be if his true name were used. He had placed himself under the necessity of having regard to the former as well as the latter. He cannot well complain that the name in which he took the title, and which he put forth to the world by the records, as the name of the grantee, should be employed in proceedings instituted for an adjudication concerning that title." The same principle is enunciated by the supreme court of Missouri in Elting v. Gould, 96 Mo. 535, 9 S. W. 922. The court was passing upon a judgment obtained in a suit brought against R. O. Elting to enforce a lien for taxes upon his property. Judgment had been given against R. O. Elting, and the land was sold and conveyed by sheriff's deed. Upon the records of the county the land stood in the name of R. O. Elting, but Elting's name was Richard O. Elting, and he contended that a judgment rendered against him in the name of R. O. Elting was void. The service, as here, was by publication. The court upheld the judgment, saying that the patent to the land which was recorded and which was the only conveyance of title on record showed that R. O. Elting owned the land. "It is by this name and description that he is known in his title papers. We think it is sufficient."

Applying the principle of these cases to the facts in the case at bar, it appears that this plaintiff took title to the land in the name of Louisa Munro, that in her recorded certificate of marriage her name was given as Madeline L. Munro, that there was nothing of record to disclose that Louisa Munro was the same person designated as Madeline L. Munro, and consequently there was nothing of record to disclose that Louisa Munro had ever changed her name. So far as the real estate was concerned, she held title to it only as Louisa Munro. No steps, which a reasonable or prudent person might take would, under our existing laws, serve to give a party desirous of commencing an action any knowledge or information that Louisa Munro had married or had in any other way changed her name. The law does provide that any person in whom the title of real estate is vested who shall from any cause have his or her name changed shall, upon any conveyance of real estate, set forth the name in which he or she derived title to such real estate. Stat. 1874, chap. 245, p. 345; Civil Code, § 1096. The law, too, might well have provided that, when a woman in whose maiden name title to real property stands shall marry, she shall cause recordation of the fact to be made in such manner as to give notice thereof to the world; but the law not having done this, it may not be said that a plaintiff is in fault who, after exhausting the means of information open to him, commences an action against a person holding such title by the same name in which the title is held. The inconvenience, and, indeed, the grave consequences, resulting from a different view, would render actions to quiet title by substituted process of little or no benefit. In nearly every state there are statutes authorizing the change of a man's name. A non-resident owner of land in California may legally cause his name to be changed in another state, and an adverse claimant in this state, after satisfying the court that after due diligence the nonresident owner cannot be found within the state, may commence an action against the party under the name in which his record title stands. If a judgment so obtained can be collaterally attacked by a showing that the nonresident claimant had legally changed his name, and that therefore jurisdiction was not acquired, which is the contention here made, the value of such an action is at an end.

But does the fact that in this case jurisdiction of the defendant was secured by published summons in any respect change the rule? We think not. In every case where service by publication is authorized, if the statutory requirements have been complied with, it is as effective for all purposes as personal service. The only distinction in this state is found in the privilege accorded by § 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which allows a defendant not personally served, on such terms as may be just, to appear within a year after the rendition of a judgment by default against him and answer to the merits of the original action. We have here a case where the claimant to the real estate is served by published summons under the name by which she took and recorded her title to the land. In Blinn v. Chessman, supra, the service was by publication, and, addressing itself to this question, the court there said: "If such a name is employed in legal process or notices, whether served personally or by publication,—where such service is authorized,—the notice is effectual; the person who has assumed the name is presumed to understand that the process or notice addressed in that name is addressed to him."

In Mosely v. Reilly, 126 Mo. 124, 26 L.R.A. 721, 28 S. W. 895, the same subject is considered; the court saying: "As has been said, the object of the publication is to give notice of the proceeding to the real person who is interested. The name is only used to identify such person, and may be the only means of identification; but, if the name as used is the same as the party himself uses and under which he is known, and the facts recited in the notice sufficiently identify the person intended, and advise him that his property is brought before the courts, we think that would be sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render the judgment." "Notice by publication, though only allowable from necessity, is, when authorized, as effective as personal service. Everyone is presumed to have had opportunity to read these publications and to learn from them the nature and objects of the proceedings of which they give notice." In Lane v. Innes, 43 Minn. 137, 45 N. W. 4, the supreme court of Minnesota declared that any notice which would give jurisdiction if personally served upon the party is good when served by publication if that publicity of the pendency of the action which the law intends is thereby given. See also Van Fleet, Collateral Attack, §§ 361, 367.

As against this reasoning and authority, our attention is called to but one conflicting case, that of Freeman v. Hawkins, 77 Tex. 498, 19 Am. St. Rep. 769, 14 S. W. 364. In that case land was conveyed to Mary E. Robison. She subsequently married a man by the name of Freeman. Thereafter suit was brought against her in the name of Mary E. Robison to quiet title. The court declared that Mary E. Robison upon marriage took the surname of her husband, saying: "A citation, whether to be served personally or by publication, must contain the names of the parties to the action. . . . We are of opinion that a citation by publication, requiring 'Mary E. Robison' to be cited and to appear, was not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render a judgment that would bind 'Mary E. Freeman.'" In this brief statement there is no consideration paid to the general rules which we have discussed, nor to the authorities which support them; and we think the conclusion reached by the Texas court is at variance with the otherwise universally accepted doctrine.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court upon a new trial to admit in evidence the proffered judgment roll.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

LENA CLARK, Plff. in Err.,
v.

COLORADO & NORTHWESTERN RAIL ROAD COMPANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 165 Fed. 403.)

Carrier — guest on locomotive.

1. Neither the conductor nor the engineer of a train, nor the master mechanic of a railroad, has the implied authority to invite a person to ride in the cab of a locomotive without paying fare.

Same — assumption of hazard.

2. One who, without paying fare, voluntarily attempts to ride in the cab of a locomotive at the invitation of those in charge of the train, assumes the known hazards incident to such exposed position, and cannot hold the railroad company liable for injuries caused by the collision of the cab with a car negligently left on a side track so as not to clear the main track, where the negligence was not wanton, and no injury occurred to anyone else on the train.

Same — wanton negligence.

3. A switching crew is not guilty of wantonness or recklessness towards a passenger riding in an engine cab because it leaves a car on a switch, which does not clear the main track, where it does not know of his presence in the cab; nor are those in charge of the engine guilty of such negligence toward him when they do not know that the car does not clear the track, — so as to render the railroad company liable in case he is injured by the engine coming in contact with the car.

Phillips, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action instituted by the widow of J. F. Clark against the defendant railroad company to recover damages for personal injury resulting in his death. The court sustained a demurrer to the petition, which presented two objections thereto: (1) That the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) because it discloses that the deceased was guilty of negligence directly contributing to his injury. The plaintiff below declining to plead further, final judgment was entered on the demurrer.

The substantive facts disclosed by the petition are as follows: The defendant railroad was operated between the city of Boulder and the town of Eldora, in Boulder county, Colorado. On the 15th day of July, 1906, the said J. F. Clark was invited by the conductor, engineer, and master mechanic of the defendant company to ride in the cab of an engine drawing a train of cars on said road. While so traveling in said cab the engine collided with the end of a freight car which defendant's employees had run out on a siding of the railroad track, but left the end or corner of said car protruding onto the main track, so that the said engine in passing collided therewith, breaking in the side of the cab on which the said J. F. Clark was sitting or standing, whereby he was killed. The petition alleges "that deceased was not an employee of the defendant company and was not a passenger for hire; that is, was not required to pay for traveling on said car." The prayer of the petition is for $25,000 damages.

It will be observed that, while the petition discloses that the engine in question was drawing a train of cars, it does not allege that it was a train of passenger cars, adaptable to and used for the carriage of passengers. Non constat, it may have been a freight train, which did not carry passengers at all. Therefore the case presented by the petition is that the deceased, without paying or agreeing to pay any fare, establishing a contractual relation between him and the carrier for his safe carriage, voluntarily entered into the cab of a locomotive engine to take a free ride for his own accommodation.

To avoid the obvious nonliability of the defendant railroad company for said Clark's death, the petition alleges that he was so much in their personal favor that he received simultaneously an invitation from the conductor, the engineer, and the master mechanic to ride in the engine cab. As the petition does not aver that either of said employees had authority to extend such invitation, the authority must arise, if at all, from mere implication. Most certainly no such authority can be assumed to have resided with the master mechanic, who had no connection whatever with the operation of the railroad train while running. Judge Caldwell, in Condran v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 28 L.R.A. 752, 14 C. C. A. 508, 32 U. S. App. 182, 67 Fed., loc. cit. 523, said: "It is a matter of common knowledge, of which the court will take judicial notice, and of which the public are bound to take notice, that railroad passenger trains are operated to carry passengers for hire. They are not eleemosynary agencies. It is equally well known that the authority of a railroad conductor does not extend to the carrying of passengers without the payment of the regular fare."

So, Judge Sanborn, in Purple v. Union P. R. Co. 57 L.R.A. 703, 51 C. C. A. 567, 114 Fed., loc. cit. 126, said: "A contract is indispensable to the relation of carrier and passenger. The minds of the parties must meet upon the agreement that the carrier will transport and the passenger will pay for the transportation, in the absence of a specific agreement or permission by the proper officer of the transportation company that the latter will carry the passenger without compensation. This contract of carriage may, it is true, be express or implied; but, if it does not exist in either form, the relation of carrier and passenger cannot have been created. An implied agreement to pay fare, and hence the relation of carrier and passenger, undoubtedly arises where one enters a passenger car and rides towards his destination. But it is equally true that, if one enters and rides under an express or implied agreement with a conductor, whom he knows or has reasonable cause to believe has no authority to make such a contract, that he

As the petition alleges that the deceased was not a passenger for hire, he knew, what every man is presumed to know, that the railroad was being operated for hire. If so, he knew that he was cheating the railroad out of its rightful due, as he certainly understood that the men whose guest it is claimed he was were not to pay it for him. Every sensible man comprehends that, while a railroad conductor is in charge of the train, he is placed there by the company to collect fares from passengers, and, if he neglects this duty, he is wronging his employer. His very position and office as conductor advise every person who enters upon the train to be carried that, presumptively, he is without authority to carry him free of charge. He also knows that the engineer in his cab has nothing to do with the admission of a passenger to the train for carriage. Much less had either the engineer or the conductor authority to invite the deceased to take passage in the engine cab. The law imputed to him, when he entered the cab, knowledge of the fact that the railroad company had not constructed or designed such a place for the carrying of passengers. It is a place fashioned and intended alone for the engineer and fireman. It is equipped with a narrow seat on the right-hand side for the engineer, and a corresponding seat on the left-hand side for the fireman, with a small space between for the engineer when standing at the throttle of the engine and for the fireman when shoveling coal. It is necessarily exclusive of outsiders, who by their presence and talk are liable to divert the attention of the engineer and fireman from their required constant watchfulness. Public policy itself demands this rule, and forbids any deviation from its observance.

The authorities are in harmony in holding that in a place like an engine cab, drawing a train of cars, the person who voluntarily enters therein to ride is presumed to know that it is not designed for such use, and no presumption arises in favor of such person that the engineer and conductor have either express or implied authority to grant him such permission. Robertson v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 91; Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188, 26 N. E. 446; Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513; Files v. Boston & A. R. Co. 149 Mass. 204, 14 Am. St. Rep. 411, 21 N. E. 311; Whitehead v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 22 Mo. App. 60 While 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

some courts have gone to considerable length in holding railroad companies responsible for the acts and assumptions of their employees while in positions of apparent authority, yet, when requested to hold that there is any presumption in favor of the authority of the employees to permit third persons to use places and instrumentalities obviously not designed therefor by the master, they come to a halt. If a conductor or engineer should invite a person to ride on the cowcatcher, a crossbeam in front of the engine, or on a brakebeam of a moving car, the foolhardy acceptor, receiving an injury thereby, would not be heard to say that he assumed the conductor or engineer had authority from the railroad company to invite him to ride there.

By voluntarily entering the engine cab to ride, the deceased assumed all the known hazards incident to such exposed position, because it is not a place designed by the railroad company for carrying passengers, and because it is a known place of increased danger. If a bridge be down, or any obstruction be on the track, the engine first encounters the danger and incurs the disaster. Danger lurks in such position. It was the side of the cab on which Clark stood or sat that first encountered the projecting end or corner of the car on the side track. The side of the cab was crushed in, which occasioned his injury. No derailment of, or other injury to, the train is alleged. So the fact is confronting that, had the deceased not chosen to ride where he did, no harm would have come to him. In voluntarily assuming such extrahazardous position he was guilty of contributory negligence. This proposition of law has recently been announced by this court in Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. Mohaupt (C. C. A.) 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 760, 162 Fed. 665. It is reinforced by the following pertinent decisions: Doggett v. Illinois C. R. Co. 34 Iowa. 284; Radley v. Columbia Southern R. Co. 44 Or. 332, 75 Pac. 212, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 447; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Boyd, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 205, 24 S. W. 1086; Files v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra, and citations; St. Louis, K. C. & C. R. Co. v. Conway, 86 C. C. A. 1, 156 Fed. 234, 235.

Counsel for plaintiff in error placed great stress in argument upon the contention that, notwithstanding the deceased may have been in an improper place on the engine, he was not a trespasser, but a licensee, and therefore the company owed him the duty not to wantonly or recklessly injure him. This may be conceded. The contention of counsel is that the petition charges gross negligence in the switching crew of the defendant company leaving the end of the freight car on the siding so as to conflict with the main track. In the first place, there is no allegation in the petition of wanton and reckless conduct by the defendant's employees. "The term 'gross,' in this connection, is nothing but an epithet. It means no more than the failure to exercise ordinary diligence in the circumstances of the particular case. It distinguishes no legal degree of negligence, and it is not error to refuse to apply it to the negligence for which a defendant may be liable, because its use merely tends to create doubt and to increase confusion." Purple v. Union P. R. Co. 57 L.R.A. 705, 51 C. C. A. 571, 114 Fed., loc. cit. 130.

Even had the petition charged wantonness or recklessness in the switching crew, as applied to the instance at bar it would not have helped the case. The following excerpt from the well-considered opinion in Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y., loc. cit. 394, 15 Am. Rep. 513, presents the correct rule: "But it is said that, by the act of the conductor, the plaintiff was lawfully on the train, and that for this reason the defendant was liable to him for the negligence of its servants. With due submission, this is simply begging the question. The plaintiff could only be 'lawfully' on the train by an authorized act of the conductor. The question still recurs: Had the conductor the authority to take the plaintiff on the train? If not, he could not lawfully be there. It is not necessary to consider whether he was a trespasser. It is enough to hold that a duty to be careful toward him could only spring up on the part of the defendant by an act on the conductor's part coming within the scope of his authority."

The switching crew did not know that the deceased was on the engine, and had no reason to anticipate that any passenger would be in such exposed position. Nor did the engineer or conductor know or have reason to anticipate that the freight car extended onto the main track. While it is to be conceded that it was a culpable, negligent act on the part of the switching crew in not taking pains to see that the freight car cleared the main track, the deceased, in voluntarily riding in the engine cab,—a place not designed for the carriage of passengers, and in which he would obviously be exposed to first encounter any obstruction that might be on the track,—was none the less guilty of contributory negligence.

Counsel for plaintiff in error rely chiefly upon the case of Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502. It is deemed sufficient to say of that case that the pronouncements therein are predicated of a state of facts distinctively distinguishable from the case at bar: (1) The cab there spoken of, in which the injured party was riding, was evidently not such an engine cab as the one here in question. It was a carrying car, constructed and designed for the president and officials of the railroad on inspection tours, and the like, and was, therefore, a place for carrying passengers. (2) The injured party was a stockholder in the company, and was invited by the president thereof, who had apparent authority therefor, to ride with him in the place designed for the carriage of persons. (3) The employees of the company in charge of the track had special instructions to keep it clear of obstructions because of the coming, on this specially equipped car, of the officials of the road, who could be expected to be where they were riding when the car came.

Other decisions cited in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error are not in point in their facts, and are not of controlling authority.

It results that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

JOHN BRADBURY AND WIFE, Appts.,
v.
VANDALIA LEVEE AND DRAINAGE
DISTRICT.

(236 Ill. 36, 86 N. E. 163.)

Pleading — parties — excessive statements.

1. A declaration to recover damages for the construction of a levee which causes the water to set back on plaintiff's lands is not demurrable because it alleges that the levee caused the water to rise higher than normal on the opposite side of the river from and above the levee, which would

Case Note. — Liability of drainage district for flooding land.

This note includes only those cases in which the action was brought for damages due to floods necessarily resulting from the construction of the drainage works. The question of liability for negligence in construction will therefore not enter into the discussion.

In Elmore v. Drainage Comrs. 135 Ill. 269, 25 Am. St. Rep. 363, 25 N. E. 1010, discussed at some length in the above opinion, there seems to have been a claim for damages due to overflow waters aside from the cause of action for negligent construction, for the court said: "If, however, by the enlargement of the district, an additional burden of water was precipitated upon his lands, to his detriment, it would seem that, prior to the discharge of such additional water upon the lands, the damages consequent upon such enlargement show injury to lands of others than plaintiff, where the allegation is made simply to show the injury to plaintiff's land.

Water — damming back — liability — drainage district.

2. A drainage district which constructs a levee along a river and from the river to the highlands, in such a way as to obstruct the natural flow of the flood water of the river and cast it back on property farther up the stream, is liable for the injury thereby caused, where the Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation.

Same — public corporation.

3. A drainage district cannot escape liability for injury done by its improvements, to lands lying out of its limits, on the theory that it is an involuntary quasi public corporation not liable to respond in damages for any of its acts, where its organization depends upon a petition of those living within its limits, and the statute provides that lands lying within the district shall be liable for any and all damages which shall be sustained by any land lying above such district by the construction of its works.

Same — police power.

4. The drainage of lands to improve them for agricultural purposes cannot be regarded as an exercise of the police power, so as to exempt the land so drained from liability for injury caused by the improvement to other land not within the district.

should have been assessed by a jury and paid by the district. . . . But in respect to the damages claimed in the declaration, they were either caused by the tortious act of the drainage commissioners in discharging the new and additional waters, which were not had in contemplation in the original assessment of damages against the district, upon the premises of appellant, or occasioned by negligence or misconduct on the part of the commissioners, and the remedy must be personally against the commissioners. It would, as we have already seen, be inconsistent with the fixed rules of law to hold the district liable for the consequences of the illegal acts of such commissioners."

A reclamation district organized for the purpose of reclaiming swamp land lying along a river is not liable to a lower owner for damages caused by the overflowing of his land due to the works of the defendant district. Such damages are damnum absque injuria. Nor are damages recoverable on the theory that the reclamation district is a municipal corporation acting under the authority of the state and liable for taking the land under the power of eminent domain, such damages being indirect, remote, and consequential, and in no sense constituting a taking within the constitutional limitation. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist. No. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Fourth District affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiffs' lands by the construction of a levee. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown & Burnside, for appellants:

Independent of statutory enactment, a riparian proprietor has a right to recover damages for the building of a dam along the side of a river, which causes the waters of the stream to overflow and damage his land.

Burwell v. Hobson, 12 Gratt. 322, 65 Am. Dec. 247; Gerrish v. Clough, 48 N. H. 9, 2 Am. Rep. 165, 97 Am. Dec. 561; O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 87 Ga. 246, 13 L.R.A. 394, 27 Am. A drainage district organized under the "levee act" is a public corporation, and has the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, and hence cannot damage private property without making just compensation.

A constitutional provision which denies a recovery for damages to land "because of its being left outside a levee" is applicable only to damages which accrue to lands from the ravages of the river because not protected against it by the levee, and does not preclude recovery for flood damage resulting from the construction of the levee. Duncan v. Levee Comrs. 74 Miss. 125, 20 So. 838. See also Ham v. Levee Comrs. 83 Miss. 534, 35 So. 943.

In Drainage Comrs. v. Waeltz, 41 Ill. App. 575, it was held that no recovery could be had for damages from overflow, where the action was based upon the tortious acts of the commissioners. It was suggested that a recovery might have been allowed in this case had the suit been based upon the statutory liability, which was as follows: "Provided, that the lands embraced in such drainage district shall be liable for any and all damages which may be sustained by any lands lying above such drainage district, by the construction of any levee, ditch, or drain in such district under this act."

tion of a levee. The award was affirmed, and, in sustaining the allegations of the complaint, the court said: "It is also claimed that the complaint does not allege that the appellant, in its proceedings to construct said levee, was negligent. This is not a suit for the negligent construction of a levee, but an appeal from an assessment of damages under the statute; and in this appeal all damages, present and prospective, must be assessed, because it will be presumed that all matters affecting the land were considered when the original assessment was made. . . . Neither an individual, nor a private corporation, without legislative authority, can interfere with a running stream to the damage of others, whether negligent or not, without being liable. The legislature could have no power to grant a corporation, in the original taking of property, the privilege of taking land under the right of eminent domain without just compensation."

In Meriwether v. St. Francis Levee Dist. 165 Fed. 317, equitable relief by way of an injunction was denied to one whose lands had been flooded as the result of the construction of a levee, because the Constitution and statutes gave a full and complete remedy at law. Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The circuit court, of Fayette county sustained the demurrer of appellee, the Vandalia Levee and Drainage District, to the amended declaration of appellants, John Bradbury and Mary Bradbury, filed in this action of trespass on the case for damages to appellants' lands, resulting from the construction by appellee of a levee along the Kaskaskia river and across the bottom lands to the bluffs bordering on the same.

land had been overflowed or injured as a direct result of the building of the levee, that amounts to a 'taking' or 'injury' within the meaning of the constitutional provision which protects private property from public use without compensation; and at common law, as well as under the express provision of the statute just quoted, the plaintiff could maintain an action for his damages though no direct proceeding had been taken to condemn the land by eminent domain."

But damages resulting because a levee prevents water from flowing off land as it otherwise would, and deepens the water thereon in time of overflow, are consequences of the situation, and the authorized effort to promote the general good by the construction of the levees, and may not be recovered in an action against the levee commissioners. Richardson v. Levee Comrs. 68 Miss. 539, 9 So. 351. See also Levee Comrs. v. Harkleroads, 62 Miss. 807.

And, where a landowner granted to a levee district a right of way over his land for the construction of a levee, he cannot recover from the district damages resulting from floods due to the levee if it was constructed in a skilful manner. Daniels v. St. Francis Levee Dist. 84 Ark. 333, 105 S. W. 578.

Appellants stood by their declaration, whereupon judgment was rendered against them for costs, and on appeal to the appellate court for the fourth district the judgment was affirmed. From the judgment of the appellate court, this appeal was taken.

The declaration contains four counts, the first of which avers that the plaintiffs are the owners of and in possession of a tract of land containing about 18 acres, on the west side of the Kaskaskia river, which flows in a southwesterly direction through the county of Fayette; that, before the building of the levee by defendant, the lands were not subject to overflow by the freshets or floods of said river, and were valuable farming lands; that the defendant is a drainage district organized on or about September 9, 1902, under the act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Construction, Reparation, and Protection of Drains, Ditches, and Levees, across the Lands of Others, for Agricultural, Sanitary, and Mining Purposes, and to Provide for the Organization of Drainage Districts," in force May 29, 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 120), together with the amendments thereto; that the plan of the improvement, as fixed by the decree of the county court of said county, including the construction of a levee along the east side of the Kaskaskia river, beginning at the mouth of Lynn creek, about a quarter of a mile down the river from the plaintiffs' lands, and extending down the river about 12 miles, and also a levee from the mouth of said creek in an easterly direction to the bluffs; that, during the summer of 1904, the defendant caused said levee to be erected about 8 feet in height and 4½ feet wide on top, with no outlet from the river into the lands lying on the east side; that at the time of floods and freshets said river overflows its banks and inundates a strip of land about 2 miles in width; that, by reason of the construction of the levee, the flood channel below the lands of plaintiffs is narrowed and in some places does not exceed 300 feet; that, by reason of the construction of the levee, the waters of the river were caused to rise much higher on the west side of the river and above the levee, and to thereby overflow the plaintiffs' lands in time of freshets; that their lands were damaged and injured, the crops growing thereupon were destroyed, the soil was washed away, and the lands rendered unwholesome and unhealthy and depreciated in value, and that, by reason of § 2 of said act under which the defendant was organized, it became liable to pay the plaintiffs their said damages. The third count is substantially the same as the first, and the second and fourth contain the same averments as the first respecting the plaintiffs' lands, the organization of the district, and the effect of the levee as an obstruction to the flow of the waters; but they charge that the defendant wrongfully caused the levee to be constructed, and that, before the building of the levee, the plaintiffs' lands were only overflowed in times of extreme floods, whereas, since that time they are overflowed and damaged and rendered unwholesome in times of only moderate floods and freshets. The demurrer is both general and special, and alleges as special ground of demurrer that the declaration charges that other lands besides those of the plaintiffs have been damaged. The declaration avers that the levee caused the waters of the river to rise much higher on the west side and above the levee, which might include lands not owned by the plaintiffs; but there is no averment of damage to any lands except those of the plaintiffs, and no cause of action is stated, or attempted to be stated, as to any other lands. The lands of the plaintiffs are on the west side of the river above the levee, and the averments as to raising the water on that side and above the levee are only made in connection with those lands. The declaration is not obnoxious to the special ground stated.

The declaration states facts showing injury and damage to the plaintiffs' lands resulting from the act of the defendant in building the levee below them, and thereby obstructing the natural flow of the waters of Kaskaskia river in times of floods and freshets so as to hold the same back upon said lands, and the substantial question raised by the demurrer is whether the defendant is liable for such damage. If an individual owner of the land where the levee was constructed had done the same acts as the defendant, he would be liable for the consequent damage. He would have no right to build a levee which would prevent the escape of the flood waters, and thereby flood the lands of the plaintiffs. In Stout v. McAdams, 3 Ill. 67, 33 Am. Dec. 441, the court said: "There can be no doubt that every flowing back or throwing water upon the land of another is such an act as entitles the individual injured to his action." That case arose from the obstruction of a natural water course by a dam, and the principle has been applied by this court alike to obstructions to the natural flow of surface waters and natural water courses. Gillham v. Madison County R. Co. 49 Ill. 484, 95 Am. Dec. 627; Gormley v. Sanford, 52 Ill. 158; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Webb, 142 Ill. 404, 32 N. E. 527; Rock Island & P. R. Co. v. Krapp, 173 Ill. 219, 50 N. E. 663; Pinkstaff v. Steffy, 216 Ill. 406, 75 N. E. 163. In Gillham v.

Madison County R. Co. the doctrine of the civil law by which the owner of lower ground has no right to erect embankments whereby the natural flow of the water from the upper ground shall be stopped was adopted; and in Gormley v. Sanford it was held that there was no difference in principle whether the water comes from the clouds above or has fallen upon remote hills and comes thence in a running stream. The court said (page 162 of 52 Ill.): "The cases asserting a different rule for surface waters and running streams furnish no satisfactory reason for the distinction."

The right of the owner of the superior heritage to drainage is based simply on the principle that nature has ordained such drainage, and it is but plain and natural justice that the individual ownership arising from social laws should be held in accordance with pre-existing laws and arrangements of nature. As water must flow, and some rule in regard to it must be established where land is held under the artificial titles created by human law, there can clearly be no other rule at once so equitable and so easy of application as that which enforces natural laws." Again, in Pinkstaff v. Steffy it was considered that there could be no difference whether the water that submerged the land of Steffy came from the hills above the land or from the overflow of the stream along the same.

Under the rule of the civil law adopted by this court, the right of drainage is governed by the law of nature, and the lower proprietor cannot do anything to prevent the natural flow of surface water and cast it back upon the land above (30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 326); and this court recognizes no distinction between surface waters and those flowing in a natural water course. In Burwell v. Hobson, 12 Gratt. 322, 65 Am. Dec. 247, it was contended that a riparian proprietor may lawfully protect his property from floods by erecting a dike or other obstruction on his own land, though its necessary effect may be to turn the superabundant water on the land of his neighbor; but the court said: "Such a distinction between the ordinary and extraordinary flow of a stream is not laid down or recognized by any elementary writer nor in any adjudged case, so far as I have seen. The utmost extent to which the authorities seem to go in that direction is that a riparian proprietor may erect any work in order to prevent his land being overflowed by any change of the natural state of the stream and to prevent its old course from being altered (Angell, Water Courses, § 333); but he has no right, for his greater convenience and benefit, to build anything which in times of ordinary flood will throw the water on the grounds of another proprietor so as to overflow and injure them."

The question in this case is whether an aggregation of landowners can, by voluntarily accepting the privileges conferred by the levee act and organizing a drainage district, erect a levee which obstructs the natural flow of water and injures the land of another and the district incur no liability. It is contended that there is no such liability because the drainage district is an involuntary quasi public corporation, which is neither liable for its own torts nor the wrongs or negligence of its officers. It is first to be observed that in this case it is not necessary to the maintenance of the action that the corporation or its officers should have been guilty of either wrong or negligence. The first and third counts aver that the scheme of the improvement as fixed by the decree of the county court included the construction of the levee, which was erected in accordance with said decree. Under those counts, the damage resulted, not from negligence or improper construction, but from the adoption of the plan of drainage to benefit the lands within the district; and in Stout v. McAdams, supra, which was an action on the case, it was held that, although the act of one person may be in itself lawful, yet if, in its consequences, it necessarily damages the property of another, the party occasioning the damage is liable to make reparation commensurate to the injury he has caused. The defendant has power to exercise the right of eminent domain and to have the damage to lands occasioned by the construction of its works determined. Lands taken or damaged by a drainage district for its purposes are taken or damaged for a public use, and compensation must be made therefor. Wabash R. Co. v. Coon Run Drainage & Levee Dist. 194 Ill. 310, 62 N. E. 679; Juvinall v. Jamesburg Drainage Dist. 204 Ill. 106, 68 N. E. 440. If a drainage district actually takes land, compensation must be made before the land is appropriated, and, if the district concedes that damage will result to lands, such damages may be assessed under the law of eminent domain; but, if the district does not concede, in the first instance, that damage will result, an action on the case is an appropriate remedy to determine the question whether lands will be damaged and to recover the damages. Under the Constitution private property cannot be taken or damaged for a public use without just compensation, and this gives a right of action. The demurrer admits that plaintiffs' lands have been damaged for a public use, and that the damage has not been ascertained or paid.

On the proposition that the defendant is an involuntary quasi public corporation, and for that reason not liable to respond in damages for any of its acts, the case of Elmore v. Drainage Comrs. 135 Ill. 269, 25 Am. St. Rep. 363, 25 N. E. 1010, is relied upon. That was a suit by an owner of lands included in the district who had been assessed for draining his lands, and after the payment of his assessment the district, without his knowledge or consent, enlarged the boundaries and discharged so much water into the ditches on his land that the ditches would not carry it, and also did the work so carelessly and negligently as to overflow and submerge his lands. There was a judgment against the plaintiff on a general demurrer, and the charge of the declaration was negligence in the construction of the drains and in connecting the drains and ditches of the added territory with the drains on plaintiff's lands without enlarging such drains sufficiently to carry off the increased volume of water. The substantial grounds of the decision were that it would be presumed that the plaintiff was fully compensated in the original assessment for his lands taken for the ditch and all damages consequent upon its construction for the original purpose; that, if, by the enlargement of the district, an additional burden of water was cast on his lands, the consequent damages should have been assessed by a jury and paid by the district, but that the damages claimed in the declaration were either caused by the wrongful act of the commissioners in discharging the new and additional waters upon the plaintiff's premises, or occasioned by negligence or misconduct on their part for which the remedy must be against them personally. Under that decision, the landowner was not bound to suffer the injury, but could have enjoined the district until his damages on account of the additional burden of water had been assessed and paid. The court held that the drainage district was not a private corporation, formed by voluntary agreement for private purposes, which was undoubtedly correct. It was also said that, while drainage districts had been classed as municipal corporations in Commissioners of Havana Twp. v. Kelsey, 120 Ill. 482, 11 N. E. 256, and other cases, there were substantial grounds of distinction, and that they were to be regarded as mere public involuntary quasi corporations, and therefore not liable to respond in damages to an individual injured by the negligent or wrongful act of their officers, agents, or servants. That doctrine was repeated in Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties, 193 Ill. 439, 58 L.R.A. 353, 62 N. E. 201, but it is quite evident that it needs some revision or limitation. The ground of distinction between corporations which are liable for the negligent or wrongful act of their agents or servants and those which are not is that public involuntary quasi corporations are mere political or civil divisions of the state created by general laws to aid in the general administration of the government, and are not so liable, while those which are liable have privileges conferred upon them at their request, which are a consideration for the duties imposed upon them. Kinnare v. Chicago, 171 Ill. 332, 49 N. E. 536. Neither the state, nor any part of it, is divided by the legislature into drainage districts, nor do they have public duties thrust upon them without their consent. The organization of a drainage district is for the sole and exclusive benefit of the territory within the district (Union Drainage Dist. No. 3 Comrs. v. Highway Comrs. 220 Ill. 176, 77 N. E. 71), and the lands within the district are assessed to pay the whole costs on the theory that they alone are benefited. A drainage district can only be organized upon the petition of a majority of the owners of lands within the proposed district who shall have arrived at lawful age and who represent one third of the area of the lands to be reclaimed or benefited, and the organization is not different in principle from the organization of cities, villages, or towns under a general law, on a petition of a certain proportion of the legal voters within the territory. It is correct to say that a drainage district is a quasi corporation if the act under which it is organized does not make it a corporation in fact; but it is not created for political purposes or for the administration of civil government. Undoubtedly a drainage district is not liable for the unauthorized acts of its commissioners for which they are personally liable; but the district is clothed with the power of eminent domain for the purposes of its organization, and is prohibited by the Constitution from taking or damaging lands without making compensation therefor. If no means were furnished with which to pay such damages, that fact would furnish no authority for causing such damage, and the obvious result would be that acts causing damage to others could not be performed at all. That is not the case, however, as to this district. Section 2 of the act under which the defendant is organized provides that lands embraced in drainage districts organized under it shall be liable for any and all damages which may be sustained by any lands lying above such drainage district by the construction of any levee, ditch, or drain in such district under the act. The statute declares the liability and the law contemplates that it shall be enforced by an assessment upon the lands. No other kind of action could be brought to charge the lands in the district with the damages to plaintiffs' lands than the one adopted here, and, if damages should be recovered, they are to be collected by assessment against the lands.

But it is further contended that the defendant is not liable because the injury resulted from the exercise of the police power of the state through the district, as a mere governmental agency. The removal of large bodies of stagnant water which produce malaria and breed disease is conducive to the health and welfare of the public, and such removal is within the police power of the state (Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536), and there have been cases where the drainage of lands for that purpose was referred to the police power residing in the state. The basis for the law under which the defendant is organized, however, is found in § 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that "the general assembly may pass laws permitting the owners of lands to construct drains, ditches, and levees for agricultural, sanitary, or mining purposes, across the lands of others, and provides for the organization of drainage districts and vest the corporate authorities thereof with power to construct and maintain levees, drains, and ditches, and to keep in repair all drains, ditches, and levees heretofore constructed under the laws of this state, by special assessments upon the property benefited thereby." The act under which the defendant is organized provides for drainage for agricultural or sanitary or mining purposes, to be maintained by special assessment upon the property benefited thereby. If the county court finds that the proposed drains, ditch, or ditches, levee, or other works is or are necessary or will be useful for the drainage of the lands proposed to be drained thereby for either agricultural or sanitary or mining purposes, the district is to be organized. It is not contended that any other than sanitary purposes come within the undefined limits of the police power, and districts formed under the act are not necessarily organized as a police regulation to drain lands which would be a menace to public health or a breeder of malaria and disease. So far as appears, this district, with its scheme for a levee, was organized for the purpose of improving the lands within the district for agricultural purposes, which is not an exercise of the police power; and it was organized upon the petition of a majority of the owners of lands in the belief that they would be benefited by the organization. To deny to the plaintiffs a recovery of the damages which they have suffered by the effort of the owners of lands within the district to benefit themselves would be against natural right and every sentiment of justice, and we find no sufficient reason for exempting the district from liability, whether the levee is regarded as a wrongful obstruction to the waters of the river or as a lawful one under the decree of the county court.

The circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer and the appellate court erred in affirming the judgment. The judgments of the Appellate Court and Circuit Court are reversed and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

C. E. HARDY

v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 115 N. W. 8.)

Master — warning servant — blasting.

A master is not negligent in failing to warn an adult employee of ordinary intelligence, who has had several months' experience in drilling holes for blasting, and in actually firing the blasts, of the danger of putting powder into a drill hole in which the dynamite has been exploded, before the fire from the fuse and wrappings has had time to burn out.

(February 14, 1908.)

Case Note. — Duty to warn servant engaged in blasting of dangers therefrom.

As suggested by the title, this note is confined to the question of the necessity of warning one engaged in blasting of the dangers arising from the use and discharge of explosives; and does not include the duty to warn others, not so engaged, of transitory dangers from the firing of blasts, or of the danger of working about unexploded charges.

It is gross negligence to introduce the use of a new and highly dangerous explosive without warning a servant of its properties and the mode of use, irrespective of the master's knowledge or want of knowledge of its dangerous properties. Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. 42 N. J. L. 467, 36 Am. Rep. 535; Spelman v. Fisher Iron Co. 50 Barb. 151.

So, it is negligence to substitute blasting powder containing 40 instead of 27 per cent of nitroglycerin which was more dangerous to handle than the latter, without giving notice of the change to a servant who

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Johnson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carroll Wright and J. L. Parrish, for appellant:

A servant, in entering the employment of a master, impliedly represents that he is competent to perform the duties he undertakes, and appreciates the perils incident thereto.

The duty of the master to instruct only arises as to dangers the master knows or has reason to believe the servant is ignorant of.

Mr. A. E. Swisher also for appellant.

Messrs. Wade, Dutcher, & Davis, for appellee:

The law imposes an affirmative duty upon the master to instruct an inexperienced person whom he employs for a dangerous occupation, as to the dangers incident thereto which are not obvious to the servant.

Labatt, Mast. & S. § 395; Leary v. Bos- is ignorant thereof. Chambers v. Chester, 172 Mo. 461, 72 S. W. 904.

And it is an imperative duty, when a more rapidly-burning blasting fuse is substituted for a slower, to inform a servant thereof, where the difference is not discernible to an experienced miner. Hedlum v. Holy Terror Min. Co. 16 S. D. 261, 92 N. W. 31.

Where it appears that an unexploded blast should never be withdrawn, and that it was against the master's orders to do so, he will be liable for the negligence of his foreman in placing an ignorant and unskilled foreigner, though of mature years, who is not aware of such order, at such work, without warning him of its dangers, other than to tell him to pour water into the blast hole. Peters v. George, 83 C. C. A. 408, 154 Fed. 634.

So, it is negligence to set a man of twenty-two years who is without experience as a miner, at blasting, without any warning as to the dangerous character of the employment, and how safely to perform the work. Pence v. California Min. Co. 27 Utah, 378, 75 Pac. 934.

To place a youth of seventeen who is unfamiliar with the work of blasting, at work hammering upon a drill with which a mine foreman is drilling out an unexploded charge of dynamite, without warning of the danger, is actionable negligence, although, in reply to the youth's query why the drill sank so rapidly into the rock, the former stated he was drilling out an unexploded charge, and to the further inquiry if it was dangerous to do so, replied "No," when an explosion almost immediately occurred. Burrows v. Ozark White Lime Co. 82 Ark. 343, 101 S. W. 744. For a somewhat similar case see Archer-Foster Constr. Co. v. Vaughn, 79 Ark. 20, 94 S. W. 717. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And whether such youth was aware of his danger is for the jury to determine, where he admitted he had seen some blasting done, and knew that it was dangerous to handle explosives, as it may reasonably be concluded that he was not fully advised as to how the explosive could be discharged, or of the danger of attempting to drill out an unexploded charge. Burrows v. Ozark White Lime Co. supra.

So, it is for the jury to determine whether an inexperienced servant was sufficiently cautioned of the danger of pouring a keg of powder into a hole in which a preliminary blast had been exploded but five minutes before, by being told to be careful, as the hole might be too hot, without being instructed how to test the hole, it further appearing that the servant was ignorant of the fact that it was customary and necessary to wait thirty or forty minutes after the preliminary explosion, for the hole to cool. Holman v. Kempe, 70 Minn. 422, 73 N. W. 186.

And it is for the jury to determine, under such circumstances, whether the servant was guilty of contributory negligence, or assumed the risk of an explosion. Ibid.

So, the failure of one in charge of blasting to warn an inexperienced servant of the danger of thawing frozen dynamite will render the master liable. Pinney v. King, 98 Minn. 160, 107 N. W. 1127; Lofrano v. New York & Mt. V. Water Co. 55 Hun. 452, 8 N. Y. Supp. 717, affirmed without opinion in 130 N. Y. 658, 29 N. E. 1033.

Especially when the injured servant is not employed for that service. Lafrano v. New York & Mt. V. Water Co. supra.

It is the duty of a master to warn and instruct a common laborer, ignorant of the English language, of the danger of an explosion when attempting to disengage and

The material question is not whether the servant was aware of the conditions which produced the danger, but whether he understood the danger itself.

McDonald v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 41 Minn. 439, 16 Am. St. Rep. 711, 43 N. W. 380; Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. 102 Mass. 573, 3 Am. Rep. 506; McGowan v. Where there are latent defects or hazards incident to an occupation, of which the master knows, or ought to know, it is his duty to warn the servant of them fully; and this rule applies even where the danger or hazard is patent, if, through youth, inexperience, or other cause, the servant is incompetent fully to understand and appreciate the nature and extent of the hazard.

An employee does not assume the risk of a danger of which he has no knowledge, or which, as a reasonably prudent person, he is not bound to anticipate, or a danger which he is not in a situation fully to appreciate.

Vohs v. A. E. Shorthill Co. 124 Iowa, 471, 100 N. W. 495; Stomne v. Hanford Produce Co. 108 Iowa, 137, 78 N. W. 841; Olson v. Hanford Produce Co. 111 Iowa, 347, 82 N. W. 903, 118 Iowa, 55, 91 N. W. 806; Sankey

straighten wires attached to explosive caps, notwithstanding the servant's usual duty was to explode blasts, and he knew that they would explode when operated in the usual manner by electricity, but denied any knowledge of the fact that they would explode by friction or the application of external force. Lavia v. Kountz Bros. Co. 31 Pa. Super. Ct. 481.

But it is unnecessary to warn an experienced servant of mature years of the dangers of blasting if the master has no notice that the former is not fully acquainted with the dangers thereof. King v. Morgan, 48 C. C. A. 507, 109 Fed. 446; Welch v. Grace, 167 Mass. 590, 46 N. E. 387.

So, a failure to warn a youth of seventeen who, for upwards of five years, has been employed drilling and blasting, of the dangers of using dynamite, with which he is familiar, is not negligence. Northern Alabama Coal, Iron, & R. Co. v. Beacham, 140 Ala. 422, 37 So. 227.

Where ordinary care requires that an unexploded blast be withdrawn in the same manner whether the fuse be wet or dry, a failure to warn a servant that the fuse is wet is no breach of the master's duty, where an explosion was due solely to the negligent manner in which the charge was withdrawn. Henderson v. Williams, 66 N. H. 405, 23 Atl. 365.

The act of a gang boss in directing one employed to break rock and drill holes to withdraw an unexploded charge of dynamite being that of a fellow servant, the master is not liable for the former's failure to warn the servant of the danger of an explosion, notwithstanding he had no experience in the use of such explosive. Vitto v. Farley, 15 Misc. 153, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1105.

So, the failure to warn an inexperienced servant of the dangers of blasting does not constitute actionable negligence where an explosion is due solely to the negligence of an experienced servant. O'Brien v. Buffalo Furnace Co. 68 App. Div. 451, 73 N. Y. Supp. 830.

And it is not necessary for a master to warn a servant, although but little experienced in using dynamite, of the probable dangers arising from the negligent use thereof by a fellow servant. Klos v. Hudson River Ore & Iron Co. 77 App. Div. 566, 79 N. Y. Supp. 156.

A master is not liable for the failure to warn an inexperienced servant of the danger of blasting, which he is not employed to perform, where he was wrongfully placed at such work by a fellow servant, as he thereby assumed the risk of injury. Kopf v. Monroe Stone Co. 133 Mich. 286, 95 N. W. 72.

The master's duty to warn an inexperienced servant of the dangers inherent to the work of blasting cannot be delegated, so as to relieve the former from liability for breach thereof. Burrows v. Ozark White Lime Co.; Archer-Foster Constr. Co. v. Vaughn; and Pinney v. King.—supra; Lo-frano v. New York & Mt. V. Water Co. 55 Hun, 452, 8 N. Y. Supp. 717, affirmed without opinion in 130 N. Y. 658, 29 N. E. 1033; Peters v. George, supra.

As the failure to warn is a breach of the master's absolute duty, he is not relieved from liability by the fact that the negligent foreman was working as a fellow servant with the injured youth at the time the explosion occurred. Burrows v. Ozark White Lime Co. 82 Ark. 343, 101 S. W. 744.

As to the duty of a master generally to instruct and warn a servant as to the perils of his employment, see the subject note to James v. Rapides Lumber Co. 44 L.R.A. 33.

v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 39, 91 N. W. 820; Carver v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 120 Iowa, 346, 94 N. W. 862.

Bishop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The accident out of which grew the injuries of which plaintiff complains occurred in July, 1902, and the circumstances leading up to and immediately attendant upon the same were these: The defendant was engaged in cutting through a natural surface elevation preparatory to laying a line of its railroad track. To facilitate the removal of earth and rock, explosives (dynamite and powder) were used. Incident to the work, holes 2 inches in diameter were drilled from the surface down to a depth of several feet, varying according to the elevation. In such holes several sticks of dynamite were dropped, and each of these sticks was inclosed with common wrapping paper. On the last stick to be dropped was placed an explosive cap, and thereto was attached a fuse some 2 feet in length. As we understand it, the fuse is tubelike in appearance. It consists of a cotton wrapper filled with some form of ignitable powder. As the stick to which the cap and fuse were attached was about to be dropped into the hole, the extreme end of the fuse was lighted with a match. The burning of the fuse down to the cap would result in an explosion, involving, of course, all the sticks in the drill hole. As the force of dynamite is exerted downward, the result of the explosion would be to break up the rock and loosen up the earth at the bottom of the drill hole, and this process was called "springing the hole." Following this, the drill hole was filled with blasting powder, and this was exploded by means of a wire charged with electricity from a battery. Plaintiff, a young man about twenty-two years of age, was in the employ of defendant as a dynamiter, or powderman, so called, and, on the day of the accident, had dropped dynamite into a drill hole and exploded it in the usual way. Thereafter, and within a few minutes, he proceeded to pour powder into the hole, and this was followed immediately by an explosion, resulting in the personal injuries of which complaint is now made. The action is bottomed on negligence. Several grounds were alleged, but only one was submitted to the jury,—that of the alleged failure on the part of defendant to instruct and warn plaintiff respecting the dangers incident to the work in which he was employed. At the close of the evidence for plaintiff, the defendant moved for an instructed verdict on the grounds: First, the evidence failed to show negligence on the part of defendant; second, the evidence convicted plaintiff of contributory negligence. The motion was overruled. After verdict the like matters were again presented by a motion for new trial, and such motion was overruled. In these rulings lies the error principally contended for.

Necessary, of course, to a determination of the questions presented by the several motions, is the evidence. Plaintiff, as a witness, detailed the circumstances of his employment and of the accident, and we shall have the facts before us in the light most favorable to him by quoting from his testimony, using his own language. On direct examination he testified: "I commenced working for the railway company in April, 1901. Before that worked as a day laborer. During the summer I worked in the pit. In September I worked at drilling holes for about four days, and then again in the pit until Christmas, after which I again helped in drilling holes. James Nesmith was giving directions to the men during all that time. I loaded rock and worked in the dirt and used dynamite to break up frost. Before that I had no experience with powder or dynamite, but had seen holes loaded with dynamite. Later I went to another branch, where we shot frost with dynamite. In April, 1902, went to Fairport, where I took the job of dynamiter. Nesmith came to me and wanted to know if I would be dynamiter, to use the dynamite, and I told him I would if I could be Sunday watchman. He said I had better take it, and I said I would if I didn't have to do any drilling, and could be Sunday watchman. Up to that time I don't think I ever had experience in handling powder; had not had experience in springing holes with powder or dynamite; didn't know anything about the effect of dynamite as an explosive, or about the effect of powder, except what I saw there; did not know whether blasting with dynamite at the bottom of a hole would leave sparks. The ordinary practice was to spring the holes as quick as ready, and then they would be exploded as soon as the dirt was needed. To spring the holes several sticks were dropped in, after which a stick having a cap and fuse was dropped down on top of the others. I would light the fuse, drop the stick down in the hole, and then get away. The explosion would not show on the surface, except that some dust and dirt would come out at the top. At the bottom the effect would be to give it more cavity for the powder. Nesmith told me to use a fuse. We exploded the powder with a battery. At that time I did not know of the liability of sparks in the hole after the explosion. The dynamite sticks were wrapped with yellow wrapping paper, and were put down in the hole with the paper on them. Nesmith gave me directions in regard to the shooting. The powder and dynamite would not fill the hole to the top, but we would fill the hole clear up with rock and dirt. Nesmith never told me how long to wait between the time of springing the hole and pouring in the powder. I did not know of danger in pouring in powder within a short time after springing the hole. July 11th Nesmith started for Davenport. We had started drilling two holes, and he told Tom Nesmith to get those holes ready to shoot when he came back. The next morning I started at the first hole and drilled until the train came; then I took the drill out and started another hole. I went down to get some dynamite. That was about the time the train pulled in. I then went to the car to get the powder off the train. James Nesmith asked if I had the holes ready and I said: 'I just sprung them.' He said: 'Go ahead, and load them. We want to get something done. We are late.' I started to load the hole. I did not know that there was any sparks down in the hole at the time. Nesmith didn't tell me the work was dangerous, or ask me if I had had experience in this field of labor. He did not tell me anything about there being sparks from the paper around the dynamite. I think about five minutes elapsed between the springing of the hole and the time I poured the powder in."

On cross-examination he testified: "After September, 1901, I was drilling holes for the purpose of loading them with dynamite and powder and exploding them. I used explosives at Fairport. I saw them use it there. I did not assist in exploding any of the holes, or see them light the fuse, or know why it was done. From that time until Christmas they used explosives, and as the work was carried on I was there as usual. I saw them drill and explode holes during that time. I knew how it was done. I knew that from observing how the other fellows did it. I saw them get ready to discharge the dynamite, and with the rest would get out of the way. After Christmas I went to work in the pit, and then Tom Nesmith helped me load some holes. Sometimes I would light a fuse, and sometimes he did. I knew when I lit the fuse it would burn and be followed by an explosion. When the fuse was lit, the fire was communicated to the wrapper outside. It was April or May when we came to Fairport and I took the position of powderman as the result of a conversation with James Nesmith. The reason I did not want to drill was that I had done enough of that. I had been drilling ever since I was on the job excepting what little work I did in the pit. After that I had charge of the drilling and exploding loads, and charge of the powder and dynamite up to the time of the accident; but it was under the supervision of James Nesmith. I had quite a number of men at work with me in connection with the drilling and loading holes off and on. Nesmith got the dynamite and powder somewhere, but it was unloaded in the pit, and I got it there. When I wanted powder and dynamite I went down after it myself, but sometimes one of my men had to get it. Sometimes we would spring a hole with dynamite twice before I loaded it with powder. I was in charge of the dynamite, and I examined the holes, and I would put in the charges and explode them. When I got ready to load the hole I went or sent down for the powder. I determined the question of how much powder should be put down, but not always. It depended on what Nesmith wanted. I did not wait every time to have him tell me about it. Sometimes I did it as I thought it ought to be done, and went down and got as many cans as I thought necessary, using my own judgment. I do not remember of asking Nesmith about how many cans of powder to put in a hole more than once or twice. In springing the hole it would depend on how soon they wanted it about my loading it with powder. I cannot tell how much time would elapse between the springing of the hole and the loading of it. I sprung the holes as soon as they were drilled. I did that to get the work off my hands and have it in shape for loading. I did not know that the reason for springing the holes as soon as they were drilled was that there might be sufficient time elapse between the springing and the loading of them with powder to let any refuse matter left in the hole burn out and the hole cool off. I did not put the powder in right after springing the hole, because I did not think there was any need of it. I did not suppose there would be any fire in the hole after springing with dynamite. We did not put powder in right away every time, but did as soon as they were ready for the hole. I do not know whether it was 10 minutes or half an hour. Outside of this one time I do not know whether we put powder in within half an hour after the hole was sprung. After May we would spring holes five or six times a week. I knew that fire would explode powder, but did not know that, if there was fire down in the hole, it would ignite powder. I did know that if I had a burning fuse made of cotton which came in contact with powder there would be an explosion, and I knew that the fuse burned slowly, and I knew that there was paper around dynamite, and that it had the appearance of being oily. On the Fourth of July I took home some of the sticks of dynamite and some fuses and used them in my celebration."

On redirect examination, he testified: "About the blasting, Nesmith told me what to do. No one told me when to shoot the holes, but Nesmith gave me instructions about the blasting. I do not mean to be understood as having any men at work under me. I knew the fuse and the paper on the dynamite would burn, but did not know whether the fuse remained in the hole or was blown out by the dynamite. I don't know whether or not the dynamite would set fire to paper and cause an explosion."

On recross-examination he testified: "I have often celebrated on the Fourth of July, and have fired all kinds of firecrackers. I had observed that firecrackers after being exploded very frequently retained fire. Some of the firecrackers will burn after being exploded, and I have sometimes lit a new firecracker from the burning parts of the old ones. This was before the accident."

On redirect examination he testified: "I don't know what firecrackers are made of, or if there is any dynamite in them. Powder will set fire to anything that burns. I don't know whether dynamite will or not."

Stated generally, the duty of a master to warn and instruct his employees arises when the existence of danger is, or should be, in the exercise of reasonable care, known to him, and the existence of such danger is either unknown to them, or is not discoverable by them, in the exercise of reasonable care, or when the danger is such in character as not to be properly appreciated by them by reason of their lack of experience, their youth, or general incompetency or ignorance. 4 Thomp. Neg. § 4055. In taking an adult servant into his employ in a particular capacity, the master has the right, generally speaking, to presume competency on the part of such servant, and that he appreciates the dangers ordinarily incident to the work he undertakes to do. Of course, if the master knows, or has reason to believe, that the servant is ignorant, the duty to warn and instruct exists. Yeager v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 5, 61 N. W. 215; McCarthy v. Mulgrew, 107 Iowa, 76, 77 N. W. 527. It has never been considered, however, that the duty to warn and instruct extends to those dangers incident to a particular employment which are obvious. And, having regard for the character of the employment, an obvious danger is one that is discoverable in the exercise of that reasonable care which persons of ordinary intelligence may be expected to take for their own safety. Newbury v. Getchell & M. Lumber & Mfg. Co. 100 Iowa, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

451, 62 Am. St. Rep. 582, 69 N. W. 743; Hanson v. Hammell, 107 Iowa, 171, 77 N. W. 839.

With these rules—fundamental in the law of negligence—in mind, let us analyze the evidence on which the single charge of negligence is sought to be supported. Plaintiff was an adult, and no question is made but that he was a young man of ordinary perceptive faculties and intelligence. He had been in the service of the defendant in and about the work of blasting and removing earth and rock for a year before he took the job of dynamiter or powderman. During that year he had drilled the preliminary holes, and had observed the work of blasting as it was being carried on. On numerous occasions he had assisted in the work, and says that he knew how it was done. During the three or four months that he acted as powderman he was in charge of the work, under Nesmith, he says; but it seems that the oversight did not extend beyond giving instructions as to the time and place of blasting. There was but one way to do the work. It was simple, and plaintiff says that he acted on his own initiative in doing it. He knew what material the sticks of dynamite were covered with, and of what a fuse was composed, and that such were inflammable. He knew that he was introducing fire into the drill hole when he dropped a lighted fuse therein, and he knew that fire was likely to cling to a shattered fuse for some length of time following the process of springing the hole. He knew that powder, when brought into contact with fire, would explode. Indeed, had Nesmith on the morning of the accident assumed to warn plaintiff of the possibility of particles of smoldering fire remaining in a hole recently sprung, and of the danger of pouring powder into such hole before the lapse of sufficient time to make sure that the fire had died out, it would be incredible that he should be met with any other statement than that "I know that as well as you do." Moreover, plaintiff ought not to be heard to say that he did not know. He had undertaken the work voluntarily. Confessedly, he knew that he was dealing with dangerous materials, and that a proper handling thereof was absolutely essential to safety. It became his duty, therefore, to familiarize himself with all the dangers incident to the work. And, without doubt, this must be held to include knowledge respecting the length of time which, in the interests of safety, should be allowed to intervene between the operation of springing a hole and the insertion of a powder charge. And we think it must be said that he did know all that anyone could have known. Of course, no one could fix in advance and with exactness the length of time necessary; but, knowing the nature and character of the substance being dealt with, it would seem that common sense alone would indicate that safety required more than a few minutes of time. It is not material that Nesmith did not, on the particular occasion in question, warn plaintiff of the danger in loading the hole with powder within a few minutes after such hole had been sprung. It is to be borne in mind that the conduct of Nesmith on the occasion is not before us for consideration as an act of negligence. Whatever bearing it has is on the question of the right of plaintiff to be warned and instructed. Now, if plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, of the danger incident to charging a hole with powder within a few minutes after springing the hole, he was not entitled of right to a warning. "The master is therefore under no duty of warning or instructing a servant as to dangers which are discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care on his part, with such knowledge, experience, and judgment as he actually possesses, or as the master is justified in believing that he possesses." 4 Thomp. Neg. § 4063.

We conclude that a case of negligence on the part of defendant is not made out by the record; and, not only this, but that plaintiff has failed to show that he acted in the premises with the degree of care that, under all the circumstances, was demanded of him. It follows that the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN ALLYN et al., Appts.,

v.

LOUISVILLE SCHOOL BOARD et al.

(— Ky. —, 115 S. W. 206.)

School books—Illegal change—right of publisher.

Publishers of school books cannot enjoin discontinuance in a particular school of the books published by them because the school board has not complied with the provisions of the statute in making the change, where they have no contract with the patrons of such school to furnish it with their books.

(January 15, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Second Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County sustaining a demurrer to the petition in an action brought to restrain defendants 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from discontinuing the use of certain textbooks in the public schools of Louisville. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kohn, Baird, Sloss, & Kohn, for appellants:

The effort of the school board to substitute other books for appellants' was in violation of the statute.

Ky. Stat. §§ 2949, 2951, 2957; Louisville v. Hyatt, 2 B. Mon. 177, 38 Am. Dec. 574, 5 B. Mon. 199.

The publishers have a right to supply their books to the public schools, and the action of the board violates that right, and injures the complainants, who are therefore entitled to enjoin the board from putting in force its threatened, unauthorized, and illegal order, to their injury.

Johnson v. Ginn, 105 Ky. 655, 49 S. W.

Case Note. — Who may complain of noncompliance with statute in adopting or changing text-books in schools.

In Ginn & Co. v. School Book Board, 62 W. Va. 428, 59 S. E. 177, a publishing house, upon the expiration of a contract to furnish text-books, sought a mandamus to compel the defendant school board to renew the contract where the provisions of the statute had not been complied with in making a change of books. The provision of the statute violated was one requiring a certain vote for more than one change of books, and the court held that it was to prevent frequent and extensive changes, entailing on the public outlay for new books; and that its object was not to subserve the ends of publishers, but solely the interests of the public. Mandamus was accordingly refused.

Atty. Gen. ex rel. Marr v. Board of Education, 133 Mich. 681, 95 N. W. 748, was a consolidated action in which the publishers of text-books sought to enjoin a change of text-books in the public schools of Detroit; the law required that books should not be changed under five years, except under certain conditions which had not been complied with; there was no contract with the publisher. It was held that they were not entitled to the relief sought, the law having been enacted, not for the protection of book dealers, but for the protection of the public.

The case of Lenhart v. Board of Education, 5 Ohio N. P. N. S. 129, was an action to enjoin the defendant board and its co-defendant, a publishing house, from placing certain books in the schools. While the decision does not squarely present the question under discussion, it is included because an injunction was granted at the suit of a citizen and taxpayer to prevent the change of books, because such change had been provided for by an order adopted contrary to the statute.

O'Rear, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

The Louisville School Board is a body corporate, charged by law with public education in the city of Louisville. The statute (§ 2957, Ky. Stat. 1903) imposes these duties upon the board: "The board shall prescribe the branches of education to be taught, and the text-books to be used. Text-books once adopted shall not be changed, except by unanimous consent of the board, until notice of said proposed change shall be given and entered upon the records of the board one scholastic year, and then only by the affirmative vote of not less than two thirds of the members. Schools may be opened as part of said school system to teach children of the ages of four, five, and six years by the kindergarten method. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as affecting in any way the present method of taking the school census or as increasing or reducing the pro rata of the school fund to be received from the state of Kentucky by the school board of cities of the first class, nor to be construed as conflicting with or changing in any way §§ 166 and 189 of the act for the government of cities of the first class, being now §§ 2949 and 2974 of chapter 89 of the Kentucky Statutes." In 1901 and 1903 the board had adopted, as part of the course of studies in certain of the public schools of Louisville, Scott & Chute's Elementary English Compositions and Carhart & Chute's High School Physics. Those books are published by appellants, who are nonresidents of Louisville. In 1907 the board, not all the members being present, adopted a resolution changing the course of study in certain particulars in the public schools of Louisville, substituting for the two books named Lockwood & Emerson's Composition and Rhetoric and Milliken & Gayle's First Course in Physics. Those last named are not published by appellants.

This action was brought by appellants seeking an injunction against the school board and the superintendent of the schools of Louisville, restraining them from discontinuing the use of appellants' books, and from adopting the others in lieu of them, as well as to compel the appellees to continue the use of appellants' two books in the public schools of Louisville till they were legally changed. It was charged that the board was powerless to make the change unless all its members concurred, or unless after one year's notice as many as ten of its members voted to change. A special demurrer was filed to the petition, on the ground that plaintiffs were without power to maintain the suit. The demurrer was sustained, and the injunction was denied, and, appellants having declined to plead further, their petition was dismissed.

Appellants have not a contract to furnish their books to patrons of the Louisville public schools. They are not bound to do so. Indeed, they may refuse to do so, or may cease to publish the books altogether without liability to the patrons of these schools or to the school board. The legislation which requires the establishment by public authority of a uniform system of education by adopting and maintaining, till deliberately changed by adequate public authority, such text-books as may have been selected in the public schools of the city, is a measure solely for the benefit of the public,—the patrons of the schools. The publishers are not the subject at all of the legislative action. It was never intended by it to confer any right upon them, or to allow them to interfere in the matter in any way. If a patron of the school feels aggrieved at the action of the school board, the courts are open to hear his complaint, because his rights would be affected, and it was his rights and interest that formed the subject of legislation.

Appellants contend that the statute creates a status which they, engaged in the business of publishing and selling these school books, have the legal right to have the advantage of; that their right to prosecute their business in this locality is affected by the adverse illegal action of the school board, and it being illegal, as they contend, and affecting their business, it infringes their right, which they may have repressed in the courts. It may be conceded that appellants have the right to publish the books and to sell them to whomsoever they can. It may also be conceded that the action of the school board in this affair incidentally affects their business, in that it diminishes their sale of books. But their right is not one attaching to the conduct of the schools of Louisville, and has no legal connection with it. No more so than the clothier who sells the children wearing apparel, or the materialmen who sell supplies to build the schoolhouses. The law requires the public schools to be conducted so many months each year. If they are not opened, it would follow that those who would be pupils need not supply themselves with books. Could appellants maintain mandamus against the school board to compel the schools to be conducted for the statutory period, in order that they might sell their books to the pupils? The law also is compulsory that all children between certain ages should attend the public or some other school. If any number of the children of Louisville within the school age were not attending any school, would injunction lie against the children to compel them to attend, so that appellants might have a market for their books? All these are matters that legally concern the local public. Appellants have not such rights as entitle them to maintain this action. Strong v. Campbell, 11 Barb. 135; Colorado Paving Co. v. Murphy, 37 L.R.A. 630, 23 C. C. A. 631, 49 U. S. App. 17, 78 Fed. 28; State ex rel. Clark v. Haworth, 122 Ind. 462, 7 L.R.A. 240, 23 N. E. 946; Iverson v. School Comrs. (C. C.) 39 Fed. 735; Ross v. Stackhouse, 114 Ind. 200, 16 N. E. 501. Johnson v. Ginn, 105 Ky. 655, 49 S. W. 470, and American Book Co. v. McElroy, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 960, 76 S. W. 850, cited by appellants, do not apply. Ginn & Company and the American Book Company were under contracts and bond with the state to supply the books on their lists on file with the state board of education, and the local communities had no option but to buy them after they had been selected by the county boards. The relation of the parties was one based upon contract, and we held in the cases just cited that the rights of the booksellers, created by their contract, might be enforced. Without deciding any of the other questions presented in briefs, it is ordered that the judgment of the Circuit Court sustaining the special demurrer to appellants' petition and dismissing the petition be affirmed.

HARRIET E. FRENCH

v.

MERCHANTS & MINERS TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Carrier — baggage — limited liability.

1. A provision on a transportation ticket that the carrier is not to be responsible for the destruction of baggage by fire is binding on the passenger in its application to fires not caused by the carrier's negligence, although it is in print so fine that the passenger cannot, because of defective sight, read it, if the printed provisions on the ticket are sufficiently conspicuous to charge

Case Note. — Limitation of carrier's liability for passenger's baggage.

The cases very generally hold that it is a part of a carrier's duty to carry the baggage of its passengers, subject, of course, to certain restrictions as to quantity and character. The question whether a common carrier may limit his liability for baggage is ordinarily determined by the same general principles of law that apply to carriers' contracts generally. It is therefore sometimes difficult to determine the correct rule in a jurisdiction from an examination confined to the cases involving baggage, as the rule may have become firmly established in that jurisdiction by its application in cases involving the carriage of freight, and followed without any discussion. The apparent anomaly presented by the fact that in most of the cases involving stipulations purporting to exonerate the carrier from all liability such stipulations have been upheld even as to negligent losses or injuries, whereas many cases involving stipulations limiting the amount of liability have been declared invalid as applied to negligent losses or injuries, is accounted for by the fact that the cases presenting the first question happened to arise in those jurisdictions which were committed, by decisions in respect to freight, to the doctrine that it is not against public policy for a carrier to stipulate against its own negligence, while many of the second class of cases arose in jurisdictions committed to the contrary doctrine.

In the great majority of the cases the limitation, or attempted limitation, is made by means of printed stipulations upon the passengers' tickets, and in very many cases the decision turns upon the question whether the acceptance of a ticket containing such stipulations constitutes a contract or not. In all such cases there is, of course, an implied ruling that the carrier may limit his liability, but such cases have not been included in this note, which is limited to those cases expressly passing upon the question, May a carrier limit its liability for loss or injury to a passenger's baggage?

him with notice that they contain a contract.

Same — negligence — delay in transportation.

2. Mere delay in forwarding baggage from an intermediate station is not the proximate cause of its destruction by fire while there, so as to render the carrier liable therefor on the ground of negligence in permitting the delay.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover the value of baggage lost while in defendant's possession for transportation, limit his liability for merchandise carried as baggage have also been excluded from this note, as the cases generally hold that the carrier is under no obligation to carry merchandise as baggage, and cases of that character would therefore present a different question.

The phrase "limitation of liability," as applied to the carriage of baggage, is frequently used in two senses: First, in the sense of exonerating the carrier from all loss; and, second, in the sense of exonerating him from loss beyond an agreed amount; but cases in which the facts present one question are not necessarily authority for those presenting the other. For instance, a court which holds that a carrier may not limit its liability so as to exonerate itself from all loss might consistently hold that a stipulation limiting the liability of a carrier to a fixed amount, which was to be deemed the fair value of the goods, would be reasonable and valid. This distinction, however, is not recognized in all of the cases, and in some cases there are not sufficient facts given to determine to which class the case really belongs. But so far as possible the cases will be grouped along these lines.

The great majority of the cases hold that a carrier cannot, by contract, limit his liability for losses due to his negligence. Some cases, however, hold that he may so limit his liability; and from that extreme position to the other extreme, that a carrier cannot even by express contract limit his strict common-law liability, the cases involving the right of a carrier to limit his liability take practically every possible position. And the same is true generally of the cases involving the right of a carrier to limit his liability as to the passenger's baggage, although almost all of the cases are those involving a negligent loss. Where, however, the loss was not due to the carrier's negligence, the fact will be noted.

It may be well to call attention at this point to two rules as to stipulations limiting carriers' liability, of very general application, which are suggested by some of the cases considered below, but the discussion of which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas R. Bateman and Harold W. Brown, for plaintiff:

A baggage check is not a contract, but a mere voucher.

Passengers are not bound by printed notices of limitation of liability unless they are aware of the same when they purchase their ticket; and the burden of proving assent to such conditions is on the carrier.

which is without the scope of this note: First, a carrier cannot contract against the effects of his wilful or wanton negligence; second, any stipulation in any way limiting a carrier's liability must be reasonable to be upheld.

Immunity from liability.

As was suggested above, the expression "limitation of liability" as applied to the carriage of baggage is frequently used in the sense of exonerating the carrier from all loss, and not merely for loss over a certain amount. As was said above, the cases involving this phase of the question have arisen for the most part in jurisdictions permitting a carrier to limit its liability even for negligence.

Thus, in Prentice v. Decker, 49 Barb. 21, the court said: "These principles must be deemed settled; namely, that common carriers of goods may, by express stipulation, limit their liability for the loss of goods occurring from even the negligence of their agents and servants, or wholly exempt themselves from such liability; and that the acceptance by the bailor, from the bailee, in the ordinary course of business, of a receipt for the goods, containing such a stipulation, creates a binding contract."

And in Nevins v. Bay State S. B. Co. 4 Bosw. 225, it was held that a carrier might limit his liability as to baggage, in whole or in part, by express contract.

So, in Peninsular & O. Steam Nav. Co. v. Shand, 3 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 272, it was held that it was open to carriers to limit their liability for loss or damage to baggage so as to exonerate themselves from all loss, —even that due to their own negligence.

In Stewart v. London & N. W. R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 135, it was held that the stipulation that a certain amount of luggage would be carried free at owner's risk exonerated the carrier from a loss due to its own negligence. And this case is cited with approval in Bate v. Canadian P. R. Co. 15 Ont. App. Rep. 388.

And in Dixon v. Richelieu Nav. Co. 15 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ont. App. Rep. 647, affirmed in 18 Can. S. C. 704, it was held that the words upon the ticket, to the effect that all baggage must be at the owner's risk against all casualties, protected the carrier against all contingencies except wanton negligence.

But in Camden & A. R. Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Pa. 67, 55 Am. Dec. 481, it was held that in Pennsylvania it was ruled that the common-law liability of a carrier might be limited or abridged by general notice that the baggage of the passenger is at the risk of the owner, provided that the notice is clearly brought home to the passenger; but a carrier cannot discharge himself from liability for loss due to lack of the ordinary care of a bailee for hire.

In Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 553, 12 L.R.A. 340, 25 Am. St. Rep. 660, 27 N. E. 665, where the contract purported to exonerate the carrier from all liability for the plaintiff's baggage, the court, after determining that the contract was to be governed by the law of England, said: "The contract being valid in England, where it was made, and the plaintiff's acceptance of it under the circumstances being equivalent to an express assent to it, and it not being illegal or immoral, it will be enforced here, notwithstanding that a similar contract made in Massachusetts would be held void as against public policy."

As to refusal to give effect to foreign contract exempting carrier from liability, see case note to Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Teeters, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 425; and also the general question of conflict of laws in relation to carriers' contracts, see case note to Southern Exp. Co. v. Gibbs, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874.

The same question frequently arises where the passenger is riding upon a free ticket or pass.

Thus, in Holly v. Southern R. Co. 119 Ga. 767, 47 S. E. 188, it was held that one who received of a railroad company a gratuitous pass over its line, which, by its terms, is "issued only on condition that the person accepting it assumes all risks of accidents, and expressly agrees that the company shall

Messrs. A. Nathan Williams and George F. Manson, for defendant:

A common carrier can, by stipulation in a special contract, exonerate itself from losses arising from causes over which it has no control and to which its own fault or negligence in no way contributes.

Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97; Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 163 Mass. 553, 12 L.R.A. 340, 25 Am. St. Rep. 660, 27 N. E. 665; Graves v. Adams Exp. Co. 176 Mass. 280, 57 N. E. 462; Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151; Arthur v. Texas & P. R. Co. 204 U. S. 505, 51 L. ed. 590, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 338.

One who accepts a contract, and proceeds to avail himself of its provisions, is bound by the stipulations and conditions expressed in it, whether he reads them or not.

Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. and Graves v. Adams Exp. Co. supra; Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 365, 5 L.R.A. 846, 23 N. E. 205; Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. supra.

The proximate cause of the loss of the plaintiff's trunk was not the delay in transportation, but, the fire which destroyed it and its contents, and for which the defendant was not responsible under the terms of its contract with the plaintiff, the fire not happening through any negligence or want of care on the part of the defendant.

Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106; Denny v. New York C. R. Co. 13 Gray, 481, 74 Am. Dec.

not be liable, under any circumstances, for any injury to the person, or loss or damage to the property of the person using it," cannot recover of the company the value of baggage lost while traveling on such pass.

And in Hutto v. Southern R. Co. 75 S. C. 295, 55 S. E. 445, where the passenger was traveling on a free pass or ticket, it was held that the carrier might stipulate upon what terms it would carry the passenger and his baggage, but could not stipulate that it would not be liable for the consequences of gross misconduct or wantonness.

So, in The Stella [1900] P. 162, it was held that a stipulation on a free ticket, exonerating the carrier from loss or damage however caused, was valid, and would bar a recovery even for a negligent loss.

And in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260, it was held that a stipulation on a free ticket that the carrier should not be liable under any circumstances for any loss was valid so far as ordinary negligence was concerned, but invalid as to gross negligence.

But in Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 41 Ala. 486, 94 Am. Dec. 607, it was held that the relationship of common carrier and passenger existed between the plaintiff and the defendant notwithstanding that the former was riding upon a free ticket, and public policy forbade that the carrier should be allowed to contract for exemption from liability for damage occasioned by the negligence, wilful default, or tort of himself or servants.

Amount of liability.

The rule is followed in many cases that a stipulation limiting the amount of the carrier's liability is invalid as applied to a negligent loss, under the general rule that a carrier cannot contract for exemption from the consequences of his own negligence.

Thus, in Thomas v. Southern R. Co. 131 N. C. 590, 42 S. E. 964, where the carrier had stipulated that he would not be liable 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for losses over a certain amount, the court adhered to and applied the following rule taken from 2 Fetter on Carriers of Passengers, § 627: "A common carrier of a passenger's baggage may, by express contract, relieve himself from his common-law liability as insurer; but by the weight of authority he cannot exempt himself from liability for the negligence of himself or his servants."

And in Coward v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 16 Lea, 225; 57 Am. Rep. 227, it was held that a stipulation limiting the amount of the carrier's liability was invalid as applied to a negligent loss. The court said: "A common carrier may relieve himself from the strict liability imposed on him by the common law by a special contract, but he cannot contract for exemption from the consequences of his own or his agent's negligence."

So, in International & G. N. R. Co. v. Foltz, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 644, 22 S. W. 541, it was held that a stipulation in a ticket limiting the liability of the carrier to a fixed amount was void as to a negligent loss, as a common carrier cannot contract against the consequences of its own negligence.

A stipulation limiting the amount of the defendant carrier's liability for losses due to its negligence was held invalid in Cohen v. South Eastern R. Co. L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 253, affirming L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 217.

In Williams v. Central R. Co. 93 App. Div. 582, 88 N. Y. Supp. 434, affirmed in 183 N. Y. 518, 76 N. E. 1116, it was held that the New Jersey statute permitting carriers to limit the amount of their liability was to be construed as limiting the carrier's liability as insurer, and was inapplicable to a negligent loss, as the New Jersey courts had held that it was contrary to public policy for a carrier to contract against the results of his own negligence.

A few cases, while not denying the general rule that a carrier cannot stipulate against its own negligence, nevertheless hold 645; Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Elliott, 20 L.R.A. 582, 5 C. C. A. 347, 12 U. S. App. 381, 55 Fed. 949.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is stated in the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff did not "contend that this fire was due to any negligence whatsoever on the part of the defendant, nor that the defendant was lacking in diligence in trying to control and extinguish said fire." This ended the plaintiff's case unless it was taken out of the usual rule by the fact that the jury were warranted in finding from the testimony of the plaintiff that she "could see large objects, but could not read print and had not been able to read for over a year previous to this trip."

We do not think that the plaintiff's case would have been taken out of the usual rule that a stipulation limiting the amount of the liability is valid, upon the theory that such a stipulation is not a contract against negligence, but is rather in the nature of an agreement as to the value of the goods shipped.

Thus, in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Nicholai, 4 Ind. App. 119, 51 Am. St. Rep. 206, 30 N. E. 424, in which case, from the facts, negligence on the part of the carrier was necessarily presumed, the court said: "The great weight of authority in this country now is in favor of excluding negligence as an element of contract between the carrier and the employer, and of holding the former to a rigid responsibility for any degree of negligence, without the power by contract to divest itself of it. . . . The rule which we have thus referred to applies, also, to contracts limiting the liability of the carrier to a certain sum in case of loss, unless that sum is agreed upon as the value of the goods or baggage, and the charges or rates of freight are ascertained and fixed upon the basis of such agreed valuation. In such a case the weight of authority seems to be that the shipper would be estopped from afterwards alleging that the value was more (even if there should be loss by the negligence of the carrier), for there would be no justice in allowing the shipper to be paid a larger value than that deliberately agreed upon, for an article which he had induced the carrier to take at a rate lower than would otherwise have been charged."

And in The Kensington, 183 U. S. 276, 46 L. ed. 196, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 102, it was held that a stipulation in a steamship passenger's ticket, which compels him to value his baggage at a certain sum, far less than it is worth, or, in order to have a higher value put upon it, to subject it to the provisions of the Harter act, by which the carrier would be exempted from all liability therefor from errors in navigation or management of the vessel or other negligence, is unreasonable and in conflict with public policy. The court 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if the jury had believed the plaintiff and found that her eyesight was what she testified it to be.

The usual rule is that a passenger who accepts a ticket on which the contract of transportation is stated is bound by its terms whether he reads it or not. Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505, 97 Am. Dec. 117, 1 Am. Rep. 131; Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 365, 5 L.R.A. 846, 23 N. E. 205; Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 553, 12 L.R.A. 340, 25 Am. St. Rep. 660, 27 N. E. 665; Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97; Graves v. Adams Exp. Co. 176 Mass. 280, 57 N. E. 462; John Hood Co. v. American Pneumatic Service Co. 191 Mass. 27, 77 N. E. 638.

The ticket here in question must be taken on this bill of exceptions to contain on its face nearly two quarto pages of printed provisions. It must have been apparent, even said that the conditions in the ticket did not bring the case within the principles of New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, cited below, nor of Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, in which the court said: "The limitation as to value has no tendency to exempt from liability for negligence. It does not induce want of care. It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on. The carrier is bound to respond in that value for negligence. The compensation for carriage is based on that value. The shipper is estopped from saying that the value is greater. The articles have no greater value, for the purposes of the contract of transportation, between the parties to that contract. The carrier must respond for negligence up to that value. It is just and reasonable that such a contract, fairly entered into and where there is no deceit practised on the shipper, should be upheld. There is no violation of public policy. On the contrary, it would be unjust and unreasonable, and would be repugnant to the soundest principles of fair dealing and of the freedom of contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if a shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss."

So, in Jacobs v. Central R. Co. 208 Pa. 535, 57 Atl. 982, it was held that a carrier might, by notice duly brought home to him, limit the amount of its liability as to the passenger's baggage. The court said: "This is not an attempt on the part of the common carrier to relieve itself from the consequences of its negligence, as it cannot, but is a limitation by express contract of its liability for the passenger's baggage which it carries without extra pay." And this decision was followed in Mogill v. Central R. Co. 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 164.

Still other cases hold that a stipulation limiting the amount of liability is valid even in the case of a negligent loss, without dis-to a person who can see only "large objects," that the ticket contained a contract, and the plaintiff was bound to have it read to her if she could not read it herself.

By the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant is not to be liable for injury to baggage arising from fire. The legal result of such a contract is that it is not liable for fire unless negligent. Grace v. Adams, supra; School Dist. v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 102 Mass. 553, 3 Am. Rep. 502; Pemberton Co. v. New York C. R. Co. 104 Mass. 144, 151; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304, 305, 15 Am. Rep. 106. What was said by this court in Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co. 153 Mass. 553, 557, 12 L.R.A. 340, 25 Am. St. Rep. 660, 27 N. E. 665, and in Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129, 137, 49 N. E. 97, means that such a contract is invalid if it is construed to be a contract exempting the carrier when he is negligent. It was not meant that, where the contract exempts the carrier generally without reference in terms to the subject of negligence, it is invalid altogether. Such a contract is construed to be a contract exempting the carrier unless the passenger proves that he was negligent.

The plaintiff therefore is thrown back on her contention that the jury were warranted in finding that the defendant agreed to carry her trunk from Savannah to Boston and was negligent in holding her trunk in Baltimore from June 4th until June 13th, when it was destroyed by fire. For the natural and probable consequences of that delay the defendant would be liable if such a finding was warranted on the evidence. But the destruction of the trunk by fire was not the natural and probable consequence of not forwarding it promptly, and, since the only liability of the defendant is for delay, it is not liable for its loss. Denny v. New York C. R. Co. 13 Gray, 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106. See also, in this connection, Whitcomb v. Bacon, 170 Mass. 479, 482, 64 Am. St. Rep. 317, 49 N. E. 742; Hurley v. Packard, 182 Mass. 216, 65 N. E. 64.

cusssing the question whether or not such a stipulation is a contract exempting the carrier from negligence.

Thus, in The Priscilla, 106 Fed. 739, reversed on other grounds in 52 C. C. A. 470, 114 Fed. 836, where the loss was due to the negligence of the defendant, the recovery was limited to the amount of the stipulation, the court holding that it was competent for a carrier to restrict its liability to a reasonable amount, unless an additional compensation was paid for a larger risk; and, when that distinctly formed a part of the contract, it was binding upon the passenger.

And in Tewes v. North German Lloyd S. S. Co. 186 N. Y. 151, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 199, 78 N. E. 864, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 909, it was held that the insertion in a steamship ticket of a provision limiting the liability of a carrier for loss of baggage to a certain amount unless the true value is declared and excess paid for at regular freight rates will operate to relieve the carrier from liability for such loss, even when due to his own negligence.

And in Rose v. Northern P. R. Co. 35 Mont. 70, 119 Am. St. Rep. 836, 88 Pac. 767, it was held that a carrier had a right to limit its liability for loss or injury to baggage to a certain amount, if such limitation was reasonable, even though the loss was due to its own negligence.

So, in The New England, 110 Fed. 415 (appeal dismissed in 62 C. C. A. 684, 129 Fed. 1006), it was stated that a reasonable limitation as to the amount of the baggage would be upheld, even though the loss was due to the negligence of the carrier; upon the facts of the case, however, the limitation was held unreasonable.

Transatlantique, 146 Fed. 516, where the loss was due to the negligence of the carrier, certain stipulations as to amount of liability were declared not binding upon the ground that they were unreasonable.

So, in Nevins v. Bay State S. B. Co. 4 Bosw. 225, where the loss was due to negligence, it was stated generally that a carrier might limit his liability as to baggage, in whole or in part, by express contract.

And in Bingham v. Rogers, 6 Watts & S. 495, 40 Am. Dec. 581, it was held that a carrier may, by express contract, limit the amount for which he shall be liable, even in case of a negligent loss.

Miscellaneous cases.

The following cases are not very explicit in the holding upon this point.

In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24, 25 L. ed. 531, the court said: "It is undoubtedly competent for carriers of passengers, by specific regulations, distinctly brought to the knowledge of the passenger, which are reasonable in their character and not inconsistent with any statute or their duties to the public, to protect themselves against liability, as insurers, for baggage exceeding a fixed amount in value, except upon additional compensation, proportioned to the risk." But this was dictum, as it does not appear that there was any limitation.

In Cole v. Goodwin, 19 Wend. 251, 32 Am. Dec. 470, the decision was to the effect that a carrier could not limit his common-law liability for baggage by notice brought home to the passenger, but implied that it might by express contract; but in a dissenting opinion by Judge Cowen it was vigorously argued that carriers could not limit their common-law liability even by express contract. This case was cited with approval in Jones v. Voorhees, 10 Ohio, 145, where it was held that common carriers could not limit their responsibility by notice brought home to the owner; but the court said: "But any substantial distinction between a notice brought home and an express special contract to limit responsibility is not easily perceived."

A release of liability for plaintiff's baggage, signed by her agent, which recited that the trunk in question was broken and unlocked, was held valid in Kanevsky v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 53 Misc. 564, 103 N. Y. Supp. 727.

In Glovinsky v. Cunard S. S. Co. 4 Misc. 266, 24 N. Y. Supp. 136, affirmed in 6 Misc. 388, 26 N. Y. Supp. 751, it was held that $283 was a reasonable amount for the plaintiff to carry as baggage for herself and two children; and, in an action for its loss, a verdict for that amount would not be disturbed, although upon plaintiff's ticket the defendant's liability was fixed at $50. The court further held that the reasonableness of the limitation was properly submitted to the jury. It does not appear in the last two cases whether or not the loss was due to the negligence of the carrier.

In Wensky v. Canadian Development Co. 8 B. C. 190, while it was not denied that a carrier might limit its liability for loss of baggage, yet a limitation in a ticket would be held to apply only to the regular baggage up to $100, and would not apply to excess baggage for which the plaintiff had paid extra rates.

Hand baggage.

Any limitation of liability as to baggage is generally held not to apply to hand baggage, the distinction between the two classes being that the passenger retains more or less of control over the baggage he carries with him to his stateroom or berth and the liability of the carrier as to such baggage is akin to that of an innkeeper.

Thus, in Holmes v. North German Lloyd S. S. Co. 184 N. Y. 280, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 650, 77 N. E. 21, it was held that a stipulation in a steamship ticket limiting liability for baggage to a certain amount did not apply to baggage intended to be taken by a passenger to the stateroom for use during the voyage. And to the same effect was the decision in Macklin v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 229.

And in Runyan v. Central R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 537, 43 L.R.A. 284, 41 Atl. 367, it was held that a stipulation limiting the amount of the carrier's liability as to loss of baggage was valid, but did not apply to hand baggage.

So, a railroad company was held liable for the loss of hand baggage delivered by a passenger to a porter on entering a train, in Louisville, N. & G. S. R. Co. v. Katzenberger, 16 Lea, 380, 57 Am. Rep. 232, 1 S. W. 44, although the ticket stated that "wearing apparel or baggage placed in the car will be entirely at the risk of the owner."

In Stevenson v. Pullman Palace-Car Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 112, it was held that it was the duty of the sleeping-car company to use reasonable care to guard its passengers from the depredations of thieves while they slept, and, if it did not exercise such care in regard to appellant's valise, and it was stolen, the company was liable; and this duty could not be evaded by any words printed on the check given the passenger, or by being posted up in the cars. Though the court was not obliged to decide the effect of an express contract as to the baggage, the language indicates that even an express contract would not exonerate the carrier from the effects of his negligence.

Statutes prohibiting limitation.

In some states a statute provides that a carrier cannot, by contract, limit his common-law liability. This provision, of course, applies to contracts concerning baggage.

In Texas the statute provides that a carrier cannot limit his common-law liability. Under this statute, contracts limiting the amount of the liability of the carrier as to baggage were held invalid in Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Seale, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 364, 67 S. W. 437; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Ware (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 343; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Fales, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 457, 77 S. W. 234. And the fact that the plaintiff was riding upon a pass or free ticket does not change the rule. White v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 962.

So, in Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Beasley, 104 Va. 788, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 183, 52 S. E. 566, it was held that a contract limiting the amount of the liability of a carrier for property loss while in its possession is void, where the statute makes invalid any contract by the carrier for exemption from liability for such loss.

And in Davis v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 83 Iowa, 744, 49 N. W. 77, it was held that, under the statutes of that state, a limitation of liability of the defendant to the amount of $100 for baggage, and no more, was ineffective.

Upon the question, Does stipulation exempting carrier from liability for passenger's baggage, or limiting amount thereof, cover losses due to negligence? see case note to Tewes v. North German Lloyd S. S. Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 199.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES C. WHITNACK

v.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON, & QUINCY RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(— Neb. —, 118 N. W. 67.)

Bill of lading — parol testimony.

1. When a bill of lading has been issued by a common carrier, signed and accepted by the shipper, it constitutes the contract for the shipment of merchandise therein described; and its terms cannot be altered or varied by parol testimony.

Headnotes by Good, C.

Same — construction — void conditions — effect.

2. The language used in a bill of lading is subject to the same rules of construction which govern other contracts; and, while the instrument is to be construed as a whole, invalid conditions will not necessarily render the contract invalid, and it may be enforced so far as it is valid.

Initial carrier — liability.

3. Where a common carrier accepts goods for shipment, to be delivered to a connecting carrier, the first carrier will be liable for any damages to the goods resulting directly from the negligence of such carrier,

Case Note. — Liability of carrier of property for loss occurring on connecting line, but due to its own negligence.

Cases where loss was due wholly to the negligence of the connecting carrier on whose line it occurred are not within the scope of this note, and have been excluded.

The doctrine in WHITNACK v. CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. Co., making an initial carrier responsible for losses resulting directly from its negligence, although the losses may not have actually occurred until after the property had been delivered to a second and connecting carrier, is generally recognized. This rule has been enforced in the following cases relating to the carriage of live stock:

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Thomas, 89 Ala. 297, 18 Am. St. Rep. 119, 7 So. 762, where the initial carrier itself loaded the cattle in a negligent manner in a car at the connecting point, without giving the consignor an opportunity to load and unload, as provided by the contract.

Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ivey (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 321, where the initial carrier failed to feed and water cattle upon a transfer to the connecting line.

Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Daggett, 87 Tex. 322, 28 S. W. 525, where there were delays in a shipment of cattle, and mixing of them in the loading of the train after they had been classified for market, and failure to feed and water them while in transit.

In Texas C. R. Co. v. O'Loughlin, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 640, 84 S. W. 1104, where the first carrier failed properly to bed the cars in which cattle were shipped over its lines, and transferred them in the same cars to a connecting line.

Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 89 Va. 703, 17 S. E. 127, where the negligence of the initial carrier in mixing the cattle of one shipper with those of another entailed a delay in delivery after reaching destination until the cattle could be separated, during which there was a considerable loss of weight.

although the loss may not actually occur until after the goods are delivered to the second carrier.

Same — separating cars — care taker.

4. A common carrier undertook, during extreme cold weather, to carry two car loads of potatoes, and deliver them to a connecting carrier. The contract provided that the shipper should furnish a care taker to accompany the shipment, and keep fires in the car to prevent the potatoes from freezing. The carrier separated the two cars while they were in transit and on its lines of railway, so that the care taker was prevented from attending to one car of the potatoes, and they were thereby permitted to freeze. Held, that the first carrier was liable even though the potatoes may not have frozen until after they were delivered to the second carrier.

v. Duncan, 137 Ala. 446, 34 So. 988, that the initial carrier would be liable for the loss sustained by reason of the delay in consequence of its negligence in routing a car by an unnecessarily long and circuitous route after refusal of the connecting carrier named in the bill of lading to receive the shipment, of which refusal the consignor was not notified.

The same rule was applied in Felton v. McCreary-McClellan Live Stock Co. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1058, 59 S. W. 744, where the initial carrier, in violation of its contract that the live stock should be carried to destination in the original car, transferred them from a roomy palace stock car to a smaller and ordinary car at the connecting point.

And in Eckert v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 211 Pa. 267, 109 Am. St. Rep. 571, 60 Atl. 781, where the carrier, in violation of its contractual duty to deliver live stock in a properly constructed car to a connecting carrier, transferred them to a car utterly unfit for their safe transportation.

And in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Herring (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 939, where a railroad company undertook to transport a car load of mares and colts over its line, and deliver them to a connecting railroad company to transport to destination, but, before starting them on the journey, negligently switched around the cars after loading them, and further delayed the start for several hours, following which it failed to feed the stock at the junction before delivering them to the connecting carrier, and, because of such illtreatment, it was found, upon reaching destination, that the animals were in bad condition, bruised, and wounded.

So, in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Stephens (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 933, it was held that an initial carrier was liable for death or injuries to horses, caused by rough and improper handling on its own line, whether the injuries became known before or after the horses had been transferred to the connecting line.

In Rock Island & P. R. Co. v. Potter, 36 Ill. App. 590, the initial carrier, having Same — burden of proof.

5. Where a common carrier's contract contemplates keeping two car loads of merchandise together, in charge of a care taker, and it separates the two cars so that the care taker is prevented from attending to one of them, and loss thereby ensues, the burden of proof is upon the carrier to prove that there was sufficient cause for separating the two cars. The fact of the separation of the two cars under the circumstances imports negligence.

(October 22, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to potatoes delivered to defendant for transportation, been grossly negligent in side-tracking a car load of hogs for three hours at the connecting point, was held liable for the value of the hogs that were found dead when the car was delivered two hours later by the connecting carrier at destination, which was two or three miles from the connecting point.

So the rule was applied in Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Strain, 81 Ill. 504, where the initial carrier, in violation of its implied agreement to furnish a proper car, which was to be transported to destination, furnished a defective car, in consequence of which hogs escaped while in transit over the connecting line; and in International & G. N. R. Co. v. Aten (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 346, where bees escaped while being transported over a connecting line, in consequence of a defective car furnished by the initial carrier.

And in Jones v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 115 Mo. App. 232, 91 S. W. 158, and on almost the same state of facts as those in the Strain Case, the court rendered a like decision, commenting on and commending that case, and, in referring to the defects of the car in the case at bar, called particular attention to the fact that here there was to be no unloading upon the transfer being made to the connecting road, and that accordingly the danger of losing the hogs by reason of the negligence of the first carrier in furnishing a defective car "did not end with its delivery to the second carrier, but continued throughout the entire route."

And the same rule was applied in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Harman, 91 Va. 601, 44 L.R.A. 289, 50 Am. St. Rep. 855, 22 S. E. 490, where lambs died after transfer to a connecting carrier's line, in consequence of drinking salt water in the initial carrier's stock yards before being loaded.

The general rule as to the initial carrier's liability has also been applied in a number of cases involving claims for losses to shipments of fruits and vegetables.

As where an initial carrier undertook to transport a car load of apples over its own line and also over the line of a connecting which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Frank E. Bishop, Fred M. De-weese, and Arthur R. Wells, for appellant:

The contract of shipment contained in the bill of lading, exempting the defendant from liability for loss or damage which occurred after delivery to the connecting carrier, is valid.

Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. New York C. & St. L. R. Co. (Union State Bank v. Fremont & M. Valley R. Co.) 66 Neb. 159, 59 L.R.A. 939, 92 N. W. 131; Miller Grain & Elevator Co. v. Union P. R. Co. 138 Mo. 658, 40 S. W. 894; Myrick v. Michigan railroad to the destination point, but neglected to furnish a reasonably safe and suitable car, and also refused a request made by the consignor, to permit him, as the rules of the company allowed, to put a man in the car in charge of a stove and fire to keep the apples from freezing in transit, the thermometer being then below zero. Popham v. Barnard, 77 Mo. App. 619.

And in Fox v. Boston & M. R. Co. 148 Mass. 220, 1 L.R.A. 702, 19 N. E. 222, an initial carrier whose contract, made with reference to the mildness of the weather, required it to transport a car load of apples to a connecting point in time for a freight train which left that point early the next morning, was held liable for damages by the freezing of the apples while on the connecting carrier's line in consequence of a fall of temperature following its negligent delay in delivering the apples at the connecting point, in consequence of which they missed the train referred to. The court held that the negligence of the initial carrier must be considered the proximate cause of the loss.

But the existence of the relation of proximate cause and effect under a very similar state of facts was denied in Michigan C. R. Co. v. Burrows, 33 Mich. 6, although the court was also of the opinion in that case that there was no negligence on the part of the initial carrier.

The general rule as to the initial carrier's responsibility was also followed in the case of Davis v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 70 Minn. 37, 72 N. W. 823, where a large loss resulted from the negligent loading of a shipment of boxes of lemons piled in an improper and unskilful manner by the first carrier in its cars, in which they were transported over its own line and connecting lines to their destination; "and although," as the court said, "the deterioration in the quality of the lemons would be continuous and progressive from one end of the entire route to the other, so that, in a certain sense, injury and loss occurred after the cars had been delivered by defendant [initial carrier] to its connecting carrier . . . but the primary proximate cause of total damage

The failure of the connecting carrier to protect the car from cold was a new intervening cause which relieves defendant from liability.

Mr. J. E. Kelby also for appellant.

Messrs. George W. Berge and Morning & Ledwith for appellee.

Good, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff, Charles C. Whitnack, recovered a judgment against the defendant railway company for damages to a shipment of potatoes while in transit from Omaha, Nebraska, to Ft. Worth, Texas, alleged to have been sustained by reason of defendant's negligence. The defendant has brought the case to this court on appeal. In February, 1905, plaintiff shipped from Omaha, over defendant's line of railway, two car loads of potatoes consigned to himself at Ft. Worth, Texas. Defendant's line of railway extended no further than Kansas City, Missouri, and from that point the potatoes were was the defendant's [initial carrier] negligence."

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Mazzie, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 68 S. W. 56, it was held error to refuse a requested charge relieving the delivering carrier from liability except for such damages as it could have prevented from the decay of grapes, which began while they were in the initial carrier's possession, owing to the improper manner in which they were packed and transported by it.

So the rule was applied in Kibby v. Michigan C. R. Co. 142 Mich. 313, 105 N. W. 769, where the initial carrier was bound by its contract to furnish a suitable car for the entire trip, and the potatoes were injured by rain during the transportation on the connecting line, in consequence of defects in the car.

And the rule was applied in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Marshall, 74 Ark. 597, 86 S. W. 802, to a similar state of facts, the injury in this case resulting from the rain, in combination with the filth on the floor, although the defect in the car was known to the shipper. As to the effect of the shipper's knowledge that the car is defective, see case note to Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. ante, 952.

And in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Coolidge, 73 Ark. 112, 67 L.R.A. 555, 108 Am. St. Rep. 21, 83 S. W. 333, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 582, where delay on both the initial carrier's and connecting carrier's lines contributed to the rotting and heating of potatoes, although the injuries did not develop until the potatoes were on the connecting carrier's line.

The decision in St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Myer, 75 Ark. 159, 86 S. W. 999, is simply to the effect that the last carrier was not liable for damages in consequence of the freezing of potatoes while in a car delivered by a preceding carrier, the court remarking that, if there was any negligence in the case, it was in the furnishing of a defective car, for which the last carrier was in no wise responsible.

And the initial carrier was held liable in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Wilkerson Bros. (Tex. Civ. App.) 82 S. W. 1069, where a car load of cabbages was damaged and partially destroyed by reason of the initial carrier's failure to provide a suitable car for their transportation over its own and the connecting line, and to see that it was properly and sufficiently furnished with ice. To the same effect is International & G. N. R. Co. v. Welbourne (Tex. Civ. App.) 113 S. W. 780.

The same rule was applied in San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 66 S. W. 792, where an initial carrier was held liable for the natural consequences of its delay and the loss ensuing therefrom, either in starting from the shipping point or while on its way to destination, of a car load of vegetables which it had undertaken to transport over its own line, and to transfer to a connecting line.

And the same rule as to the responsibility of an initial carrier for its negligence was followed in the case of Michigan C. R. Co. v. Curtis, 80 Ill. 324, where, by reason of the unreasonable delay in transportation and delivery by an intermediate carrier to a connecting carrier of certain fruit trees and shrubbery, it could not, by reasonable diligence, transport them to destination and deliver them to the consignee before their injury or destruction by frost or cold weather, all of which might have been prevented had there not been such delay in the first instance on the part of the intermediate carrier.

In Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Searles, 71 Miss. 744, 16 So. 255, where in consequence of the improper condition of cars furnished by the initial carrier a shipment of oats was injured by rain while on the connecting carrier's line.

And in Hunt v. Nutt (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 1031, where the damage to a quantity of corn meal shipped over the line of the initial and connecting carrier was due to the condition of the car in which it was shipped, which was furnished by the first carrier, and which was so defective, unsuitable, and uncleanly that the meal was contaminated and injured in value by some substance left on the car floor, although the car presented the appearance of being very clean upon being loaded.

And in the case of Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Bath, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 90 S. W. 56, where it was held that it was no defense to an action for damages resulting from the carrier's negligence in allowing a shipment to be carried over the line of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railroad. The weather was very cold, and, to prevent the potatoes from freezing, it was arranged that a care taker should accompany the shipment, and keep a fire in each of the cars. The potatoes, which were in bags, were so placed in the cars as to leave an open or vacant space in the center of each car. In these vacant spaces oil stoves were placed and lighted to keep the cars warm. A. C. Brown was employed by the plaintiff as care taker to accompany the potatoes and to attend to the stoves, and see that they were kept filled and burning. The potatoes in charge of Mr. Brown reached

St. Joseph, Missouri, in good condition. At this point the train was stopped for some time. Mr. Brown refilled the stoves, and adjusted the wicks preparatory to continuing the journey. As the train was leaving St. Joseph, Brown discovered that one of the cars was missing from the train. He made inquiries of the train crew, but received no information as to the missing car. The train was in motion, and he was informed that, if he was going on that train, he must get aboard. He got aboard the train, and proceeded on the journey with but one car. The other car having been cut out of the train at St. Joseph, was left be-of cotton to become wet while it was being transported over its line, that the last carrier was guilty of negligence in failing to prevent the development of the injuries after receiving the cotton, since the first carrier's negligence was at least a contributing cause, and it would be responsible for all the damages proximately resulting therefrom.

And in the case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Warner, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 93 S. W. 489, which was an action brought against two common carriers for damages to a printing outfit, including machinery and type cases, where it was held that it was proper for the court to instruct the jury that, if the initial carrier, in reloading the shipment from one car to another on its own line, did not exercise ordinary care, and such failure was the proximate cause of damage to the goods while on the line of the terminal carrier, the jury should find for the terminal carrier over against the initial carrier such damages for injuries as occurred on the terminal carrier's line, and that, if a part of the damage occurred on each of the roads, the jury should find against each defendant the damages that occurred on its line without the fault of the other.

The cases of Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Byers (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 1082; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 571, 79 S. W. 614, and Texas & P. R. Co. v. Slaughter, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 624, 84 S. W. 1085, present a different state of facts from the preceding cases in this note, as in these cases the conduct of the initial carrier of live stock, its delay in transportation or in furnishing cars ordered therefor, combined with some delay on the part of the connecting carrier, resulted in the arrival of the shipment at its destination and market after a decline in the market price, though the delay would not have occurred had there been no negligence on the part of the initial carrier. In each of these cases the court held an initial carrier responsible for the loss sustained by the consignor as a natural and proximate result of its negligence, and although the negligence and delay of a connecting carrier might have combined with that of the first carrier to produce the loss.

In some of the cases already cited, the contract between the consignor and the initial carrier provided that such carrier should be responsible only for losses or injuries occurring on its own lines, or that it should be relieved from liability of every kind after the property transported by it had left its line; but the court, notwithstanding these provisions of the contract, held the initial carrier liable for losses occurring on the connecting line, although due to the negligence of the initial carrier; such cases are the following: Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Strain, 81 Ill. 504; Felton v. McCreary-McClellan Live Stock Co. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1058, 59 S. W. 744; Kibby v. Michigan C. R. Co. 142 Mich. 313, 105 N. W. 769; Davis v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 70 Minn. 37, 72 N. W. 823; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Searles, supra; Jones v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 115 Mo. App. 232, 91 S. W. 158; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ivey (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 321; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Herring (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 939; Texas C. R. Co. v. O'Loughlin, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 640, 84 S. W. 1104; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Stephens (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 933; Butterick Pub. Co. v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 39 Tex. Civ. App. 640, 88 S. W. 299.

The case of Butterick Pub. Co. v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. supra, is also quite like the foregoing cases and was similarly decided, but it involved the transportation of a quantity of wool to market over an initial and connecting carrier's line, the wool reaching the market after a decline in prices, and after negligence on the part of the initial carrier similar to that in the foregoing cases.

In all of such cases it is somewhat difficult, from the facts given, to determine whether the loss in market value following the first carrier's negligence had occurred while the property transported was in the hands of the connecting carrier, or after it had been delivered by it at its destination; but it has been deemed best to here include the cases as given. It is not, however, intended to include in this note cases in which the loss resulting from the negligence of an initial carrier occurred after transportation by a connecting carrier and delivery by it, upon reaching the destination point.

hind. Brown reached Ft. Worth with the one car of potatoes in good condition. The other car load of potatoes with which we have to deal in this case reached their destination several days later, badly frozen and wholly worthless.

The plaintiff contends that the contract for the transportation of the potatoes was for a through shipment, while the defendant contends that the contract of the defendant was to carry the potatoes to Kansas City, and turn them over to the connecting carrier. The only act of negligence pleaded by the plaintiff was that the defendant negligently separated the cars at St. Joseph, whereby the care taker was prevented from taking care of the potatoes in the car that was left at St. Joseph, and that, by reason of that negligence, the potatoes were permitted to freeze. The evidence shows that the car load of potatoes, after being detained at St. Joseph for a few hours, was carried to Kansas City and turned over to the connecting carrier from twelve to fifteen hours after the fires had been attended to at St. Joseph. Defendant contends that the freezing of the potatoes did not occur while on its lines or in its possession, and contends that the potatoes froze after they were delivered to the connecting carrier, and that, under the contract of shipment, which will be referred to hereafter, the defendant was not liable for the loss sustained. Defendant relies upon the bill of lading as the contract of shipment, while the plaintiff contends that the contract for the shipment was oral, and that he is not bound by the provisions contained in the bill of lading. The evidence shows that on the day previous to the loading of the potatoes for shipment plaintiff arranged with the defendant for their transportation to Ft. Worth. At this time it was arranged that the potatoes should be loaded the next day by A. C. Brown, who would accompany the potatoes as the agent of the plaintiff. The freight rate, the kind of cars to be furnished, and the route were agreed upon. Plaintiff further admits that he understood and knew that a written contract or bill of lading was to be executed, and that he authorized Brown, as his agent, to ship the potatoes and sign such a contract. Brown also testified that he was authorized to, and did, sign the bill of lading. The greater part of this instrument is printed matter, and it clearly shows that it was originally designed as a contract for the shipment of live stock. Most of its provisions relate to live stock shipments, and can have no application to a shipment of potatoes. There are other provisions of a general nature which might apply to such merchandise as potatoes as well as to live stock. It is clear 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that many of the provisions relating to the shipment of live stock must be disregarded. In the printed form, and following the words "Cars loaded with," occurs the word "potatoes." The names and number of the car are written in their appropriate places. This contract was used by Brown to secure his free passage as care taker on the train.

The question is: Does the bill of lading constitute the contract of shipment, or may the plaintiff rely upon the prior oral agreement which preceded the making of the written contract? No doubt exists that an oral contract for the transportation of freight would be valid, but the question is not whether an oral contract would be valid, but whether a written contract was made. That such a one was made is beyond question. May a written contract be disregarded and set aside when it contains many provisions which cannot be given effect because they are wholly inapplicable to the subject-matter of the contract? The rule of law is general that, where a written contract has been made between the parties, it cannot be altered or contradicted by parol, and that all oral negotiations leading up to the making of the written contract are merged therein; and this rule is applicable to bills of lading. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 427. It was clearly the intention of the parties that there should be a written contract, and one was deliberately made and entered into. The fact that the contract contains many provisions which cannot be given effect, and which it is apparent were never intended to be given effect, does not appear to be any sufficient reason for holding the contract invalid, or to justify setting aside and disregarding the provisions which are applicable to the subject-matter of the contract. A bill of lading is an instrument issued by a carrier to the consignor, consisting of a receipt for the goods and an agreement to carry them from the place of shipment to the place of destination. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 417, and cases there cited. The language used in a bill of lading is subject to the same rules of construction which govern other contracts; and, while the instrument is to be construed as a whole, invalid conditions will not necessarily render the contract invalid, and it may be enforced so far as it is valid. Grieve v. Illinois C. R. Co. 104 Iowa. 659, 74 N. W. 192; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 418.

The bill of lading in the case at bar contains the following provision: "Nor shall said railway company be liable for loss or damage after delivery to any connecting line, nor for any loss or damage not incurred upon its own line." The defendant contends that the evidence shows that the loss or damage complained of occurred after the delivery of the potatoes to the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company at Kansas City, and that, under the provisions of the contract above quoted, it is not liable to the plaintiff in this case. The evidence shows that the oil stoves used to keep the potatoes warm would ordinarily burn about twelve hours, and the evidence shows that the stove in the car that was left at St. Joseph was filled and lighted about twelve or fourteen hours previous to its being turned over to the connecting carrier at Kansas City. The defendant argues that the presumption is that the stove continued to burn and keep the car warm, and that the potatoes were not frozen while in its possession. The evidence also shows that the potatoes remained in the yards of the connecting carrier at Kansas City for several days, and that the car, when received by it at Kansas City, was in bad condition; that several of the boards constituting one end of the car were broken, thus exposing the interior of the car to the cold air. The weather was shown to have been extremely cold during the time the potatoes were in the yards of the connecting carrier at Kansas City. It is not clearly shown from the record when the potatoes froze; whether they suffered from the cold prior to the time they were delivered to the connecting carrier or afterwards. We do not think, however, that this is material. The rule both at common law and in this state is that a common carrier is not liable for the negligence or default of the connecting carrier in the absence of a contract making it liable therefor. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. (Union State Bank v. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co.) 66 Neb. 159, 59 L.R.A. 939, 92 N. W. 131. But this rule does not relieve the initial carrier from liability on account of its own negligence. The first carrier may, by its own negligence in dealing with the goods, render itself liable to the shipper, even though the actual loss resulting is not apparent until the goods are in the possession of the second carrier. The real question is, Did the loss occur as the direct result of the negligence of the initial carrier? If so, then its negligence was the proximate cause, and it would be liable. Selma & M. R. Co. v. Butts, 43 Ala. 385, 94 Am. Dec. 694; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 89 Va. 703, 17 S. E. 127; Fox v. Boston & M. R. Co. 148 Mass. 220, 1 L.R.A. 702, 19 N. E. 222. Under our Constitution, as interpreted by this court, a railroad company cannot, by contract with the shipper, limit its liability as a common carrier, nor may it by contract relieve itself from the consequences of its negligence as a common carrier. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Vandeventer, 26 Neb. 222, 3 L.R.A. 129, 41

N. W. 998; St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Palmer, 38 Neb. 403-471, 22 L.R.A. 335, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 494, 56 N. W. 957. In the instant case it may be admitted, for sake of argument, that the potatoes did not freeze until after they were delivered to the connecting carrier at Kansas City. But this would not relieve the defendant from liability if its negligence was the proximate cause of the freezing of the potatoes. The contract of shipment bound the defendant, not only to deliver the potatoes to the connecting carrier, but to deliver them with a care taker in charge. In this defendant failed. By its act in separating the two cars it made it impossible for the care taker to remain in charge of both cars. The care taker could not maintain the fires in the car left behind, and thereby the potatoes in that car were permitted to freeze. This was sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the loss was sustained in consequence of defendant's negligence.

Defendant urges that the record is silent as to what cause the defendant may have had for separating the cars, and, as there may have been a sufficient cause, that negligence is not proved by showing the mere separation of the cars. The cars were in good condition when started from Omaha. It was contemplated by the contract that the two cars should be kept together. If any fact existed which would justify defendant in separating the cars, we think it was its duty to notify the care taker. At any rate, we do not think plaintiff should be required to prove absence of any act that would be a justification. Such a rule would be harsh and unreasonable, and would practically result in a denial of justice.

The trial court instructed the jury in effect that if one suffers damage as the proximate result of the concurrent negligence of two other parties, and if the damage would not have occurred from the negligent act alone of either party, then both would be liable to the party injured. Defendant assails this instruction which submitted the question of concurrent liability, because no concurrent negligence of the defendant and the connecting carrier was pleaded. It is apparent from the pleadings and the evidence that the defendant attempted to shift the responsibility for the damage to the connecting carrier, and it was doubtless to meet this phase of the case that the instruction was given. We think it is immaterial that the plaintiff did not plead concurrent negligence on the part of the connecting carrier, nor is it necessary for us to determine whether the evidence disclosed any negligence upon the part of the connecting carrier. The instruction placed no greater burden upon the defendant than the law required. Under this evidence, the defendant could not be held liable unless it was negligent, and then only in the event that the loss would not have occurred except for the negligence of the defendant. The instruction, as an abstract proposition of law, appears to be sound, and we are unable to perceive wherein it was prejudicial to the defendant; and, in view of the defendant's attempt to shift the responsibility for the loss to the connecting carrier, we think the instruction was properly given.

Defendant has criticized the rulings of the trial court in the giving and the refusal of several other instructions, but the question of the correctness of these rulings is disposed of by the foregoing discussion, and it is not necessary to further refer to them.

We fail to discover any prejudicial error in the record, and therefore recommend that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Duffie and Epperson, CC., concur.

Per Curlam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES E. SEIFERT

v.

ROSE DILLON, alias Rose Kirkwood, Appt.

Bawdyhouse — injunction — defense.

1. The right of a landowner to restrain an adjoining property owner from using his property as a bawdyhouse, or house of ill fame, to which persons resort for the purposes of prostitution and lewdness, is a right belonging to the land; and the fact that defendant's premises were so used before plaintiff purchased his property constitutes no defense to an action to enjoin the same.

Same — adjoining property — laches.

2. The illegal use of property as a house of ill fame constitutes a continuing injury to a near-by property owner, which is unaffected by lapse of time.

Same — municipal tolerance — injunction.

3. The fact that municipal authorities tolerate the maintenance of a house of prostitution on defendant's property, and thereby violate the law themselves, constitutes no defense to a suit by a near-by property owner to enjoin such maintenance; special damages being shown.

Same — injunction — special injury.

4. Where a near-by property owner and those in his employ are compelled to witness indecent conduct of the inmates of a bawdyhouse, and to hear loud, boisterous, indecent, and annoying noises made by them and their dissolute companions, he thereby suffers a special injury, different from that suffered by the general public, and is therefore entitled to enjoin the same, notwithstanding the maintenance of such place is a public nuisance.

Reese, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted in the district court of Lancaster county by the plaintiff, who is a merchant, engaged in business at No. 133 South Ninth street, in the city of Lincoln, and against the defendant, the keeper of a house of ill fame at No. 124 on the same street, being diagonally across the street and nearly opposite plaintiff's place of business. From the pleadings and evidence it is shown that O street is one of the principal business streets of said city, and that the properties referred to are south of said street and within less than a block thereof, and within that part of said city used for general business purposes. The place of business of plaintiff is in a two-story brick building, both floors of which are used in the conduct of the business, which is a general store for the sale of harness, fur coats, work coats, mittens, gloves, and bicycle supplies. The value of his stock of goods is about $7,000. The building occupied by defendant is a two-story brick, and is confessedly used by her as a house of prostitution. It is alleged in the petition that defendant is using and intends to continue the use of said building as a bawdyhouse and house of prostitution, where are kept a large number of prostitutes under the control and charge of defendant, and as a resort of prostitutes and licentious men, and is resorted to at all times of the day and night by persons of that description, and is a disorderly house where fighting and brawls, drinking of intoxicating liquors, and disturbances of the peace continually occur; that from the doors and windows of said house passers-by are hailed by the prostitutes and invited to licentious commerce with them, and indecent exposures of their persons are made therefrom, and that the house as kept and used is a nuisance, and a detriment to plaintiff, his business, and his property; that plaintiff's property has been greatly depreciated in value, the rental value thereof greatly lessened; that he is deprived of the comfortable use and enjoyment of the property, and his business has been injured by the loss of customers, who are unwilling to visit his store on account of the disgraceful and indecent acts and conduct of defendant and those kept by her and who frequent her place. The prayer of the petition is for an injunction restraining defendant and those under her control or authority or procurement from using the property or any part thereof for the purposes of prostitution, or keeping or maintaining a disorderly or bawdy house upon her premises. The answer admits the location and use of the properties as alleged, and avers that both are situated "in the immorally submerged part of said city;" and that there are other houses of prostitution and a number of saloons in the immediate vicinity; that her house has long been kept and used for the purpose named; that plaintiff was reared from boyhood in the immediate neighborhood, and knowing the use to which defendant's property was devoted, had purchased the store and business. All averments of the petition charging offensive acts or boisterous noises as well as damages to plaintiff are denied, and she avers that she has at all times maintained a quiet and orderly house which has been closed to men of vicious, brutal, and degenerate character when known to her. A trial was had in the district court, which resulted in a finding in favor of plaintiff, and enjoining defendant and all others acting with her consent and authority from using said premises as a bawdyhouse or a house of prostitution and maintaining or operating the same for such purposes. Defendant has appealed.

There is not much question as to the facts in the case. The principal dispute thereon is as to whether the proof sustains the finding of the court as to a special injury to plaintiff as distinguished from the injury to the public generally, sufficient to justify the issuance of an injunction in favor of plaintiff personally. It is not deemed necessary here to set out the evidence in detail, except to say that enough is shown to support a finding that the averments of the petition are sustained by the proof that the maintenance of the house of defendant as a bawdyhouse has contributed to the depreciation of the value of plaintiff's property and the rental thereof, and has rendered his place of business an undesirable one, has prevented the extension of his local trade, and has been and is a source of annoyance to him, his clerks and customers; that men and women of vicious, lascivious, and drunken habits congregate at her house and along the street and sidewalk adjacent to plaintiff's property, and engage in brawls and fights to such an extent as to prevent respectable customers from frequenting his place of business. It may be said that it is true that these acts have been indulged in to a less extent in later years than formerly, yet enough is shown to justify the finding that they have been continued until recently before the beginning of the suit.

The principal contention is as to the law to be applied. It is a generally accepted rule of law that a private individual may not enjoin a nuisance of a public character unless he can show that he suffers damages or injury which is special to himself or his interests, that public nuisances are criminal in their nature, and can be suppressed by the enforcement of the criminal law applicable to such cases. It is conceded that the house of defendant is a bawdyhouse, and that she maintains it as one of that character, but it is insisted that she is subject only to the action of the state in the enforcement of the criminal law in the usual way. In support of this, a number of authorities are cited and which we do not deem it necessary to notice further, for the reason that, as a general rule, the position must be conceded. See 1 High, Inj. 4th ed. § 662. A bawdyhouse is a public nuisance. 1 Wood. Nuisances, 3d ed. § 29; Crim. Code, § 210.

In order to avoid the extension of this opinion to an unreasonable length, we will treat the assignments of defendant together. They are, not only that plaintiff has failed to show a sufficient personal interest to enable him to rightfully maintain the action, but that by his laches he has forfeited his right, if any ever existed, to seek the remedy of injunction in his own behalf. It is said in defendant's brief that "prescription will not run against a public nuisance so as to defeat the abatement of it by public authorities. But the appellant contends that prescription does run against the right of a private citizen to abate a public nuisance by injunction." Under certain conditions, this is probably true; but we hardly think such a rule could rightfully be invoked in a case of this kind. The case of Ingersoll v. Rousseau, 35 Wash. 92, 76 Pac. 513, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 35, was much 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) like the one now under consideration in its facts. The action was brought by a lot owner in the city of Everett against the owner of an adjoining lot to restrain him from maintaining a house of ill fame upon said adjoining lot. The issues were quite similar to those here presented. The court held that such illegal use of property could not be continued over the objection of the plaintiff in the case upon the ground that defendant's property was so used before the plaintiff purchased; that the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action was not affected by lapse of time; that the fact that the authorities of the municipality tolerated the maintenance of the house of prostitution (as shown in this case) was no defense; and that, where the adjoining proprietor was compelled to witness indecent conduct of the inmates of the bawdyhouse, and listen to the loud, boisterous, and unseemly noises made by them and their dissolute companions, he thereby suffered a special injury different from that of the general public, and was therefore entitled to enjoin the same, notwithstanding the maintenance of such a place was a public nuisance.

In Dempsey v. Darling, 39 Wash. 125, 81 Pac. 152, it was held that the owner of a vacant lot upon which he desired to construct a building to be used for a lawful purpose had the right to enjoin the owner of an adjoining lot from continuing a house of prostitution then in existence. See also Wilcox v. Henry, 35 Wash. 591, 77 Pac. 1055. Blagen v. Smith, 34 Or. 394, 44 L.R.A. 522, 56 Pac. 202, was where the defendant had remodeled certain buildings, and was about to rent them to be used for immoral purposes. In many other respects the questions involved were quite similar to those presented in this case. The supreme court of Oregon, in quite an elaborate opinion, held that a house of ill fame is a public nuisance, but that the plaintiff being the owner of adjacent property could enjoin its use or continuance. To the same effect are Weakley v. Page, 102 Tenn. 178, 46 L.R.A. 552, 53 S. W. 551; Marsan v. French, 61 Tex. 173, 48 Am. Rep. 272; Cranford v. Tyrrell, 128 N. Y. 341, 28 N. E. 514. The case of Ingersoll v. Rousseau, supra, is republished and annotated in 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 35. The heading of the note at page 38, in referring to the principal case, says: "This case is clearly within the rule that private citizens may maintain a suit to enjoin a nuisance where special injury is suffered. The particular nuisance which produces the injury is immaterial, provided it is of such character as to cause special damages to certain persons,"—citing a number of cases from England, Canada, the United States, and more than half of the state supreme courts. It seems that there can be no doubt as to the rule, or that plaintiff has brought himself within it by the pleadings and evidence.

We have not overlooked the cases cited by counsel for defendant, but cannot here review them. They generally state the correct rule, but are not decisive of the case in hand.

It follows that the decree of the District Court, making the injunction perpetual, must be, and is, affirmed.

Fawcett, J., not being present at the time of the argument, took no part in the decision.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

GILBERT C. HALSTED et al., Appts.,
v.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COMPANY,
NY, Resp't.

(193 N. Y. 293, 85 N. E. 1078.)

Telegram — negligence — change.

1. A mere change of the word "eighty" to "eighth" in the transmission of a telegram does not show gross negligence on the part of the telegraph company.

Same — contract — agency.

2. The sendee of a telegram is bound by the terms of the contract with the sender that the company will not be answerable for mistakes in transmission beyond the price charged for the service unless the message is repeated, where the message is sent in response to one from the sendee seeking information which makes the sender the sendee's agent to transmit it.

Same — insurance of correctness.

3. A telegraph company is not an insurer of the correctness of transmission of messages by it.

Same — contract exemption — negligence.

4. A clause in a telegraph blank relieving the company from liability for mistakes in transmission of messages unless they are repeated is sufficient to cover mistakes due to negligence, although the word "negligent" is not used in the stipulation.

(November 10, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing a judgment of a Trial Term for King's County in their favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to have been lost through defendant's negligent transmission of a telegram. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendant the damage occasioned to them by the alleged negligence of the latter in erroneously transmitting to them a telegraphic message. The plaintiffs, being manufacturers of beef bags, in the city of New York, received from Armour & Company, of Chicago, a letter asking the lowest "price on 25,000 sets of bags," and they replied that they would telegraph them a price at a later time. The plaintiffs then requested the Cannon Manufacturing Company, of Concord, North Carolina, as they allege, "to send them by wire the price for 200,000 yards each of the narrow and wide light beef-cotton goods." On July 27, 1903, they received through the defendant a telegram from Concord, addressed to them, which read: "Delivered commencing about August fifteenth light narrow two eighth wide three eighth net," and was signed "Cannon Mfg. Co." Thereupon, and on the same day, the plaintiffs telegraphed and wrote to Armour & Company a price, which was based on the quotations of the Cannon Manufacturing Company, as they were given in the telegram. Armour & Company the same day telegraphed, in reply, an order for the bags, and the order was entered by the plaintiffs. On July 28th plaintiffs ordered, by telegram, from the Cannon Manufacturing Company 175,000 yards of the narrow and 150,000 yards of the wide cloth, and at the same time wrote a letter to the company confirming the telegram. On July 29th plaintiffs received a letter from the Cannon Manufacturing Company, inclosing a copy of the telegram which it had delivered to the defendant, and it then appeared that the message should have read: "Deliveries commencing about August fifteenth light narrow two eighth wide three eighth net." The difference between the telegraphic message, as delivered to the defendant, at Concord, and as it was received by the plaintiffs at New York, was the word "deliveries" had become changed to "delivered" and that the two words "eighty" had become "eighth." It was shown that these quotations, which might not be very intelligible to the ordinary person, are well understood in the trade. The mistake made in the transmission of the quotations affected the contract made by the plaintiffs with the Armour company, and caused a loss to them in the transaction. The plaintiffs endeavored to procure a cancellation of the contract with the Armour company, by reason of the mistake in the telegram from the Cannon Manufacturing Company, upon which it had been based; but they were unsuccessful. The Cannon Manufacturing Company refused to assume the liability for the mistake. The damages demanded in the complaint were in the amount of the loss to the plaintiffs on the Armour contract. The telegram from the Cannon Manufacturing Company was written upon one of defendant's blank forms, which read: "Send the following message subject to the terms on back hereof, which are hereby agreed to." That was followed by the plaintiffs' address, the quotations of prices and the signature of the Cannon Manufacturing Company. Below were the words: "Read the notice and agreement on back." One of the terms of the agreement referred to reads as follows: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison. For this one half the regular rate is charged in addition. It is agreed between the sender of the following message and this company that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery, of any unrepeatable message, beyond the amount received for sending the same." There was also a stipulation limiting the liability of the telegraph company in the case of a repeated message, unless specially insured in accordance with a provision for such insurance.

The defense of the defendant, beyond a denial of the negligence alleged with respect to the transmission of the telegram from Concord, was based upon the terms of the contract between it and the sender of the message. There was no evidence of negligence in the transmission of the message other than in the changes made in the message between its delivery to the defendant and its receipt by the plaintiffs. There was evidence that atmospheric and electrical conditions and disturbances might affect the accurate transmission of a telegraph message, although the possibility of such changes being caused thereby in the symbols, or signals, as were effected in this case, was somewhat in dispute upon the evidence of the experts.

Motions of the defendant to dismiss the action, at the close of the plaintiff's case and at the close of the whole case, were denied, and the trial court submitted to the jury the question whether the defendant was guilty of gross negligence in the performance of its undertaking. The court, upon a request of the defendant further to instruct the jury that "the terms and conditions on the blank . . . are reasonable and valid and constitute a contract between the parties," ruled that they were reasonable and valid, and constituted a contract between the company and the sender, "but not with the plaintiffs." To which ruling the defendant excepted. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. Upon appeal to the appellate division, that court, by a divided vote of the justices, upon questions of law only, reversed the judgment which the plaintiffs had recovered, and granted a new trial. The plaintiffs have appealed to this court from the order of reversal.

Messrs. Beattys & Lamb, for appellants:

The telegraph company owed plaintiff, as addressee, a duty imposed by law, arising out of the exercise of a public franchise; and the terms of the contract did not relieve the company from liability for failure properly to perform such duty to the addressee.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the plaintiffs' claim that the defendant is liable to them, as the addressees of the telegraphic message, for the failure to properly perform its duty, from which liability it was not relieved by the terms of its contract with the sender of the message. The argument is made that the defendant, as a public service corporation, "owes a duty to the public, for the breach of which a party injured has a right of action, which is unaffected by any contract of limitation to which the injured person is not a party," notwithstanding the duty was undertaken by reason of such contract. So far as the plaintiffs' claim was predicated upon the alleged gross negligence of the defendant in the performance of the undertaking to transmit to them the telegraphic message from the sender in North Carolina, it is sufficient to say that the evidence wholly failed to make out any case for the jury on that theory. It showed simply the commission of an error, which, so far as material in its consequences, occurred in the change of the word "eighty" to "eighth." The letter "y" was changed to the letter "h" in two instances. Whether such changes were the inadvertent, or mistaken, act of the receiving operator, or of any operator at the relay station, or whether they were the result of atmospheric disturbances, or of perturbations of the electric fluid, to which concededly the transmission of telegraphic messages is more or less subject, is not material. The nature of the undertaking by a telegraph company suggests the possibility, if not the probability, of peculiar risks affecting it, whether in the one or the other way. However occurring, if by no wilful misconduct, a mere mistake or error in the transmission of a message would not warrant a jury in finding that there had been more than ordinary negligence. See Breese v. United States Teleg. Co. 48 N. Y. 132, 8 Am. Rep. 526; Primrose v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 883, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1098. The hazards attending upon the accurate performance by telegraph corporations of their function of transmitting messages are obvious, and the prudential character of such regulations as this defendant had adopted in order to guard against inaccuracy in transmission and to prevent mistakes from any cause is evident. The importance of accuracy to the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

parties cannot always be apparent to the operator, but it is to the sender. Where the wording of a message is such as to be obscure in its meaning, or unintelligible to the ordinary reader, mistakes are reasonably possible in the transcribing. In any case the regulations of the telegraph company afford the means of making accuracy reasonably certain, or of effecting insurance against mistakes.

The question in this case must be: What legal relation did the defendant sustain to the plaintiffs? or What was the measure of the duty owing by the defendant and of its responsibility for a failure in performance? Was the duty an absolute one, as claimed by the appellants, or was the undertaking one within the terms of the contract with the sender? In my opinion the contract was binding upon the appellants, and relieved the defendant of any liability beyond that stipulated for.

In the appellate division [120 App. Div. 434, 104 N. Y. Supp. 1019] it was held by a majority of the learned justices, in effect, that the defendant had the right to make the regulations which prescribed its liability in accepting messages for transmission, and that "whether the action is deemed to rest upon the contract of the sender, or to result from a breach of duty, the limitation upon the amount of damages to be recovered being reasonable, the plaintiff has no standing to maintain this action unless he is the real principal in the transaction, and then only to the extent of the amount paid for the transmission of the message." The dissenting justices took the view that, as the contract of the defendant with respect to its liability was only with the sender of the message, the plaintiffs, as the receivers, were not bound by it, and that their action rested on a negligent breach of the duty owing by the defendant to deliver the message as received. It was said that, "telegraph companies being under a public duty . . . to receivers of messages, senders of messages cannot, by contract, lessen or do away with that duty. They may only do so in respect of the duty due to themselves."

For the decision of this case it is unnecessary that the court should go as far as did the appellate division in the prevailing opinion in defining the general responsibility of the defendant towards the addressee of a message. It was alleged in this complaint that the "plaintiffs requested the Cannon Manufacturing Company . . . to send them by wire the prices" for the goods, and such was shown to be the fact by the evidence of the plaintiffs. The Cannon Manufacturing Company, therefore, in transmitting the information requested by means of the telegraph, was made the agent of the plaintiffs for that purpose. The plaintiffs, not desiring to await a communication from the Cannon company in the ordinary way of a letter, availed themselves of the latter's services, and authorized them to employ the telegraph system for sending a reply. In doing so the sender was either the plaintiffs' agent in making the contract with the defendant, or it made the contract for their benefit. While, in either view, the result would be the same, in so far that the plaintiffs would come under the obligation of the contract with the defendant, it is probably the more correct view that the Cannon Manufacturing Company acted as the agent of the plaintiffs in contracting for the conveyance of its message by a telegraph line. If that be true, the plaintiffs must be concluded by the act of their agent. The Cannon Manufacturing Company had a reasonable latitude of action in entering into such a contract, and that the terms of the contract, as made, were reasonable, must be regarded as settled upon authority.

The defendant, while it may be likened to a common carrier in its occupation of conveying messages from and to all persons, unlike a common carrier of goods, does not become an insurer in their transmission. Its duties are performed in a different way. The reasons for making common carriers of goods insurers of their value do not apply in the case of telegraph systems; for there is no custody of goods, and the conveyance of messages is subject to the contingencies of extraneous disturbances beyond the control of the telegraph owner, or to the fallibility of operators in transcribing by signals, or symbols, or in comprehending the message itself as written. By reason of the franchises and powers accorded to it, a telegraph corporation performs public functions, and it comes under that general obligation, to which all quasi public corporations are subject, to conduct its corporate business, and to discharge the duties incident thereto, with reasonable diligence and with a due care for the rights and interest of those concerned in the corporate operations. But, however strictly held to this general obligation, it is competent for it to make such rules and to prescribe such regulations for the conduct of its business as are reasonable. It is entitled to protect itself against the incidental hazards of operation, and, by contract, to limit its liability for mistakes, or delays, or nondelivery, caused by the negligence of its servants, if not gross. Breese v. United States Teleg. Co. supra; Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 65 N. Y. 163; Kiley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. Y. 231, 16 N. E. 75; Pearsall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. Y. 256-267, 21 Am. St. Rep. 662, 26 N. E. 534; Primrose v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 U. S. 1-15, 38 L. ed. 883-889, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1098. In each of the above-cited cases the contract with the telegraph company was upon printed blanks, similar to the one which the sender of the message in question made use of. In the Pearsall Case, supra, the question passed upon was whether the sender of a message was chargeable with constructive notice of resolutions of the defendant, limiting its liability for an unrepeatable message. While holding that mere notice was ineffectual to limit the liability for a failure to accurately transmit,—and upon that there was a sharp division in the court,—the right of a telegraph company to contract for such limitation was considered to be settled. The stipulations upon these blanks have invariably been held in this state to be reasonable, as they have been by the United States Supreme Court and in many of the states. The decision in the case of Ellis v. American Teleg. Co. 13 Allen, 226, largely quoted from in the prevailing opinion below, turned upon the general right of the receiver of a telegraphic message to hold a telegraph company responsible for the damage resulting from material errors occurring in the transmission of the message. In that case, as in this, there was an error in the quotation of a price. The Massachusetts supreme court held that the liability of the telegraph company to the receiver of the message was generally limited by the contract upon the blank to the amount received by the company from the sender, where the message had not been repeated. It was held there, in effect, that the regulation adopted by the telegraph company for the repetition of a message, in order to guard against mistakes, was a most reasonable requisition, and that, notwithstanding the receiver had entered into no express contract with the company, and could not be held to have made any express stipulations with it, he could not claim any higher or different degree of diligence than was stipulated for between the sender of the message and the telegraph company. This case was cited with approval, as to the general rule, in Pearsall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. Y. 270, 21 Am. St. Rep. 662, 26 N. E. 537. If it were necessary in this case to determine the measure of liability of the defendant, generally, to the receiver of a message for the loss occasioned by some mistake or error in its transmission, my personal judgment would incline me to agree with the view of the Massachusetts court. The English courts have refused to recognize a right of action in the addressee of a telegraphic message for a failure to accurately transmit it, for want of any privity of contract (Dickson v. Reuter's Teleg. Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 62); and, while that right is accorded here for negligence in performing a duty, I fail to perceive any sufficient reason why, in a case of a failure not due to gross negligence, the telegraph company should be held to a higher degree of diligence and care than was stipulated for with the sender. But the facts of this case do not make it necessary to go so far, and our decision is limited to those facts. It is our judgment that, where the receiver of a message has, by a special request, procured it to be sent by the telegraph, he becomes bound by any reasonable contract made by the sender with the telegraph company for its transmission, and is limited in his claim for any damages for a loss occasioned by error or mistake in transmission, where the stipulations for the repetition or for the insurance of the message have not been availed of, to the amount stipulated in the contract.

In the two cases in this court to which our attention is directed by the appellants nothing in their decision authorizes, or even points to, a different view of the question. In the case of Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140, the action was brought by the receiver of the message and the defendant was shown to have been guilty of gross negligence. There was no error nor mistake in the message transmitted; but the fault of the telegraph company was in delivering a message purporting to be from the cashier of a bank, when it was known by the operator that that officer had not signed the telegraphic message. The telegram directed the payment of money to a person named, and, when first transmitted, the message was signed simply in the name of the bank. The plaintiffs, to whom the message was addressed, called the attention of the telegraph company to the fact that the name of the officer of the bank was wanting. It was sent back for repetition, and, as repeated, bore the name of the cashier. It was shown that the operator knew that both messages were written by a person who was not the cashier of the bank and who was known by the same name as that of the person to whom the telegram authorized the payment of the money. In the case of Lowery v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 60 N. Y. 198, 19 Am. Rep. 154, the plaintiff was the receiver of a message and sued the defendant for a loss occasioned by reason of a change in the figures of a sum of money which the sender asked of him. Upon receiving a larger sum from the plaintiff, the sender of the telegram misappropriated it and absconded. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for his loss, which, eventually, was reversed in this court, upon the ground that the defendant's negligence was not the natural and proximate cause of the loss sustained by the plaintiff, as the embezzlement did not naturally result from the wrong of the defendant. The terms of the sending do not appear in the report of the case, and no reference is made to the subject. The appellants' reference to the printed record shows a contract governed by the law of Illinois, according to the determination made below, which differed from the law in this state. The case is of no authority upon the determination of the question in this case.

The contention of the appellants that the printed blank was insufficient to limit the defendant's liability for negligence is quite untenable. It was not necessary that the word "negligence" should be used in the stipulations of the contract. It was a sufficient protection to the defendant that the contract required a repetition of the message, or an insurance, in order to make the defendant liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery, beyond the amount received for sending the same. Such mistakes or delays, whether caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants, if not gross, as by wilful misconduct, or by causes beyond its control, were covered sufficiently by the clause of the contract.

I think that the plaintiffs failed to make any case against the defendant for the recovery of the damage claimed to have resulted to them by reason of the error or mistake in the message as transmitted, and the trial court was in error in submitting the case to the jury upon the theory that the stipulations on the printed blank upon which the message was sent were not binding upon the plaintiffs. For the reasons given, I advise the affirmance of the order of reversal and that judgment absolute should be rendered against the appellants, pursuant to the stipulation in their notice of appeal, with costs to the respondent in all the courts.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

D. D. WAGNER

v.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(147 N. C. 315, 61 S. E. 171.)

Carrier — passenger on platform — negligence.

1. A passenger on a mixed train is negligent, as matter of law, in riding upon the platform when there is plenty of room in the car, merely because the weather is warm and he prefers to ride there.

Same — failure to warn passengers — proximate cause.

2. The failure of the conductor of a train to notify passengers inside the car that the train had not reached the station when it stopped, notwithstanding the announcement of the porter that the stop would be at the station, was not the proximate cause of injury to a passenger who, without necessity, voluntarily rode on the platform and attempted to alight to his injury when the train stopped, where he could not have heard the notice had it been given within the car, and the trainmen did not know that he intended to alight at that stop.

Trial — instruction — findings.

3. An instruction by the court to the jury, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries which involves a direction to find the issue that plaintiff was injured by defendant's negligence, for plaintiff upon the finding of certain facts, should require a finding on the matters of negligence with which defendant is charged.

Same — curing error.

4. Error in an instruction on a vital issue in a case is not cured by another instruction which correctly states the law which should be applied to that issue, but which is, in fact, applied to another contention in the case.

Same — negligence — question for jury.

5. If, upon plaintiff's evidence in an action to hold another liable for a personal injury, he shows negligence on his part as matter of law, the question of his negligence should not be submitted to the jury.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Edgecombe County in plaintiff's favor in an action

Note. — An extensive search has failed to disclose any other case discussing the effect of riding on the platform of a car upon a passenger's right to complain of the failure to announce that the train had not yet reached the alighting point at a station which had already been called.

brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

Action for personal injury sustained by the alleged negligence of defendant. The testimony tends to show that the defendant corporation owns and operates as a part of its system a railroad from Plymouth to Tarboro, North Carolina, for the transportation of freight and passengers; that, as said railroad approaches Tarboro from the east, it crosses a bridge over the Tar river and the low grounds thereof. Plaintiff's witness Harris, who took measurements of the bridge, etc., says: "From stop post to beginning of trestle is 12 feet; from beginning of trestle to the bridge, 599 feet; width of the bridge, 9 feet 8 inches from guard rail to guard rail. Car steps would be over the guard rail. About a couple of inches of the guard rail would be showing. River bridge is 289 feet 7 inches; from end of bridge to crossing at Water street, to center of street, 227 feet. From bridge to water, 35 feet 2 inches,—it was low water. Total length from stop post to bank, 889 feet 3 inches; average height of trestle, 26 feet. From the embankment to the river there is swamp and undergrowth; trees on west side; no trees on east side. When the road crosses Water street the train stops to receive and put off passengers. It is called "Lower Tarboro." On the 2d day of June, 1905, plaintiff boarded the local freight train at a station 8 miles east of Tarboro, between 7 and 8 o'clock at night, as a passenger for Tarboro. The train, with combination car and freight cars, was about 200 yards long. He took a seat on the platform of the car. "One foot was on the lower step, and one leg straight out." The night was very dark. Plaintiff was in the habit of riding on this train "two to four trips a week;" was working at stations below Tarboro. He says: "The train blew for the crossing, then stopped for bridge, and just before getting to bridge the porter called out: 'Next stop Lower Tarboro.' As the train pulled up again I was sitting on platform. Train stopped again after pulling maybe 250 or 300 yards. I had gotten up when train stopped. When it stopped I got up and stepped off. Porter was in door by me when he called out: 'Next stop Lower Tarboro.' He then went back in baggage car." When it stopped, "I stood there a second or two. I thought I would go to upper depot, but thought of my wheel which I had left down town, and got off to get it." The train always stopped for the drawbridge. It then pulled up and stopped again at Lower Tarboro. "I never knew it to stop at this place before. . . . Conductor gave no notice that the train had not reached Lower Tarboro. It looked so to me. The light in the car was dim and blinded me. I carefully looked before stepping." He says: "I did not see anything there. I got off in the swamp. There were about six passengers on the car. It was warm, and I preferred riding on the platform." Plaintiff says that it was his custom to ride on the platform. No one spoke to him about it. Conductor knew he was on the train. The flagman and porter knew he was on the platform. He did not see any notice posted in car. He was seriously injured. Plaintiff introduced several witnesses whose testimony tended to corroborate him. Mr. Stewart, a witness for plaintiff, says: "There were plenty of seats. There was light in the car, and the door was open. I don't think there was anything to prevent a man on the platform seeing between the cross-ties. On the steps near the end of the cross-ties a man could look down and see anything below. There was no light on the platform until conductor went out." Plaintiff says that he did not see conductor after he got on at Conetoe. Mr. Jenkins, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he had traveled on the car and with the door open and a light in the car. He thought a man could see that there was nothing between the cross-ties. Sam Taylor testified to same effect. Mr. Hill, the conductor for defendant, testified: "We stopped at the stop post, at the drawbridge, and pulled up again, and waited for an extra we were to meet there. Everything was quiet. I told the passengers to keep their seats. We had been there five or ten minutes when I heard a lumbering. A man was sitting behind me; and about that time someone said that somebody had fallen off the train, and it turned out to be Wagner. We had a plenty of seats. I did not hear anyone call out: 'The next stop Lower Tarboro.' I had no porter." The flagman corroborated the conductor. Mr. Braswell, a passenger on the train, testified for defendant: That he saw plaintiff sitting on platform before reaching the trestle, and told him he had better go in, he would fall off, and plaintiff said he was where he generally rode. When the train stopped he heard the conductor say: "Keep your seats. You are not at Lower Tarboro yet." That no passengers came out on platform when the train stopped. This witness said that plaintiff fell off. "He was not in a position to step off." The conductor testified that there were three signs in the car—one on each side and one on the end—which read: 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Passengers are warned not to put their heads or arms out of the window or use the platform except on entering or leaving the car." He further said: "I do not know how it read, but it was a warning to passengers not to use the platform or stand on it." W. I. Walker and L. A. Hinson, for defendant, testified to the same effect. The foregoing sets forth substantially the facts upon which the rights and liabilities of the parties depend. The defendant, at appropriate stages of the trial, moved for judgment of nonsuit, and duly excepted to the refusal of the court to grant the motions. The issues submitted to the jury presented the inquiry as to whether the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of defendant, as alleged, and whether plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to the injury. There was a verdict for plaintiff, with an assessment of damages. Judgment and appeal. The defendant's exceptions are set forth in the opinion.

Mr. John L. Bridgers, for appellant:

The passenger, in riding upon the platform, was guilty of negligence as matter of law.

Mr. F. S. Spruill also for appellant.

Messrs. Gilliam & Gilliam for appellee.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Eliminating all immaterial and corroborative testimony, there is but little controversy respecting the facts. Plaintiff got upon defendant's train at a station 8 miles east of Tarboro, between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening of June 2, 1905, and took his seat on the platform of the combination car, "with one foot on the bottom step, and the other leg straight out." There were plenty of seats inside the car, and plaintiff sat on the platform because it was warm and he preferred riding there. There is no evidence that the conductor knew he was on the platform, although plaintiff says that "he knew I was on the train." The porter knew that plaintiff was on the platform. Plaintiff made "two to four trips every week. He was working at Parmelee, Bethel, and Conetoe," towns below Tarboro. As the train reached the stop post, at the approach to the trestle and bridge over the low grounds and the river, it stopped. As it moved forward the porter called out, "Next stop Lower Tarboro," and passed into the baggage car. By reason of an excursion train on the other or Tarboro side of the river going into a siding, the train, being an accommodation freight, "about 150 or 200 yards long," stopped on the trestle side about 250 or 300 yards from the stop or the post. The entire length of the trestle and bridge is 889 feet. From stop post to bridge is 611 feet. Before reaching the river the trestle is about 16 feet high. The conductor and other passengers were inside the car and remained therein. Up to this point the only matter in regard to which there is any controversy is the call by the porter: "Next stop Lower Tarboro." We assume, for the purpose of this decision, that plaintiff's version is correct. The conductor, who was inside the car with the other passengers, swears that when the second stop was made he said: "Keep your seats. We are not at Lower Tarboro yet." One passenger in the car corroborates the conductor. Two others say they did not hear him say anything. One of the latter says that he did not hear either call.

The defendant's witnesses testify that notices warning passengers from riding on the platform were posted inside the car. Plaintiff says that he never saw them; that it was his custom to ride on the platform. He also says that his residence was "near upper depot, about 300 yards to the west." He was uncertain whether to get off at Lower Tarboro, but decided to do so because he had left his wheel there. There is no evidence that he had a ticket, or that the conductor or porter had any notice that he would get off at Lower Tarboro, or that any other passenger wished to do so. The night was dark. Plaintiff says that he stood up, looked carefully, thought he was at Lower Tarboro, that it was very dark, could not see that the train was on the trestle, and stepped off, falling to the ground, and sustaining serious injury. Stewart, plaintiff's witness, says: "About the time the train stopped the second time I heard somebody say, 'Hello,' and I heard a noise of something hitting the ground, and we all knew someone had fallen off, and somebody said it was Mr. Wagner, the contractor from Tarboro." His son, J. W. Stewart, testified to same. Hinson and Braswell, for defendant, say that plaintiff fell off. Mr. Stewart and other witnesses for plaintiff testified to effect of light from car upon the cross-ties. It is undoubtedly true, as contended by plaintiff, that "the announcement by the conductor or brakeman of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

station the train is approaching is the customary warning to passengers that the train is nearing the station, in order that they may get ready to alight. When a station is called, the passengers have a right to infer that the first stop of the train will be at such station; and when the train is stopped, it is an invitation to the passengers to alight." Moore, Carriers, chap. 20, § 34; Elliott, Railroads, § 1628, and many other authorities cited in plaintiff's brief. It will be observed, however, in the cases cited, the passenger was inside the car at the time the announcement was made, and, in consequence of it, went upon the platform to alight. This case is complicated by the fact, conceded by plaintiff, that he was voluntarily riding on the platform, there being "plenty of seats" on the inside of the car. It is not alleged, nor is there any suggestion, that it was negligent on the part of defendant to stop the train on the trestle. This was evidently necessary to permit another train to clear the track by going into a siding. The alleged, and the only possible, negligence was in the failure of the conductor, if there was such failure, or some other employee, to notify plaintiff that the train had not reached "Lower Tarboro." It was their duty to give such notice to passengers who were inside the cars. It may, under some circumstances, have been the duty to give such notice to persons standing or riding on the platform. If, for instance, the conductor or the porter knew that plaintiff, although negligently riding on the platform, intended alighting at Lower Tarboro, it would have been their duty to notify him. We find no evidence that either of them had such knowledge, or that the plaintiff himself had determined to stop there when he got on the train. He says that when the train stopped he stood a second or two. He thought he would go to the upper depot, but thought of his wheel, which he had left down town, and got off to get it. He lived near the upper depot. It does not appear that it was his habit to stop at the lower depot. We find nothing in the evidence imposing upon the conductor or porter any other duty to plaintiff than that which they owed to passengers inside the car.

Omitting, for the present, any reference to the alleged notices in the car, we proceed to consider the rights and duties of the parties in the light of the admitted facts. In Goodwin v. Boston & M. R. Co. 84 Me. 203, 24 Atl. 816, it was shown that plaintiff's intestate got upon the platform of the defendant's car. The conductor took his ticket, and made no objection to his riding there. The car was crowded, although there was ample standing room inside. The weather was warm. In going around a curve he was thrown from the platform and killed. In an action for damages, Emery, J., says: "The danger of standing on the narrow platform of a passenger car while the car is moving with the usual speed of railroad trains is most conspicuous. No prudent man, no man ordinarily mindful of his conduct and of matters about him, would occupy such a position." Referring to the reasons suggested for riding on the platform, the judge says: "All these circumstances may have made it more agreeable to ride on the platform in the open air than to stand inside the hot, crowded car, but they did not in the least lessen the danger, nor the appearance of danger, in so doing. That Goodwin was not ordered off the platform could not have led him to believe it was safe to ride there. He needed no warning of such a danger. He knew the place for passengers was inside the car. . . . Within the car, with all its discomforts, was safety. Without the car was obvious peril." In Fletcher v. Boston & M. R. Co. 187 Mass. 463, 105 Am. St. Rep. 414, 73 N. E. 552, it appeared that plaintiff was in the car. He left his seat some time before reaching his destination, went into the baggage compartment, and engaged in conversation with a baggage master who, when the train approached it for the purpose of stopping, called the station at which the plaintiff was to alight. After this, as the train was moving slowly, the plaintiff left the car and stood on the first of four steps that led from the platform of that end, and, while in this position, the steps came into collision with a truck, and he was injured. The court said: "Plainly, if he had remained in the car until the train stopped, this damage would have been avoided; but he voluntarily left a place provided for him as a passenger, and where he would have been safe, and exposed himself to the chance of injury, which common experience has shown is incident to standing upon the platform of a moving railroad car." In Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 135, 93 Am. Dec. 495, Grover, J., said: "The negligence alleged against the plaintiff was that at the time of receiving the injury he was standing on the steps of the front platform of the car; it appearing that he would have escaped the injury had he been either inside of the car or upon the platform. In the absence of any explanation I should have no hesitation in saying that this position of the plaintiff at the time of the injury proved that he was negligent." In that case the evidence showed that the car was crowded. The question of negligence, under the circumstances, was left to the jury. In the note to this case it is said: "Where a person is injured while riding in a dangerous position upon a railroad car, he is prima facie guilty of negligence which will bar recovery, and the burden is on him to show the injury was not the result of his negligence." 1 Fetter, Carr. Pass. § 167, says: "By the weight of authority, it is negligence, as matter of law, for a passenger to be upon the platform of a rapidly moving train, unless he is compelled to assume such position as the best he could do at the time, acting as a careful and prudent man." Elliott, Railroads, 1630. We are of the opinion that, taking plaintiff's testimony to be true, he was negligent, as a matter of law, in riding upon the platform in the manner described by himself.

The question, therefore, involved in the first issue, assuming that the porter called the station, and that the conductor failed to notify the passengers inside the car that the train had not reached "Lower Tarboro" when it stopped on the trestle, was such failure the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury? In other words, if the jury should find that, if the conductor had made the announcement sufficiently loud to be heard by those inside the car, the plaintiff, being on the platform, could not have heard it, was such failure the proximate cause of the injury? While it is true that the authorities cited and many others examined by us relate to injuries sustained by persons thrown from the platform while the car is in motion, we can perceive no difference in principle in a case wherein the plaintiff, by voluntarily riding on the platform, alights from a train at a time and place which, if he had been inside the car, he would not have done. In both cases he is guilty of negligence, and, if but for such negligence he would not have sustained the injury, he cannot recover. The pivotal question, therefore, upon the first issue is, Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant? This involves two propositions,—that defendant was guilty of a breach of duty to plaintiff, and that, by reason thereof, he was injured. As we have seen, the duty which defendant owed plaintiff was to give notice inside the car that, notwithstanding the announcement of the porter, the train had not reached Lower Tarboro. If the jury found that the notice was given, they should have answered the issue "No." If they found, as we presume they did, that such notice was not given, the question was presented whether the failure to give it was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury; that is, had he placed himself in such a position that he could not have heard it if given sufficiently loud to be heard by those inside the car? This was a question for the jury. It was involved in against one who wrongfully enters upon the property and attempts to seduce his wife.

Damages — trespass — attempted seduction.

2. That one who wrongfully enters upon property occupied by another as a residence attempts to seduce his wife may be considered in aggravation of damages for trespass, notwithstanding statutes enlarging the rights of married women and permitting them to sue alone for injuries to their persons.

(September 30, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vance County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for trespass. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J:

The plaintiff filed his complaint in the following words, to wit: "(1) That, on or about the 25th day of April, 1907, the defendant, near the village of Dabney, at and in the county of Vance and state of North Carolina, and near the public road leading from Dabney to Dexter, did unlawfully and forcibly, wickedly, and maliciously enter upon a certain lot or parcel of land, then in the possession and occupancy as a residence of plaintiff, with the unlawful, malicious, lascivious, and wicked intent and purpose to seduce, debauch, and carnally know one Lovetta Brame, the wife of plaintiff, and did then and there wickedly, maliciously, unlawfully, wrongfully, and willfully insult and attempt to seduce and carnally know the said Lovetta Brame, plaintiff's said wife, to plaintiff's great damage, $2,000." Defendant demurred, for that: "(1) No special damage or injury or actionable wrong to plaintiff is alleged; the wife not being a party, and the complaint not showing that plaintiff had suffered any special damages or any damage. (2) The complaint does not set forth any facts sufficiently definite and specific to constitute a cause of action, in not setting out the acts and things complained of in such manner as that it may be seen that, if true, they constitute an actionable wrong. (3) An attempt to seduce is not actionable; no seduction or injury being alleged." His Honor overruled the demurrer, and allowed defendant sixty days to answer. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Mr. T. T. Hicks, for appellant:

The husband alleged no special damage, and cannot recover.

Harper v. Pinkston, 112 N. C. 296, 17 S. E. 161; Shuler v. Millsaps, 71 N. C. 297; Case Note. — Personal wrong as aggravation of damages for trespass on realty.

There appear to be no other reported cases, aside from Brame v. Clark, in which plaintiff, suing for a trespass on realty, sought to aggravate the damages by showing that defendant attempted to seduce plaintiff's wife or other member of his family.

But in Hatchell v. Kimbrough, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 163, the court said, obiter, that, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit "the plaintiff may, in aggravation, show that the defendant debauched his daughter."

In Ellsworth v. Potter, 41 Vt. 685, where it was shown that stones and eggs were thrown through the windows into the house occupied by plaintiff, it was held that the jury were properly instructed that, in estimating the damages, they were not limited to the injury to the realty, but might also take into consideration the character of the trespass and its indignity.

In Perkins v. Towle, 43 N. H. 220, 80 Am. Dec. 149, a new trial was granted because the jury brought in a verdict for actual damages only, although it appeared that the defendants swore at the plaintiff and one of them struck him. The court said that "exemplary damages may be recovered in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, as well as in any other action, where there are such circumstances of aggravation, of insult, and of malice as would warrant such recovery."

In Weyer v. Wegner, 58 Tex. 539, it was held not error to admit in evidence insulting language used by, and acts of, the defendants while on the premises indicative of a belief that the owner of the premises was attempting to conceal property acquired in violation of the criminal law of the state; and in such case it was proper to instruct the jury that, if they believed that the defendants entered upon the plaintiff's premises in an oppressive and insulting manner, the jury would be authorized, in addition to nominal damages, to assess such exemplary damages as they might think right and just.

In Druse v. Wheeler, 22 Mich. 439, it was held proper to show, as an act of aggravation to enhance the damages, the malicious arrest of the owner of the realty in order to keep him out of the way during a trespass on his lands, such matter having been alleged in the declaration.

In Trauerman v. Lippincott, 39 Mo. App. 478, evidence was admitted showing that defendant's servant, while committing the trespass, pushed plaintiff out of the way. It was held proper to instruct the jury to allow plaintiff such sum as would fully compensate him for the mental anguish, humiliation, and mortification suffered by him by reason of any intentional striking or shoving of plaintiff, and that, if the acts were done maliciously, the jury might award punitive damages.

In Sheldon v. Baumann, 19 App. Div. 61, 45 N. Y. Supp. 1016, it was held that plaintiff, for the purpose of aggravating the dam-

Strother v. Aberdeen & A. R. Co. 123 N. C. 197, 31 S. E. 386; Kimberly v. Howland. 143 N. C. 405, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 545, 55 S. E. 778.

Messrs. A. C. Zollicoffer and Thomas M. Pittman, for appellee:

Every unauthorized entry upon, or direct interference with, another's land, is a trespass, for which an action lies without proof of actual damage.

Moak's Underhill, Torts, rule 38, *159; Mosseller v. Deaver, 106 N. C. 494, 8 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 540, 11 S. E. 529; Webber v. Barry, 66 Mich. 127, 11 Am. St. Rep. 471, 33 N. W. 289; Schouler, Dom. Rel. §§ 57, 108; Barbee v. Armstead, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 530, 51 Am. Dec. 404.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There can be no doubt that the plaintiff has alleged an actionable wrong,—a trespass upon his possession of real estate. It is elementary that "every unauthorized, and therefore unlawful, entry into the close of another is a trespass. From every such entry, against the will of the possessor, the law infers some damage; if nothing more, the treading down the grass or the herbage." Ruffin, Ch. J., in Dougherty v. Stepp, 18 N.

ages in an action for trespass on real property, should have been allowed to prove his allegation that defendant's entry upon the premises and the taking of certain personal property were against the protest of plaintiff's wife and daughter, who were present, and who were violently pushed aside by defendant's agents who committed the trespass.

In Craig v. Cook, 28 Minn. 232, 9 N. W. 712, it appeared that plaintiff was in the exclusive possession of the property under a lease from the defendant; that, during a temporary absence of plaintiff, defendant put the personal property of plaintiff out of the house and forcibly resisted his return into the house, committing an assault and battery upon him. The court said: "For a trespass wantonly committed upon real property, aggravated by an eviction of the possessor, by one knowing he had no right to do the acts complained of, exemplary damages may be awarded by a jury." It was contended that the causes of action for a trespass upon real property and for assault upon the person were improperly joined, but it was held that the case was within the statute authorizing the joining of causes of action for "injuries, with or without force, to persons and property, or either."

In Lawrence v. Phelps, 2 Root. 334, plaintiff alleged that defendant broke the doors and windows of plaintiff's house, and hit and wounded his wife. The court sustained defendant's objection to the introduction of any evidence as to the injury done plaintiff's 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 371. His Honor's judgment was clearly correct. Both parties, however, discussed, although from different points of view, the question of damages which, upon the admissions made by the demurrer, plaintiff was entitled to recover. The defendant argued the case upon the theory that two causes of action are stated,—one for trespass on realty; the other for injury, etc., inflicted upon the wife. His learned counsel strongly contends that the conduct of the defendant was not an actionable wrong to the plaintiff. However this may be, and without intimating any opinion upon it, we do not so construe the complaint. The plaintiff alleges a malicious, unlawful, and forcible trespass, setting out that it was made with the malicious intent to and did in truth then and there wilfully, wickedly, maliciously, etc., insult and attempt to seduce and carnally know plaintiff's wife. This matter is stated as the foundation for a claim of actual and vindictive damages; the cause of action being the trespass. We are asked to pass upon the question whether, in the assessment of damages, these matters may be considered by the jury in aggravation.

In Duncan v. Stalcup, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 440, Daniel, J., says: "In looking wife, on the ground that she might have a separate action with her husband for the assault and battery.

In Sampson v. Coy, 15 Mass. 493, it was held that plaintiff in an action of trespass could not give evidence of an assault upon his person by the defendant when forcibly entering the dwelling house, where such matter was not specially averred.

In Fisher v. Conway, 21 Kan. 18, 30 Am. Rep. 419, where the petition in no manner counted on personal injuries, it was held that, while all the circumstances of the trespass to the realty, and whatever was done in its actual accomplishment, might properly be narrated before the jury as a part of res gestæ, although it involved the commission of an assault and battery, yet, the assault and battery being the subject of an independent action, the extent of the injuries should not have been gone into, and the court should have instructed the jury that no claim was made on account of personal injuries.

In Lawandoski v. Wilkes-Barre & H. R. Co. 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 10, it was held that, where plaintiff claimed only compensatory damages, and tried his case on that theory, it was error to instruct the jury that they would be justified in adding punitive to the compensatory damages, although it appeared that defendant had a personal altercation with plaintiff as to his right to enter upon the land, after which flurry of passion there was nothing to indicate wantonness, evil intent, or wrong motive.

into the books we find the rule in this action to be that the jury are not restricted in their assessment of damages to the amount of the mere pecuniary loss sustained by the plaintiff, but may award damages in respect of the malicious conduct of the defendant, and the degree of insult with which the trespass was committed. The plaintiff is at liberty to give in evidence the circumstances which accompany and give character to the trespass." In this case vindictive damages were awarded. In Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 363, 14 L. ed. 181, Grier, J., said: "In actions of trespass, where the injury has been wanton and malicious, or gross and outrageous, courts permit juries to add to the measured compensation of the plaintiff, which he would have been entitled to recover, had the injury been inflicted without design or intention, something farther by way of punishment or example, which has sometimes been called 'smart money.'" This was an action quare clausum fregit. In Mitchell v. Billingsley, 17 Ala. 391, it was shown that defendants, in the commission of the trespass, used indecorous and insulting language, and that one of the defendants had a pistol. Exemplary and punitive damages were awarded. In Merest v. Harvey, 5 Taunt. 442, Heath, J., says: "I remember a case where a jury gave £500 damages for merely knocking a man's hat off; and the court refused a new trial. . . . It goes to prevent the practice of dueling, if juries are permitted to punish insult by exemplary damages." Gibbs, Ch. J., said: "I wish to know, in a case where a man disregards every principle which actuates the conduct of gentlemen, what is to restrain him, except large damages? . . . I do not know upon what principle we can grant a rule in this case, unless we were to lay it down that the jury are not justified in giving more than the absolute pecuniary damage that the plaintiff may sustain." In this case for a trespass £500 was given. In discussing the question whether, for injuries sustained by a plaintiff in respect to his marital rights, his action was for trespass or case, Mr. Street says: "Clearly, we are here confronted with a class of wrongs which historically have their roots in the law of trespass, but which, nevertheless, in maturity lie altogether beyond the field of trespass, and belong to that body of legal injuries in which harm is conceived as being done, not to persons or property, but to rights incident to them." Foundations of Legal Liability, 264.

It is suggested that, while it is true that exemplary damages may be recovered for malicious trespass upon property and for insulting language to the owner, the wife alone can sue for damages sustained by her on account of indecent and insulting language and conduct. For the purpose of supporting this view the recent changes made by the Constitution and statutes in respect to the property and personal rights of married women are relied upon. We cannot think that, because the property rights of the wife have been enlarged, and her right to sue alone for injuries to her person and property conferred, the right and duty of the husband to be the head of the family, to protect the honor and virtue of his wife, or to recover for injuries sustained by interference with his marital rights, have been destroyed. It is true that, as held by this court, while he may be reduced to a mere steward or overseer of his wife's property, he is no less her husband, with all of the rights and duties incident to that relation. That which degrades or destroys her honor must affect his. It cannot be that if, by permission of the wife, he is living on her land as his home, the law will not afford him protection against and damage for a malicious wrong done to him through his wife. The law would but mock him if, when his home is invaded, his wife insulted, and her virtue assaulted, it gave him, for such injuries, but a penny, permitting the offender to go "scott free." If in the bitterness of his wounded spirit he sought redress by violation of the criminal law, subjecting himself to infamous punishment, the sympathy of his fellow men would be but little comfort to him. No man can long retain the respect of his wife and children if he does not seek redress for a malicious trespass upon his home and for an attempt to seduce his wife. The ancient law declared: "A patriarch is lord in his own house and family, and no person has a right to interfere with him; not even the village elder, or the imperial judge." Again it is said: "The house father was responsible for the due performance of his vacra and for the purity of his ritual." States grow in virtue and strength, citizens are loyal and home loving, in proportion as the unity of the family is preserved. The husband and father is recognized as the head of the family; the wife living under his protection and looking to him to guard her person and honor from all harm. The husband must have redress for wrongs done him by seeking the award of such actual and exemplary damages as a jury may find to be proper, rather than by violating the criminal law.

The judgment of his Honor was correct, and must be affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

D. C. JONES et al., Appts.,
v.

W. A. SMITH et al.

(— N. C. —, 62 S. E. 1092.)

Entireties — trees — partition.

A wife holding land by entireties with her husband is not entitled to partition of trees cut therefrom by him, nor of lumber into which they are converted, since both are seised of the entirety.

Case Note. — Respective rights of husband and wife to the income or products from an estate held by the entirety.

The general rule, under the common law, was that the husband had full control of the rents, profits, crops, etc., from an estate held by the entirety to the exclusion of the wife, her only interest being a right to support. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 849. Some cases hold that this is an incident to the estate, while other cases hold that it is merely a part of the husband's common-law marital rights. Under the common law, the result is the same.

Thus, in Morrill v. Morrill, 138 Mich. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 306, 101 N. W. 209, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1100, it was held that, under the common law that prevailed in Michigan, a wife had no right to a share of the crops growing on lands held by her and her husband as tenants by the entirety. The court said: "I think it unnecessary to determine whether the husband's exclusive control of these crops is an incident of estates by entirety, or whether . . . it is a result of the marital unity. If it is an incident of estates by entirety, then, since, under our decisions, estates by entirety remain as at common law, that right continues to belong to the husband. If it is a result of the marital unity, the same conclusion must be reached because we have held—as we were bound to hold—that the statute does not affect the marital unity."

But, under the so-called married woman's acts, which, by the great weight of authority, did not abolish the common-law "estate by the entirety," this question is important. If the husband's control over the products of the land is a part of his common-law rights, then there can scarcely be any question but that such control has been destroyed, and each party becomes entitled to one half of the rents, profits, etc. But, if that control is an incident peculiar to the form of tenure, then it would appear that the husband's control would continue, for it could hardly be said that the tenancy remains while rights merely incidental to and flowing from the tenancy are taken away.

This phase of the question was not before the court in JONES v. SMITH because of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wilkes County in defendants' favor in an action brought to partition certain trees and lumber. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

The plaintiffs are husband and wife and were at the time of the transactions herein-after mentioned. The plaintiff J. M. Jones, the husband, who is only a nominal party to the action, contracted to cut certain timber from a tract of land owned by him and his wife as tenants by entirety and deliver it at the defendant's mill for a price fixed in the particular form of the action brought by the plaintiff, the court merely holding that partition would not lie for the logs and timber, and that the severance did not convert the logs and timber into a tenancy in common.

But in Hiles v. Fisher, 144 N. Y. 306, 30 L.R.A. 305, 43 Am. St. Rep. 762, 39 N. E. 337, it was held that the common-law right of the husband to the entire usufruct of an estate by the entirety during the joint lives of his wife and himself was not an incident of that estate, but was part of his common-law marital rights; and, under the statute, the rents and profits of an estate by entirety during the joint lives of husband and wife do not follow the nature of the estate in respect to their disposal, but belong to them in separate moieties, the wife's share of which is within the general statutory provisions giving married women power to control and dispose of their own property. And the Hiles Case was cited with approval, and followed, in Messing v. Messing, 64 App. Div. 125, 71 N. Y. Supp. 717.

And in Bilder v. Robinson (N. J. Ch.) 67 Atl. 828, it was held that, since the married woman's act, a wife was entitled to receive one half of the rents and profits of an estate held by the entirety.

It would seem that, under the ruling in the Hiles Case and those holding similarly, partition would lie, as the parties then would be tenants in common only, as to the rents, profits, crops, etc.

In Patton v. Rankin, 68 Ind. 245, 34 Am. Rep. 254, it was held that a crop raised by a husband, upon land held by the husband and wife by the entirety is not subject to levy and sale on an execution against the husband, as a crop raised on the land is held in the same manner and subject to the same law as the land itself. It will be noted that, while the facts in this case differ greatly from those in JONES v. SMITH, yet the cases agree upon the point that the incidents of the estate attached to the crops after they had been severed.

There is but little direct authority upon this subject, but a few cases bearing more or less upon the general question may be noted.

Thus, in West v. Aberdeen & R. F. R. Co. 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 447, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 360, a wife was held not to be a proper contract. The timber was cut and delivered to defendant, and he paid for the same. It was agreed by the parties that the timber should be sold and the proceeds of sale should be held subject to the decision in this case. This action was brought by the feme plaintiff for a partition of the lumber into which the cut timber had been sawed. The allegation of the petition is that she and the defendant are tenants in common; each owning a one-half interest in the lumber. The petitioner asks for a sale of the property in order that there may be an equal division between the parties. The court suggested that the feme plaintiff might amend and sue for her share of the money due for the timber. This she declined to do, but insisted on her right to recover according to the allegations of her petition. The court then intimated that she could not recover, whereupon she submitted to a nonsuit and appealed.

party in an action for damages to timber on any estate held by the entirety, as the husband was, during coverture, entitled to the full control and the usufruct of the land to the exclusion of the wife. But in Fairchild v. Chastelleux, 1 Pa. St. 176, 44 Am. Dec. 117, in which the facts were very similar, it was held that, while the husband had full control over the estate, it was in his election whether he should join his wife with him in the action for damages.

And, in an action by a wife for trespass in entering lands held by her and her husband by the entirety and removing sand therefrom under an alleged contract with the husband, it was held, in Cox v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 123 Mo. App. 356, 100 S. W. 1096, that, under the statutes of the state, the wife could sue for the entire damage.

In Bynum v. Wicker, 141 N. C. 95, 115 Am. St. Rep. 675, 53 S. E. 478, it was held that, while a husband could mortgage or convey an estate held by the entirety,—that is, convey the right to receive the rents and profits, and neither husband nor wife had any right to interfere with the mortgagee's possession—yet one claiming under a conveyance from the husband had no right to cut timber thereon, and an injunction restraining him from such cutting would be granted.

In Thornley v. Thornley [1893] 2 Ch. 233, it was held that, where husband and wife hold an estate by entirety, the husband was entitled to receive the rents during coverture; but, upon a divorce taking place, the husband's right to receive the rents which existed during the coverture came to an end.

Where a husband abandons his wife and leaves her in possession of premises held by them by the entirety, it was held, in O'Connor v. McMahon, 54 Hun, 66, 7 N. Y. Supp. 225, that his act in conveying an undivided one half of the estate to a third person was 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. W. W. Barber for appellants.

Messrs. Finley & Hendren, for appellees:

The feme plaintiff is not entitled to recover one half the lumber by virtue of her right as tenant by the entirety with her husband.

Simonton v. Cornelius, 98 N. C. 433, 4 S. E. 38; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. p. 851.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs as husband and wife were seised of the land, including the timber, not properly as joint tenants or tenants in common, but as tenants by entirety, for, being considered as one person in law, they cannot take the estate in moieties, but both are seised of the entirety, that is per tout et non per my, the consequence of which is that neither the husband nor the wife can dispose of any part without the assent of the inoperative, and did not give to such grantee a right to any of the crops, or to the use or possession of the land.

Some cases containing dicta as to the rights of the parties at common law may be cited.

Thus, in Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 615, which was an action in ejectment, the court said: "During the life of the husband he undoubtedly has the absolute control of the estate of the wife, and can convey or mortgage it for that period. By marriage, he acquires during coverture the usufruct of all her real estate which she has in fee simple, fee tail, or for life." And this statement was quoted with approval in Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 362, 88 Am. Dec. 692, which was an action to restrain the sheriff from deeding property sold under an execution, and in Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 462, 4 N. E. 824, which was an action upon a lease given by a husband alone.

And in Hemingway v. Scales, 42 Miss. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 586, 97 Am. Dec. 425, which was an action in ejectment, it was held that the husband might, during coverture, do what he pleased with the rents and profits of an estate held by the entirety; but he could not dispose of any part of the inheritance without the wife's concurrence.

So, in Simonton v. Cornelius, 98 N. C. 433, 4 S. E. 38, in a proceeding to impeach a deed, the court said: "So, too, the fruits accruing during their joint lives would belong to the husband, when, by separation from the land, they become personal property, jure mariti, as when personal goods reduced into possession become his, even when the wife was sole owner, under the law as it then was."

Upon the general subject. Tenancy by entireties, see note to Hiles v. Fisher, 30 L.R.A. 305.

other, but the whole must remain to the survivor. 2 Bl. Com. 182. In 1 Washburn on Real Property, 5th ed. p. 706, it is said: "A still more peculiar joint estate is that which belongs to a husband and wife, where the same is conveyed to them as such. If a man and woman, tenants in common, marry, they still continue to hold in common; but, if the estate is conveyed to them originally as husband and wife, they are neither tenants in common nor properly joint tenants, though having the right of survivorship, but are what are called tenants by entirety. While such estates have, like a joint tenancy, the quality of survivorship, they differ from that in this essential respect, that neither can convey his or her interest so as to affect the right or survivorship in the other. They are not seised, in the eye of the law, of moieties, but of entireties. In such cases, the survivor does not take as a new acquisition, but under the original limitation, his estate being simply freed from participation by the other, so that if, for instance, the wife survives and then dies, her heirs would take to the exclusion of the heirs of the husband. Nor can partition be made of the estate." See also 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 40; West v. Aberdeen & R. F. R. Co. 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 360; Bynum v. Wicker, 141 N. C. 95, 115 Am. St. Rep. 675, 53 S. E. 478; Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 204, 26 Am. St. Rep. 562, 13 S. E. 790; 2 Kent, Com. 133. The nature, incidents, and properties of this estate by entirety were not changed by the provisions of the Constitution relating to married women. Long v. Barnes, 87 N. C. 329. As the plaintiffs were thus seised of the timber, its severance from the land by cutting it did not convert the estate in the trees, when severed, or in the lumber cut from the logs, into a tenancy in common, nor is the feme plaintiff, by reason of the severance, entitled to maintain this action for partition. If she could have enjoined the husband from cutting the timber, under the principle stated in Bynum v. Wicker, supra, she is certainly not entitled to have a partition of the lumber, into which the timber had been converted, no more than she would have been entitled to partition of the land or the trees standing or growing thereon. This is the only question before us, as the feme plaintiff insisted upon her legal right to partition as alleged and asserted in her petition.

The intimation of the court was correct, and therefore the nonsuit, to which the plaintiff submitted in deference thereto, must stand. It may be that the present state of the law as to married women, under the Constitution and statutes, and a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

wise public policy, call for a change in the incidents and properties of this anomalous estate (tenancy by entirety), so that it may be turned into a tenancy in common; but this is a question which addresses itself to the legislature, and not to us.

No error.

"Farm laborer" — domestic — lien.

Headnote by MORGAN, Ch. J.

Case Note. — Who is a "farm" or "agricultural" laborer within statute giving lien?

One employed in making sugar upon a plantation is within a statute giving a lien to plantation laborers. Saloy v. Dragon, 37 La. Ann. 71.

But one employed in making repairs upon a sugar-grinding house and the machinery therein, as well as acting as watchman, is not within such statute. Ibid.

Nor is one within such statute who is employed by a sugar refining company to weigh and load sugar cane upon cars, and who hires others to do the labor connected therewith, as he is an independent contractor. Fortier v. Delgado, 59 C. C. A. 180, 122 Fed. 604.

So, an overseer is not within a statute giving agricultural laborers a lien for labor. Isbell v. Dunlap, 17 S. C. 581.

And one who, with his machinery and servants, threshes grain for another, although present directing and assisting therein, is not within a statute giving a lien to any person "who shall do labor upon any farm, . . . or harvesting, or laboring upon, or securing, or assisting in securing, or housing any crop or crops sown or raised thereon." Mohr v. Clark, 3 Wash. Terr. 440, 19 Pac. 28.

However, one employed to cut and stack hay is within a statute similar to that last mentioned. Beckstead v. Griffith, 11 Idaho, 738, 83 Pac. 764.

A similar question is presented in Rowley v. Ellis, 197 Mass. 391, 83 N. E. 1103, where it was held that a farm foreman who has charge of the laborers thereon is a "farm laborer" within the Massachusetts employers' liability act relieving a master for injuries received by such.

As to who are laborers or employees generally, within the meaning of a statute giving a preference to such, see note to Tod v. Kentucky Union R. Co. 18 L.R.A. 305.

er" within the meaning of § 6277, Rev. Codes 1905, giving a lien for the wages of farm laborers.

(December 31, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Ransom County in plaintiff's favor in an action to foreclose a farm laborer's lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. A. Curtis for appellant.

Messrs. Rourke & Kvello, for respondent:

Complainant is a farm laborer within the meaning of the statute.

Lane v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545, 67 N. W. 348; Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260.

Morgan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the foreclosure of a farm laborer's lien, and is jointly brought against the owner of the land and his tenant. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff rendered services to the defendant Ole Abrahamson, who rented the premises, in the capacity of a farm laborer, at the agreed price of $5 per week; that such services were performed upon land which is specifically described in the complaint, and the crop which was raised upon said land is also specifically described therein. The relief demanded is that plaintiff's right to a laborer's lien be established, and that such lien be foreclosed, and that she be paid the amount due her for such services, to wit, the sum of $61.70, together with her costs and disbursements. In the claim for a lien filed by plaintiff it is stated that she "performed services in the capacity of a kitchen laborer." The answer denies that the plaintiff performed any services in the capacity of a farm laborer, and denies that any valid laborer's lien was filed. After a trial the court made findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the plaintiff, and ordered a sale of the grain raised upon the land to satisfy the plaintiff's lien for services as a farm laborer, together with costs and disbursements. The defendant Thomas Casey, the owner of the land, has appealed from said judgment, and demands a trial de novo under the provisions of § 7229, Rev. Codes 1905.

The sole question presented on the appeal is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a lien as a farm laborer upon the crops raised upon the land upon which her employer lived and resided, and for whom she was working as a servant from July 28th to November 8, 1906.

which she was employed, and as to the services which she performed, is as follows:

Q. What were her labors on the farm?

A. She done kitchen work, cooking and washed dishes.

Q. You had a quite a number of men there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How big a force?

A. I had 4 or 5 men most of the time, and Mr. Casey had a couple men there at the same time.

Q. And she cooked for all these parties?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And prepared all the meals also?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is what you kept her for?

A. Yes, sir.

On cross-examination the witness stated:

Q. Mrs. Abrahamson done some of the work around the house?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In fact did just as much as Helma [the plaintiff]?

A. Not much of the cooking, but she helped quite a lot.

Q. Mrs. Lee was there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Helma Lowe is a girl?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And all the work she did was in the kitchen and around the house?

A. Yes, sir.

That is all of the testimony in regard to the character of the work performed by the plaintiff, as testified to by her employer, the defendant Abrahamson. The statute under which the lien is claimed is chapter 63, § 1, p. 87, Laws 1895 (Rev. Codes 1895, § 4826), being § 6277, Rev. Codes 1905, and, so far as applicable, is as follows: "Any person who performs services for another in the capacity of farm laborer between the 1st day of April and the 1st day of December of any year shall have a lien on all crops of every kind, grown, raised, or harvested by the person for whom the services were performed during said time, as security for the payment of any wages due or owing to such persons for services so performed, and said lien shall have priority over all other liens, chattel mortgages, or encumbrances, excepting, however, seed grain and threshers' liens." Without a statute giving such a lien or a special contract, farm laborers would not be entitled to a lien upon the crops, and must rely upon the personal responsibility of the landlord or cropper for their pay. The statute was passed to secure farm laborers against irresponsible landlords, and against the liens of implement dealers, which often covered the whole crop. We must look to the terms of the statute to ascertain who are entitled to avail themselves of its provisions. It should be liberally construed to give effect to the intent of the legislature in enacting it. Its provisions should not be restricted or added to, as it is the sole function of the legislature to say to whom this special lien shall be given.

The general principle of construction that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed can have no application in this state, as § 6724, Rev. Codes 1905, expressly provides that the provisions of the Code shall "be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Section 6691, Rev. Codes 1905, provides that, except when defined or explained in the statute, the "words used in any statute are to be understood in their ordinary sense, except when a contrary intention appears," etc. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to a lien under said § 6277 depends upon the meaning or construction to be given to the words "farm laborer" as used therein. As ordinarily understood, a farm laborer is one who labors upon a farm in raising crops, or doing general farm work. As commonly accepted, we think the words do not include those engaged in domestic work. They refer to work performed directly in connection with the crops raised on the farm. Under the evidence, it appears that the plaintiff did no work except in the house. She did the cooking for four or five men who were working on the farm for Abrahamson, and for two other men who were working for Casey. It does not appear that the persons working for Casey did any work for Abrahamson, or in connection with the crop on the farm. We think that the legislative intention was to secure only those persons whose work is directly connected with the raising of the crops. If the plaintiff be given a lien upon the crop in this case, it will result in her receiving pay out of the crop for some services that were not even remotely connected with the crop, or contributed in any way to the bringing of the same into existence. We do not think that the work done by plaintiff can be classed as farm labor within the meaning of the lien law. Although the statute is to be liberally construed to secure a lien in favor of persons who have labored upon the farm, we are satisfied that it was not intended to include those within its provisions whose work was only indirectly connected with the crop. We find this construction sustained under somewhat similar statutes in McCormick v. Los Angeles City Water Co. 40 Cal. 185; Sullivan's Appeal, 77 Pa. 107; Allen's Appeal, 81* Pa. 302; Boisot, Mechanics' Liens, § 111. Re 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

spondent relies on Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260, and Breault v. Archambault, 64 Minn. 420, 58 Am. St. Rep. 545, 67 N. W. 348, as sustaining her right to a lien under the facts of this case. These cases sustain the right of a cook in a logging camp to a lien upon the logs that were cut or banked by the crews for whom the cooks prepared the meals. In these cases the cooks went into the logging camps, as members of logging crews, and did no other work, except to cook for them. In this case the plaintiff did other work besides cooking, and cooked for others than the farm laborers. Under the evidence as to the work performed by the plaintiff, we are satisfied that she was not a farm laborer within the provisions of said lien statute.

The judgment is reversed and the action dismissed.

All concur.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

EX PARTE WILLIAM CLENDENNING.

(— Okla. —, 97 Pac. 650.)

Criminal conviction — suspended sentence — jurisdiction to commit.

When a judgment of imprisonment is imposed by a court on plea of guilty or conviction in a criminal case, and the same is not stayed as provided by law, the defendant should forthwith be committed to the proper officer for incarceration; and where this is not done, and the court makes an order under which the defendant is discharged from custody, it has no power or jurisdiction, after the lapse of the time involved in the sentence, and after the term, to issue commitment on such judgment.

Headnote by DUNN, J.

Case Note. — Power to commit after expiration of term of sentence.

This note does not include the distinct, though kindred, questions as to the right to suspend sentence or to commit for the remainder of a suspended sentence before the expiration of its term. It also excludes those cases where actually there was no sentence imposed, but sentence was postponed, which proceeding is often, but rather inaccurately, called a suspension of sentence.

Upon the question as thus indicated there is but little authority, and that little is far from being in accord with the CLENDENNING CASE. It is true that the conclusion reached in that case is supported by Re APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from the custody of Henry Clay King, sheriff of Creek County, to which he had been committed upon the alleged happening of a contingency named in a suspended sentence. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wade S. Stanfield and Barnum & McGraw for petitioner.

Messrs. Charles West, Attorney General, and W. C. Reeves for the State.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is an original proceeding in habeas corpus, brought by William Clendenning, who alleges that he is unlawfully restrained and deprived of his liberty by Henry Clay King, a sheriff of Creek county, state of Oklahoma. From the record in the case we gather that on December 16, 1907, the defendant was brought in to the county court of that county, and in case No. 15 the following judgment was entered against him: "Defendant appeared in person, but without attorney, and entered a plea of guilty of selling intoxicating liquors, whereupon the court ordered that he be fined $50 and pay costs, amounting to $4.15, a total of $54.15, and to be committed to jail until said fine and costs are paid; and it was further ordered by the court that defendant be confined in the county jail for a period of thirty days, said sentence to be suspended on good behavior." Thereafter, and on January 21, 1908, the defendant was again arraigned before the court of said county in case No. 68, charged with the same offense, when the court entered against him the following judgment: "Defendant waived arraignment and entered a plea of guilty, whereupon the court ordered that he pay a fine of $75 and costs, and that he be given thirty days in jail; jail sentence suspended during good behavior. Fine and costs were paid, and defendant was conditionally discharged as shown above." In neither of these cases was commitment issued.

Thereafter, and on June 27, 1908, after the expiration of the terms of court at which both of the foregoing judgments were rendered, and after the expiration of about five months from the date on which the last judgment was rendered, and six months subsequent to the date of the first, the court pronounced the following judgment in case No. 68: "Now, on this 27th day of June, A. D. 1908, the same being one of the judicial days of the regular May, A. D. 1908, term of this court, the above matter came on to be heard, and it appearing to the court that on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1908, said defendant was, by judgment of this court then and there rendered, adjudged, ordered, and decreed to be imprisoned in the county jail of Creek county, Oklahoma, and it further appearing to the Strickler, 51 Kan. 700, 33 Pac. 620; Tuttle v. Lang, 100 Me. 123, 60 Atl. 892, both of which are sufficiently set forth in that opinion, and by Re Webb, 89 Wis. 354, 27 L.R.A. 356, 46 Am. St. Rep. 846, 62 N. W. 177, in which it was held that an order committing a defendant to serve a sentence previously pronounced, but suspended, made after the term of imprisonment named in the sentence had expired, was void for want of jurisdiction.

On the other hand, in Ex parte Collins (Cal. App.) 97 Pac. 188, in which a commitment upon a suspended sentence after the term thereof had expired was upheld, the court said: "The time at which a judgment or sentence shall be carried into execution forms no part of the judgment of the court. . . . The expiration of time without imprisonment is in no sense an execution of the sentence. . . . Where the convicted defendant is at liberty and has not served his sentence, if there be no statute to the contrary, he may be rearrested as an escape, and ordered into custody upon the unexecuted judgment."

The last case was relied upon in Mann v. People, 16 Colo. App. 475, 66 Pac. 452, in which mandamus issued to a justice of the peace to compel him to issue a writ of commitment upon a sentence rendered by him, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court saying that it was immaterial that the time since the sentence which was sought to be enforced exceeded the length of the sentence.

And that a court may commit upon a suspended sentence even after the term thereof has expired finds support also in Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 Atl. 954; Weber v. State, 58 Ohio St. 616, 41 L.R.A. 472, 51 N. E. 116; and Fults v. State, 2 Sneed, 232, sufficiently set forth in EX PARTE CLENDENNING, though the court in that case seeks to distinguish the last two of these cases.

Authority for this conclusion would also seem to be found in State v. Cockerham, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 204, in which an order of commitment was upheld, though the defendant had been at liberty until the term of his sentence had elapsed; but it does not appear whether such sentence had been suspended, or how it came that the defendant was at liberty.

For a discussion of the question of the power to impose in pardon conditions extending beyond the term of sentence, see the case note to Ex parte Prout, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1064; as to the question whether the time a prisoner is out on parole or conditional pardon is to be deducted from the term of his sentence, see case note to Scott v. Chichester, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 304.

court that said jail sentence was suspended on good behavior of said defendant, and it now appearing to the court, from the records of this court, that the behavior of said defendant has not been good since said 21st day of January, 1908, the suspension of said jail sentence is hereby set aside and annulled, and said judgment of this court is hereby this day ordered enforced, and the said defendant is committed to the custody of the sheriff of Creek county, Oklahoma, for imprisonment in said jail for thirty days from and after the date hereof, in conformity with said judgment of this court, rendered as aforesaid, on said 21st of January, A. D. 1908. To all of which action of the court the defendant excepts. Whereupon said defendant prayed an appeal to the supreme court of Oklahoma, which was by this court denied, and the defendant then and there duly excepted. Whereupon said defendant asked the court to fix the amount of appeal bond, which was by the court denied, to which the defendant excepted." And immediately thereafter, and on the same day, the court rendered the following judgment in case No. 17: "Now, on this 27th day of June, A. D. 1908, the same being one of the judicial days of the regular May, A. D. 1908, term of this court, the above matter came on to be heard, and the same action was taken herein as in No. 68, Criminal, except that the sentence herein was, by the court, allowed to be concurrent with the sentence in said No. 68, Criminal."

Upon this action by the court and the commitment issued thereunder, the defendant was taken into custody, and this writ was by him sued out to regain his liberty. He contends that after the expiration of the term at which the judgments were rendered, and after the expiration of the time within which they would or could have been served, in the absence of escape on his part, or any appeal or other lawful procedure taken to stay the same, the court lost jurisdiction to issue commitment thereon and to require their enforcement by his imprisonment. This raises the question of whether or not a court, after delivering its judgment and sentence in a criminal case, may stay the same, in the absence of appeal or other legal proceedings taken, looking to its modification, and after the term at which it was rendered has expired, and after the time embraced therein has elapsed, whether it has jurisdiction to then issue commitment in execution of its judgment, and incarcerate the defendant thereunder. In support of the action taken by the court we are cited by the attorney general to a number of authorities. Those which most nearly touch the proposition, and upon which he most strongly relies, are as follows: Allen 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. State, Mart. & Y. 294; Fults v. State, 2 Sned, 232; Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 Atl. 954; State v. Hatley, 110 N. C. 522, 14 S. E. 751; People ex rel. Forsyth, v. Court of Sessions, 141 N. Y. 288, 23 L.R.A. 856, 36 N. E. 386; Weber v. State, 58 Ohio St. 616, 41 L.R.A. 472, 51 N. E. 116.

The case of Allen v. State, supra, was one decided by the supreme court of Tennessee. Allen was convicted of the crime of manslaughter at the circuit court of Green county in September, 1826. He was sentenced to be imprisoned six months, and to be branded by burning on the hand, and to pay the costs of the prosecution. He asked for a stay of this judgment to enable him to make application to the governor for a pardon, and the court, in granting it, was doubtless greatly influenced by the fact that the burning on the hand, if inflicted, would much impair the privilege granted by a pardon, should one be secured. The judgment was stayed under a statute to enable defendant to make such application. This case is referred to in the case of Crane v. State, 94 Tenn. 98, 28 S. W. 317, in which the statute under which the court acted in that case is cited. Defendant Crane made application for a stay of the execution of his sentence until he could likewise apply to the governor for a pardon, and the supreme court of the state, in reference to this matter, said: "The power of this court to grant such a suspension in a proper case is clearly given by § 6096, Milligen & V. Code, as follows: 'In case of the conviction and sentence of a defendant to imprisonment, the presiding judge may, in all proper cases, postpone the execution of the sentence for such time as may be necessary to make application to the executive for a pardon or commutation of punishment.' This power and discretion was exercised by this court in the case of Allen v. State, Mart. & Y. 295. It is apparent, however, from a reading of the statute, that such power and discretion to suspend execution of sentence will only be exercised in proper cases, and it will not be extended to cases generally; otherwise, the course of justice would be impeded, and the governor deluged with applications in all cases before the convicted person could be imprisoned."

The case of Fults v. State, supra, was another case from Tennessee, which was decided upon the authority of the case of Allen v. State, supra. In that case the defendant was sentenced to a fine of $10 and two days' imprisonment. The fine and costs were secured, and there appears of record the following entry: "On motion of defendant, David Fults, and for reasons appearing to the satisfaction of the court by admission of the attorney general and the avidence in the case, he is permitted to enter into recognizance to appear at the next term of this court and then undergo the imprisonment adjudged against him, and abide by and perform the sentence of the court." He appeared at the next term of court, and was ordered to be imprisoned pursuant to the judgment. From this he appealed, and the supreme court held that there was nothing irregular in the proceeding, and that the execution should go. The stay of the execution, it will be noted, was to a time certain, and there was nothing contingent in it. Where there is no statute, such as in this state, some few of the courts have held that a court may fix a day certain in the future on which a sentence shall begin. This was done in this case, and the supreme court sustained it.

The case of Weber v. State, supra, in our judgment, is not applicable, for the reason that, in that case, the judgment, the suspension, and the setting of the same aside all took place, at the same term of court. The supreme court said: "When the suspension is without express conditions, as in this case, it is within the power of the court to set aside the suspension at any time during the same term, on its own motion, and to order the sentence to be executed." In the case at bar it will be noted that both terms of court at which these judgments were rendered had expired, that no motion for new trial or other proceeding had taken place to review or reverse the same, and the judgments were final so far as the control of the court over them was concerned.

Neither do we consider the case of State v. Hatley, supra, as controlling in this case. That was a case in which Phillip Hatley and his wife were sentenced to be imprisoned for twelve months in the county jail, with the proviso that, if the defendants left the state within thirty days, no execution should issue; otherwise, the defendants were to be imprisoned. The parties left the state, and in about one month returned to the jurisdiction of the court. Thereupon the clerk of the court issued execution upon the judgment that had been previously rendered. In the consideration of the case the supreme court of North Carolina said: "The court had no power to pass a sentence of banishment, and we think the judgment of the court cannot be fairly construed as a judgment of banishment. If so, it would be void. The only judgment passed by the court was that the defendants be imprisoned twelve months; and the words, 'but if the defendants leave,' etc., constitute no part of the sentence or judgment of the court, but were manifestly intended only as a note or memorandum directing the clerk to postpone the period at which the sentence shall go into execution, and not as a punishment for the defendants, or an infliction upon some other community, predicated upon the assumption that it would be desirable and beneficial, both to the community in which they were engaged in the bad calling of keeping a disorderly and disreputable house and to the defendants, in giving them an opportunity to reform under new surroundings. Such course is not unfrequent, and, though dictated by the best intentions to benefit the public, as well as offenders, is not to be commended. We think it quite clear, when the defendants left the state and speedily returned (for it appears that the court was held in the latter part of October and they returned early in December), they came within the condition upon which the clerk was to issue the capias." The facts contained in the foregoing quotation distinguish that case from the one at bar, in that the court did not stay its judgment or the execution, and that the commitment was issued by the clerk; and this within the period of time during which the defendants, had they been immediately committed, would have been serving their sentence. These facts, we believe, take that case out of the rule controlling the one at bar.

Another case relied upon by the attorney general, People ex rel. Forsyth v. Court of Sessions, supra, was one wherein the supreme court of the state of New York by mandamus commanded the court of sessions to pronounce judgment in a criminal case wherein one Attridge had been convicted of the crime of grand larceny, in which the trial court, out of respect to his youth and previous good character, had suspended sentence. Three days thereafter the county judge, one of the three judges sitting at the trial, in the absence of the other two, brought the defendant before him and sentenced him to imprisonment. He was released upon habeas corpus on the ground that the sentence was not concurred in by a majority of the court. He was remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and again brought before the court, and the judgment thereupon was given that sentence be suspended during good behavior. He was thereupon discharged from custody. Thereafter the supreme court granted a peremptory writ of mandamus, commanding the said trial court to proceed to judgment and to pass sentence upon the defendant as prescribed by law. On the case being appealed to the court of appeals, the court of last resort of that state, it said: "The precise question involved, therefore, is the power of a court of record, possessing jurisdiction in criminal cases, to suspend judgment after conviction." And the court held that the trial court possessed this power, in the following language: "Without attempting to collate all the authorities on the subject. it is sufficient to say that the power to suspend sentence at common law is asserted by writers of acknowledged authority on criminal jurisprudence, by the uniform practice of the courts, and numerous adjudged cases." The statement of that case will show that it is not applicable to the case at bar, for the reason that the question involved here is not the power to suspend sentence, but the power of the court, after sentence, to suspend execution.

This case is noted, and the above distinction drawn, in the consideration of the case of Re Webb, 89 Wis. 354, 27 L.R.A. 356, 46 Am. St. Rep. 846, 62 N. W. 177, which was a case where execution of the judgment of the court, as in the case at bar, was suspended. The Forsyth Case, supra, being cited on the part of the state to sustain the power of the court to suspend execution, just as it is cited by the attorney general in the case at bar, the supreme court of Wisconsin said: "The case of People ex rel. Forsyth v. Court of Sessions, 141 N. Y. 238, 23 L.R.A. 856, 36 N. E. 386, was not a case where execution of a sentence had been suspended, but where sentence had been postponed; and the power of the court to delay sentence in its discretion was sustained, and numerous authorities were cited to support it. But the present case involves different considerations. Here the execution of a sentence already pronounced is indefinitely suspended, and it may be the pleasure of the court never to direct execution, so that the suspension has the practical effect of a pardon, or of arrest of judgment, indeterminate or final, without the authority of law; and it has been likened to the incorporation into our criminal jurisprudence of the 'ticket-of-leave system,' without any of its safeguards, leaving the convicted criminal subject to the mere option or caprice of the judge, who may direct the enforcement of the sentence after any lapse of time, however great, or withhold it, to the great detriment, it may be, of the interests of the public,—a power plainly liable to great abuse."

The case of Sylvester v. State, supra, is one wherein the supreme court of New Hampshire, in a case on all fours with the one at bar, decided that it was within the power of the court to stay its execution. But one case is relied upon and cited by it to support its opinion, and that is the case of Com. v. Dowdican, 115 Mass. 133. An inspection of that case shows that it was not one wherein the court suspended execution; but it, like the case of People ex rel. Forsyth v. Court of Sessions, supra, was one wherein the court suspended sentence. The 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

New Hampshire supreme court does not discuss the proposition involved, and cites no other authority to support its opinion. Hence it is practically of little or no weight as an authority.

To supplement the cases presented to us above, we have sought diligently to find other authority; but we have been unsuccessful. Outside of those which the attorney general has presented to sustain this judgment, we have been unable to find a solitary well-considered opinion. Every case wherein the question is squarely presented and passed upon, and the courts have given it the care and attention its importance deserves, holds, practically without dissent, that, "in passing sentence on a person convicted of an offense the court has no power to provide that the imprisonment of the defendant shall begin at some future, indefinite time, depending on the happening of a contingency; and an arrest under such conviction, made after the expiration of the term of imprisonment named in the sentence [and after the term], is illegal." Re Strickler, 51 Kan. 700, 33 Pac. 620; Re Bloom, 53 Mich. 597, 19 N. W. 200; State v. Murphy, 23 Nev. 390, 48 Pac. 628; Tuttle v. Lang, 100 Me. 123, 60 Atl. 893; Ex parte Gordon, 1 Black. 503, 17 L. ed. 134; State v. Voss, 80 Iowa, 467, 8 L.R.A. 767, 45 N. W. 898; Re Markuson, 5 N. D. 180, 64 N. W. 939. We will review some of these cases.

The case of Re Strickler, supra, was one wherein the defendant pleaded guilty in the district court of Ford county, Kansas, to the charge of assault and battery, whereupon the following sentence was pronounced upon him by the court: "It is the sentence of the law that you, W. H. Strickler, be by the sheriff of Ford county, Kansas, incarcerated in the jail of said county, there to remain for the space of ninety days from the date of this sentence. It is further ordered by the court that the operation of this sentence shall be suspended during such time as the defendant shall keep the peace with all mankind, and desist from all unnecessary use of intoxicating liquor, and refrain from becoming intoxicated. It is further ordered, as a condition of this sentence, that whenever the said W. H. Strickler shall violate any one of the above conditions, and upon notice thereof to the sheriff by the prosecuting officer of Ford county, Kansas, or by the judge of this court, the said sheriff shall immediately incarcerate the said Strickler in the jail of said county, and he shall remain there committed until the expiration of ninety days from said date of incarceration, and until the costs of this prosecution have been paid by him. The question as to whether the conditions of this suspension have been broken shall be determined by the prosecuting attorney of Ford county, or by the judge of this court, and no judicial investigation shall be required." After the expiration of the term of court at which this sentence was pronounced, and after the lapse of ninety days, the court issued the following commitment on this sentence to the sheriff of the county: "And whereas, said defendant, W. H. Strickler, has failed to comply with the conditions of said judgment, you are therefore commanded to take and commit said defendant, W. H. Strickler, to the jail of Ford county, Kansas, there to remain until said judgment be complied with." Upon the commitment issued the petitioner was arrested and placed in jail. He sued out in the supreme court a writ of habeas corpus, and that court, on the consideration of the case, speaking through Mr. Justice Allen, said: "The question here presented is whether the district court could lawfully sentence the defendant to imprisonment in the county jail, and then suspend its execution, to be enforced at some future time, on the happening of a contingency named in the judgment. Section 256 of the Criminal Code [Gen. Stat. 1901, § 5701] reads: 'Where any convict shall be sentenced to any punishment, the clerk of the court in which sentence was passed shall forthwith deliver a certified copy thereof to the sheriff of the county, who shall, without delay, either in person or by a general or usual deputy, cause such convict to receive the punishment to which he was sentenced.' While it is usual to delay sentence after conviction until motions for new trials, in arrest of judgment, and the like, are disposed of, and while it is within the power of the court to continue the hearing of such motions, or for any other good and sufficient cause to withhold sentence, yet, when a sentence has been pronounced by the court, its operation begins at once; and under the section just quoted it is the duty of the sheriff to immediately proceed to carry the sentence into effect. We are not called on to consider the right of the court, at the term at which the conviction was had, to reconsider or modify its own order. In this case it was attempted to hang a sentence of ninety days' imprisonment over the head of the defendant, to be executed at such time as the prosecuting attorney of Ford county or the judge of the court might see fit. This would leave the defendant in a very uncertain situation. He would be unable to tell for an indefinite period whether he was a free man or a convict; and while the sentence in terms might be for but ninety days' imprisonment, it would be in effect far more severe, because of the uncertainty as to the time of its execution. Such a sentence is wholly unauthorized by law. The commitment issued thereon is illegal, and does not justify the imprisonment of the petitioner. He will be discharged."

The facts in the case of Tuttle v. Lang, supra, are stated by the supreme court of Maine as follows: "The petitioner was arrested and brought before the Skowhegan municipal court, charged with the offense of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. Before pleading to the complaint the petitioner, the prosecuting complainant, and the judge came to an agreement by which the petitioner should plead guilty and be sentenced to a fine, costs, and imprisonment, but that no mittimus in execution of the sentence should issue until the petitioner should again be guilty of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors. The petitioner thereupon pleaded guilty, sentence of fine, costs, and imprisonment was imposed, a memorandum of the agreement was noted on the judge's docket, and the petitioner was released from arrest and allowed to go without day, without payment of fine and costs, and without imprisonment. No mittimus or other precept in execution of the sentence was issued, or even prepared." After the expiration of nearly two years the judge, being of the opinion that the petitioner was again unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors, issued commitment on the previous sentence, delivering it to the sheriff, who took the prisoner into custody and committed him to jail. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus, and the supreme court of Maine on these facts held: "If, after conviction and sentence, any court, whether of general or limited jurisdiction, permits the convict to go at large without day, it can never thereafter issue a mittimus for his commitment. In such case, having completed its judicial functions, it has voluntarily surrendered all further control over the case and person."

The case of Re Markuson, supra, was one where on June 29, 1895, the petitioner was convicted of a contempt of court in violating the terms of an injunction order. The syllabus in the case sufficiently states the facts and the judgment to show the holding, and is as follows: "On June 29, 1895, petitioner was convicted of a criminal contempt of court, and judgment was entered of record against him in substance as follows: 'That petitioner be imprisoned in the county jail of Barnes county for a period of ninety days, commencing with to-day at noon; that he pay a fine of $200, and, if default be made in the payment of the fine, he shall be imprisoned as many days as $2 is contained in $200,—or 100 days.' Immediately after said judgment was entered, the court, of its own motion, made certain orders in the case, which were entered of record, to the effect: First, that in case an appeal was taken the time should commence to run from the date of the remittitur being filed in the district court; second, that the judgment be suspended thirty days, unconditionally, to facilitate an appeal to the supreme court; third, the court ordered that the bail bond given to secure the petitioner's attendance from day to day during the trial in the district court be and remain valid and binding upon the petitioner, and that petitioner was ordered to obey the further orders of the district court, whether made by that court, or made to conform to orders of the supreme court. Held, that the time of said imprisonment began to run at noon on June 29, 1895, and that the several orders purporting to suspend or postpone the operation of the judgment were without authority of law, and null and void."

In the consideration of the case the court recognizes the general rule, supported by practically all of the authorities, that, where not controlled by statute, the date for the beginning of the service of the term of imprisonment is not fixed in the sentence, its time will commence to run, when not legally stayed, on the day of sentence. See 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 2d ed. p. 303, note 2. And this, in our judgment, is rendered certain in this state by the terms of our statute (Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. [Okla.] 1903, § 5583), which provides that upon the judgment "the defendant must forthwith be committed to the custody of the proper officer, and by him detained until the judgment be complied with." The court in the case last cited, held that the sentence "began its operation when it was pronounced, and continued to be in full force from that day until it ceased to operate by its own terms."

The reasoning of the supreme court of Nevada in the case of State v. Murphy, supra, is peculiarly applicable to the case at bar, in view of the fact that their statute is practically the same as our own. This was a case where Murphy had been convicted of selling whisky to an Indian, and a judgment of imprisonment for a term of two years was pronounced against him therefor. Thereupon Murphy, expressing his intention of taking an appeal, moved the court for a stay of execution and to admit him to bail. The court granted a stay of execution of judgment for 10 days, and ordered that he be admitted to bail in the sum of $3,000. Bond was given in accordance therewith, and Murphy was released from custody. He did not appeal, and, on suit being brought on the bond, it was contended on the part of the principal and his sureties that the bond was void, because the court had no authority or jurisdiction to make an order staying execution of judgment. In the consideration of this case the court says: "The contention is that the trial court had no authority to make an order staying the execution of a judgment of imprisonment, and no authority to release or order the release of a defendant, under recognizance or otherwise, after judgment of imprisonment had been rendered against him, except after an appeal therefrom had been taken, and therefore any recognizance given for that purpose and at such time is void. This contention also involves a construction of our criminal practice act, and must be sustained. Section 451 of the criminal practice act provides that, 'when a judgment has been pronounced, a certified copy of the entry thereof in the minutes shall be forthwith furnished the officer whose duty it is to execute the judgment, and no other warrant or authority is necessary to justify or require the execution thereof, except when judgment of death is rendered.' Gen. Stat. 1885, § 4331. Section 453 of the same act expressly provides that, if the judgment be imprisonment, the defendant shall forthwith be committed to the custody of the proper officer, and by him detained until the judgment be complied with. Gen. Stat. 1885, § 4333. We are unable to find any other provisions of the law bearing directly upon the time and manner of enforcing the judgment of the district court in cases of this character, or in any manner modifying the same, excepting such provisions as direct the enforcement of such judgment by order of the appellate court on appeal. No discretion is reposed in the district court as to the time its judgment shall become operative and enforceable, and any order thereof in contravention of the direct provisions of the statute above cited is without authority and void, and the release of the defendant, with or without bond, pursuant to such order, is unwarranted, and any bond, recognizance, or bail given for such release for the purpose of such order is without authority and void. . . . In the case at bar the complaint avers that the defendant was released from custody upon the execution and acceptance of the bail bond. The court had no right, no authority, and no power to order a stay of execution or the judgment of imprisonment for any length of time; nor had it any authority to release the defendant from custody, under bail, until he had appealed." The practical identity of the statutes construed in the foregoing case with our own renders the foregoing decision particularly valuable.

One of the cases, recognized in many of the authorities cited as a leading one on the proposition here involved, is State v. Voss, 80 Iowa, 467, 8 L.R.A. 767, 45 N. W. 898, decided by the Iowa supreme court. A number of defendants involved in that case were enjoined from unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors. They violated the terms of the injunction, and, upon the hearing, the court found them guilty and adjudged punishment therefor by imprisonment and fine of $500, and an order was made that they stand committed to the county jail unless the fine and costs were sooner paid. The judgment contained a further condition in this language: "The execution of this judgment is to be suspended during the pleasure of the court; but whenever the court, or one of the judges thereof, so directs, execution and warrant of commitment are to issue." The case was taken to the supreme court by certiorari, and it was contended that the order of the court suspending judgment was void; and the court, through Mr. Justice Beck, in the consideration of this matter, said: "The case is this: We find a judgment for a fine against defendant, which can only be enforced at the pleasure of the court. The judgment is thus suspended, and the state is defeated of the remedy provided by law, upon the exercise of the pleasure of the district court. If the power to do this exists in a case of contempt, it must exist in all cases punishable by fine and imprisonment. The law is no respecter of persons. One violator of law possesses no rights or immunities not held by another. It follows, then, that all fines and penalties prescribed by law may be collected only when it accords with the pleasure of the court in which judgment is rendered therefor. The claim of the validity of the condition of the judgment leads to the most absurd results. It is hardly necessary to say that it is based upon no statute."

The case of Re Webb, 89 Wis. 354, 27 L.R.A. 356, 46 Am. St. Rep. 846, '62 N. W. 177, from the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin, was one where the petitioner was convicted of the crime of adultery on the 16th of March, 1894, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $200 and to be committed to the common jail for six months. The defendant paid the costs of the prosecution, and the court directed "that the sentence of imprisonment be suspended until the further order of the court." After the expiration of that term, and after six months had expired, the court ordered that the defendant be required to fully comply with the sentence in payment of the fine imposed, and committing him until the same was paid, for a period not longer than six months, in accordance with his previous sentence. An original writ of habeas corpus was sued out in the supreme court of that state, and, in the consideration of that case, Justice Pinney, in holding that the judgment of the court committing the relator to jail under the conditions mentioned was void, said: "The sole power is vested in the governor 'to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons after conviction, for all offenses except treason and cases of impeachment, upon such conditions and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper.' Const. art. 5, § 6. And the action of the court in the premises, after it had regularly pronounced the punishment provided by law for the offense in question, is clearly obnoxious to the objection that it is an attempted exercise of power not judicial, but vested in the executive. When the sentence was pronounced the defendant was in custody; and it became eo instante his duty to pay his fine; and for failure to do so the term of his imprisonment at once began. It had fully expired before the order of October 12, 1894, was made, under which he has been committed and is now held in confinement. The sentence had been in part complied with, and the attempted withdrawal indefinitely of the remainder was, we think, without legal warrant and void." The syllabus of the case is as follows: After sentence has been pronounced in a criminal case the court cannot, as a matter of leniency to the defendant, suspend indefinitely its execution. A defendant was sentenced to pay a fine and the costs, and to stand committed to jail until payment, the period of imprisonment being limited to six months; and the court directed that, if the costs were paid at once, the sentence of imprisonment be suspended until further order. The defendant paid the costs accordingly, but failed to pay the fine. Held, that an order, made more than six months later, that defendant pay the fine and stand committed to jail until payment in accordance with said sentence, was without authority."

Section 143 of Bunn's Constitution of Oklahoma (Const. art. 6, § 10) provides: "The governor shall have power to grant, after conviction, reprieves, commutations, parols, and pardons for all offenses, except cases of impeachment, upon such conditions and with such restrictions and limitations as he may deem proper, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law. He shall communicate to the legislature, at each regular session, each case of reprieve, commutation, parole, or pardon granted, stating the name of the convict, the crime of which he was convicted, the date and place of conviction, and the date of commutation, pardon, parole, or reprieve." The statutes of Oklahoma relating to the enforcement of judgments in criminal cases are contained in volume 2 of Wilson's Revised and Annotated Statutes of Oklahoma of 1903, at chapter 68, and are as follows:

"Sec. 5581 (§ 445). When a judgment, except of death, has been pronounced, a certified copy of the entry thereof, upon the minutes, must be forthwith furnished to the officer whose duty it is to execute the judgment, and no other warrant or authority is necessary to justify or require its execution."

"Sec. 5583 (§ 447). If the judgment be imprisonment or a fine and imprisonment, until such fine be paid, the defendant must forthwith be committed to the custody of the proper officer, and by him detained until the judgment be complied with."

From the foregoing provisions of the Constitution, it will be observed that no one within the state is given power to reprieve, commute parole, or pardon an offender with the exception of the governor, and it will be further observed that, when judgment has been pronounced, a certified copy of the entry thereof must be forthwith furnished the officer whose duty it is to execute it; and, where the judgment is imprisonment, the defendant must forthwith by such officer be committed and detained under the execution. There is no latitude allowable under these provisions. They embody the plain, unambiguous letter of the law. Under such statutes, where the execution is not stayed by proper proceedings to reverse, vacate, or modify, service of sentence under a judgment of imprisonment begins on the day on which it is rendered, and continues until fully executed according to law. Nor can there be any doubt of the salutary character of this law. Speedy and certain punishment, following the infraction of a law, best meets its ends and purposes, and leniency, through delay, toward an offender, seldom works kindness to him or safety to the public; but where circumstances do arise which render the sentence or operation of the law unduly harsh or cruel, and, by reason of its universality, the operation of the law is thought to work ill in particular cases, the power is vested in the governor to reprieve, commute, parole, or pardon, except in certain cases; but he, in the exercise of this right and duty, is hedged around by the provision that he must report his doings thereunder to the legislature. Such power is not vested in a court, and it is as much within the law as the poorest defendant who appears before it for sentence. Statutes provide penalties for the infraction of law, and, where incurred, they are not subject to enforcement on the whim, caprice, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or discretion of the court; and if a court undertakes to do so, it would lead ultimately, as is stated by the supreme court of Iowa, to the most absurd results.

Let us look at the facts in this case, and see if this is not true. Our Constitution provides that one who is guilty of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors "shall be punished, on conviction thereof, by fine not less than $50 and by imprisonment not less than thirty days for each offense." In the case at bar, the defendant, being charged with the violation of this law, in the first case entered his plea of guilty, and the court assessed the minimum fine and imprisonment thereunder, and then, instead of incarcerating him in accordance with the plain terms of the law, deliberately accepted the fine and costs and permitted him to go during good behavior. What do we now find? But a trifle more than a month had elapsed when the same defendant is again before the same court, charged with the same offense, and entered the same plea. Again the court assessed a fine and the imprisonment required under the law, and once more solemnly entered an order releasing the defendant during good behavior. Were such a course permitted to trial courts, and did it receive the sanction of this court, it would make the enforcement of the law a mere farce, bring all courts in disrepute, and consummate the results noted. Such enforcement would result in licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors by the payment of fines at stated intervals. This course we cannot sanction. The Constitution will not permit it, and the statute plainly prohibits it. The execution should have issued for the imprisonment of this defendant on the day of his conviction. His incarceration should have taken place under it. That it did not is to be regretted; but the court has no power or jurisdiction after the expiration of the time of the sentence and of the term of court when rendered to call it back and issue a commitment thereunder. We fully concur in the sentiments expressed by Chief Justice Wallin of the supreme court of North Dakota in the case of Re Markuson, supra, where he says: "It is an unpleasant duty to enter an order discharging the petitioner from custody, in view of the fact that he was convicted by a competent court, and has not actually suffered the punishment indicated in the final judgment of that court. But our duty is plain, and we may not shrink from its performance."

While in this instance, if we had the power to sanction the execution of the belated commitment, which we have not, it would result in the punishment of one guilty man, yet the conclusion which the law compels will doubtless prevent the escape from punishment of many guilty men in the future; but, whatever the result, it is the law, and the petitioner will be discharged.

All the Justices concur except Williams Ch. J., who dissents.

Case Note. — Right of private person to exhibit criminal information in court of record.

The instigation of criminal proceedings in courts of record in the United States is by one of two methods: By an indictment by a grand jury, or on presentment of an information by a prosecuting officer; and in some jurisdictions the two methods are concurrent. An information is, in reality, an indictment or formal accusation by a prosecuting officer without the intervention of a grand jury. Although there are few decisions upon the right of a private person to begin a criminal prosecution by means of such an information, the cases are in accord that a proceeding so instituted is wholly invalid.

In Ex parte Thomas, 10 Mo. App. 24, the Missouri appellate court holds that the St. Louis court of criminal correction has no jurisdiction to prosecute for a minor offense upon an information filed by a private person. Speaking of the indictment and information as concurrent remedies, the court says: "We have no doubt that the constitutional restriction to the information, as an alternative with the indictment, in prosecutions for minor offenses, was intended to import into our criminal jurisprudence all the cautionary implications against reckless or ill-advised accusations that attached to the information under the common law and early British statutes. It must come from the state, in its sovereign capacity, through an officer or court authorized to speak in that behalf." 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) valid, and not capable of being amended; the county court did not acquire any jurisdiction of such action or prosecution.

Prohibition — when proper — criminal prosecution.

3. Upon an information purporting to have been presented by a private person, neither the prosecuting attorney for the county nor any other officer thereto authorized having exhibited same, the lower court having no jurisdiction to hear or determine such case on said information, and there being no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law for the relator, relator's remedy is by a writ of prohibition to restrain action thereon.

(September 25, 1908.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to restrain defendant from pronouncing sentence upon relator, who had been convicted of assault and battery. Writ awarded.

Statement by Williams, Ch. J.:

On the 24th day of July, A. D. 1908, a petition was filed in this court by the relator, Sam Evans, against the respondent, W. T. Willis, wherein it was alleged that, on the 22d day of July, A. D. 1908, there was filed

While this note is limited to prosecutions in courts of record, the Missouri cases on the subject have been included, even though the question arose in criminal actions instituted in justices' courts, because the Constitution in that state provides for the prosecution of all offenses by either indictment or information. So, in harmony with the holdings on this point where the jurisdiction of a court of record is in question, we find that a criminal information presented by a private person in a justice's court in Missouri will not support a prosecution for crime. State v. Kelm, 79 Mo. 515; State v. Anderson, 84 Mo. 524; State v. Thompson, 81 Mo. 163. See also State v. Boogher, 8 Mo. App. 600.

It was held in State v. Brown, 63 Kan. 262, 65 Pac. 213, that a district court had no power to authorize a private citizen to sign and file an information for the prosecution of persons who had violated the liquor law; and that their conviction was without warrant of law and should be set aside.

Upon the authority of State v. Kelm, supra, it has been held in Missouri that an affidavit of a private individual is not an information, within the meaning of the constitutional provision which says that all other offenses except felonies shall be prosecuted by indictment or information as concurrent remedies. State v. Sebecca, 76 Mo. 55; State v. Shortell, 93 Mo. 123, 5 S. W. 691; State v. Huddleston, 75 Mo. 667; State v. Rockwell, 18 Mo. App. 395; and see Jackson v. State, 4 Kan. 150.

in the county court of Lincoln county a pretended criminal information, charging relator with the crime of assault and battery; that on said date he was placed on trial in said court by said respondent as judge of said court, before a jury on said charge under said information, the body of which is in words and figures as follows:

State of Oklahoma, } ss.
Lincoln County. }

State of Oklahoma, Plaintiff,
v.

Sam Evans,
Defendant.

Information.

In the county court of Lincoln county, state of Oklahoma, on the 24th day of June, 1908, in the name and by the authority of the state of Oklahoma comes Lee Mathey-er of the said county of Lincoln and gives the court to know and be informed that Sam Evans late of the aforesaid county, on the 24th day of June, 1908, in the county of Lincoln and state of Oklahoma then and there being did then and there wilfully, unlawfully, and with force and violence commit an assault and battery upon one Duncan Chishom by kicking the said Duncan Chishom forcibly and violently on the body of him, the said Duncan Chishom, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Oklahoma.

[Signed] Lee Matheyer.

Said information was duly sworn to before the respondent, as acting county judge of said county, by said Lee Matheyer. Upon the back was indorsed the style of the cause and file mark, under date of the 22d day of July, 1908, and a list of the witnesses of the state. That on the same date, prior to the trial, relator filed a motion to quash the information and the warrant issued thereon, for the reason that the same had been filed by one Lee Matheyer, who is neither the county attorney of said county, nor the deputy, nor assistant county attorney, nor the attorney general of the state, nor anyone authorized by the attorney general, nor anyone in authority; and for the further reason that said information was not drawn, presented, or filed by anyone acting in behalf of, or on the part of, the state of Oklahoma or the county of Lincoln, but was in fact carried on by a private prosecutor. It is further alleged that, notwithstanding the illegality of said proceedings, and the want of legal information or charge, relator was compelled to go to trial, and, on the 22d day of July, 1908, was found guilty of the alleged offense by a jury in said county court; that said trial and all proceedings had under and by virtue of said pretended information were and are null and void, for the reason that the court never acquired jurisdiction over the person of the relator or the subject-matter of the controversy. Relator further alleges that the presiding judge of said court would, unless restrained, pronounce a sentence on said relator; that relator's remedy by appeal, or by any other procedure except by writ of prohibition, was inadequate. On the 24th day of July, A. D. 1908, a preliminary writ of prohibition was issued out of this court. On the 28th day of August, A. D. 1908, respondent filed his return to said writ, wherein he alleged that relator was not illegally restrained of his liberty, as on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1908, a complaint was made to John J. Davis, county attorney of Lincoln county, Oklahoma, and he was informed by some five different persons that Sam Evans had committed a brutal assault and battery upon one Duncan Chishom, on the 24th day of June, A. D. 1908, in the city of Chandler, Lincoln county, Oklahoma, and stated to the county attorney that they had some 15 or 20 witnesses who saw the relator's brutal conduct in kicking and maltreating the said Chishom, and the county attorney refused to prosecute, or to O. K. a complaint against the relator, rendering as his excuse that said relator was a friend of his, and a good man to keep him posted on whisky cases, and absolutely refused to start the matter and have an information or complaint filed. Thereupon several of the citizens, knowing of the brutal action of the relator, made a bond, as required by the statutes of the state of Oklahoma, and verified it, to pay the costs of the prosecution, and one Lee Matheyer went before the county judge of Lincoln county, Oklahoma, and swore positively to a complaint and information, after said bond had been given. Thereupon a warrant was issued in due form, and delivered to the sheriff of said county on the 1st day of July, 1908, who executed same by arresting said relator, who was brought before the county court, and, the county judge being disqualified, and the counsel representing the prosecution and the defendant not being able to agree upon a judge pro tem., the said W. T. Willis was elected, in accordance with § 3306, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, as judge pro tem. to try said cause. Thereupon the cause proceeded to trial before a jury of six men, selected as provided by law. The evidence having been introduced both by the state and the defendant, and the jury instructed as to the law, and having heard the argument of counsel for both sides, the cause was submitted to the jury for their consideration. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against the defendant, and, a motion for a new trial having been filed by defendant, the matter was set down later to hear said motion. Thereupon the preliminary writ herein was served upon the respondent.

Messrs. Hoffman & Robertson and Rittenhouse & Rittenhouse for relator.
Mr. W. C. Reeves for respondent.

Williams, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the contention of the relator that the county court of Lincoln county has no jurisdiction to try him upon the information in this case. The county court is a court of record (Const. § 11, art. 7 [Bunn's ed. § 181]). It has, concurrent with the district court, appellate jurisdiction of judgments of justices of the peace and police judges in all criminal matters, and, concurrent with justices of the peace, jurisdiction in misdemeanor cases, and exclusive jurisdiction in all misdemeanor cases of which justices of the peace have no jurisdiction; and, in criminal cases appealed from justices of the peace and police judges, there shall be a trial de novo on both questions of law and fact. Section 3. "An act to define the jurisdiction and duties of the county court," etc. Sess. Laws 1907-08, p. 285, chap. 27; Const. § 12, art. 7 (Bunn's ed. § 183). Section 17, art. 2 (Bunn's ed. § 26) Okla. Const., provides that "no person shall be prosecuted criminally in courts of record for felony or misdemeanor, otherwise than by presentment or indictment or by information. No person shall be prosecuted for a felony by information without having had a preliminary examination before an examining magistrate or having waived such preliminary examination. Prosecutions may be instituted in courts not of record upon a duly verified complaint." The question arises, however, as to whether or not any person, other than the county attorney, or someone acting for him, could file this information. An information would lie at common law for all misdemeanors, but not for a felony, it having been the policy under such law that no person should be put on trial for a capital offense, or any other crime known or understood as an offense, under said law occasioning a total forfeiture of the offender's lands or goods, or both. This is the line of demarcation by which we are to determine whether or not at common law an offense was a felony or a misdemeanor. 4 Bl. Com. 94, 95, 310. At common law an information is defined to be a complaint or accusation exhibited against a person for some criminal offense committed immediately against the King, or against a private person; an indictment being an accusation preferred by the oath of 12 men, and an information is only the allegation of the officer who exhibits it. 3 Bacon. Abr. 635, title "information." According to Mr. Bacon, there are two kinds of criminal information under the common-law procedure in England, the first being an offense immediately against the King, and was filed by the Attorney General ex officio, and without leave of court. The second was against private individuals, and exhibited by the masters of the Crown. Information of this character were filed as a matter of course prior to the adoption of Stat. 4 & 5 William and Mary, chap. 18; but thereafter such information could not be filed by the masters of the Crown except upon leave of the court, and then to be supported by the affidavit of the person at whose instance the same was filed, such person being required to give security for co-ts. 3 Bacon. Abr. 635. Section 4200, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, provides: "The common law, as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions, and the conditions and wants of the people, shall remain in force in aid of the General Statutes of Oklahoma; but the rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof shall be strictly construed, shall not be applicable to any general statute of Oklahoma; but all such statutes shall be liberally construed, to promote their object." Mr. Chitty says (1 Crim. Law, 844): "Informations may be filed by the Attorney General for any offense below the dignity of felony which tends, in his opinion, to disturb the government, or immediately to interfere with the interests of the public, or the safety of the Crown. He most frequently exercises this power in cases of libels on government or high officers of the Crown. . . . It seems, indeed, at his option to exert it when any offense occurs which may thus be prosecuted in the Crown office. . . . The Attorney General is the sole judge of what public misdemeanors he will prosecute. He may file an information against anyone whom he thinks proper to select, without oath, without motion, or opportunity for the defendant to show cause against the proceeding."

It appears to have been the common and usual practice, sustained by numerous precedents, for informations to be exhibited, whether in the name of the King's Attorney General, or of the master of the Crown office, for batteries, cheats, seducing a young man or woman from their parents in order to marry them against their consent, or for other wicked purposes, spiriting away a child, rescuing persons from legal arrest, perjuries, subornation of perjuries, forgery, conspiracies, and other like crimes done principally to a private person, as well as for offenses done principally to the King, and, in general, or any other offenses against the public good, or against the first and obvious principles of justice and common honesty. 3 Bacon, Abr. title "Information;" 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 26, § 1; Cole, Criminal Information, p. 9; Comyn's Dig. title "Information;" Archbold, Crim. Pl. & Ev. 69. Mr. Cole, in his work on Criminal Information, pp. 9, 10, states: "In cases of misdemeanor the law has intrusted the Attorney General, on behalf of the Crown, with a discretionary power of filing informations; and for that reason the court of Queen's bench will never give leave to the Attorney General, on behalf of the Crown, to exhibit a criminal information. He has the right to exhibit one ex officio, on his own responsibility and discretion. . . . But, although the Attorney General may, if he think fit, exhibit a criminal information ex officio, for any misdemeanor whatever, yet in practice he seldom does so, except when directed [to do so] by the House of Lords, or the House of Commons, . . . or where the case is of a very serious nature. The usual objects of an ex officio information are properly such enormous misdemeanors as peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger the Queen's government, or affront her in the regular discharge of her royal functions." 46 Law Library, 29, 30. In the case of State v. Gleason, 32 Kan. 250, 4 Pac. 366, the court said: "At common law an information might be filed, under the English practice, against persons charged with misdemeanors, yet no rule was granted in regard to such cases except upon such evidence as would, uncontradicted, make out the offense beyond a doubt. Archbold, Crim. Pl. & Ev. 176; R. v. Willett, 6 T. R. 294; R. v. Williamson, 3 Barn. & Ald. 582; R. v. Bull, 1 Wils. 93; R. v. Hilbers, 2 Chitty, 163; R. v. Baldwin, 8 Ad. & El. 168; Ex parte Williams, 5 Jur. 1133, cited in 1 Harr. Dig. 2268; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 856, 857."

There appears to be some conflict of authority as to whether or not the second class of informations have been adopted in this country. State v. Gleason, 32 Kan. 245, 4 Pac. 363; Bishop, Crim. Proc. 144, 604, 606; State v. Moore, 19 Ala. 514; Wharton Crim. Pl. & Pr. 8th ed. 87. In the case of State v. Kelm, 79 Mo. 515, it is said: "In our states the criminal information should be deemed to be such, and such only, as in England is presented by the Attorney or the Solicitor General. This part of the English common law has plainly become common law with us. And, as with us, the powers which in England are exercised by the Attorney General and Solicitor General are largely distributed among our district attorneys, whose office does not exist in England, the latter officers would seem to be entitled, under our common law, to prosecute by information as a right adhering to their office, and without leave of court." In the case of State v. Moore, 19 Ala. 519, the court said: "In England informations lay against persons for misdemeanors, and were in those cases criminal proceedings. The practice of filing them existed at the common law, and may be traced to the earliest periods. Informations for offenses more immediately affecting the King, his ministers, or the state, were filed ex officio by the Attorney General while those in which a private individual was virtually the prosecutor were placed on record by the King's coroner or master of the Crown office. Each of these officers had, and the Attorney General still has, the power of thus accusing the subject at his discretion. But the Stat. 4 & 5 William and Mary, chap. 18, reduced the coroner to a mere ministerial officer, and the informations exhibited by him in the Crown office were subjected entirely to the court of the King's bench. Criminal informations at this day (in England) are of two kinds: Those fixed ex officio by the Attorney General, at his sole discretion, and those prosecuted by the coroner or master of the Crown office, by leave of the court according to the statute. Chitty's Crim. Law, 843-845, where the authorities are cited. . . . Stat. 4 & 5 William and Mary is not in force in this state, and we have none like it that can possibly affect this case; consequently the discretion of the state to proceed, or not to proceed, for the forfeiture, is not placed in the hands of any of our courts, and it has already appeared that they cannot derive it from the common law. The scire facias to repeal the King's letters patent, for any cause of forfeiture that may have occurred, is analogous to the case before us. In that case, also there was a discretion to claim or to waive the forfeiture. In such cases, 'previously to suing out the writ, a petition or memorial must be presented to his Majesty, and a warrant obtained thereon to the Attorney General, upon which he will grant his fiat for suing it out; but it is said that, when a patent is granted to the prejudice of a subject, the King of right is to permit, upon petition, to use his name for the repeal of it.' 2 Tidd, Pr. 1094. The case before us, however, is one not affecting the rights of any particular individual. It is clear that the state here is the source of all such franchises, to be granted or withheld by the legislature at its discretion. But if, under our law, a forfeiture must be exacted for every act done or omitted which, in strictness, is a cause of forfeiture, then our law is obviously defective; and it is not only defective, but wrong, if this high discretion may be exercised by persons who, with regard to it, are not the representatives of the state. The language of the act plainly shows that the legislature did not intend to confide this discretion to the solicitors; but, on the contrary, it was the manifest intention to withhold it from them. They were to act 'at the instance of the state,' which excludes the idea of their acting upon their own will or discretion." Clark, in his Criminal Procedure, page 128, says: "Under the common law of England, informations were of two kinds. The first was filed by the Attorney General, as a rule, for offenses more immediately against the King, or the public safety; but such an information could be filed by him for any other misdemeanor, though an offense more particularly against an individual. The second was filed by the masters of the Crown office, and it was the usual mode or proceeding by information for offenses against individuals. Formerly both of these informations could be filed without leave of court, and without further oath or affidavit than the oath of office of the officer preferring it. By an early English statute, however, which is old enough to have become a part of our common law, if applicable to our conditions, it was provided that informations by masters of the Crown office could only be filed by leave of court, and that they should be supported by the affidavit of the person at whose suit they were preferred. The law remained that informations filed by the Attorney General (and, as already stated, he could file them for any misdemeanor) need not be verified, and that he was the sole judge of the necessity or propriety of filing them. Leave of court was not necessary. Nor was the accused entitled to opportunity to show cause against the proceeding. The Attorney General usually acted on affidavits of witnesses laid before him, but this was not necessary. There is some authority for the proposition that the kind of information to be used at common law in this country is that which in England was filed by the masters of the Crown office, and that this is the kind contemplated by statutes which show no intention to the contrary; and if this is so, leave of the court and affidavit would be necessary. But, by the better opinion, the other kind of information is the one in use with us. 'In our states the criminal information should be deemed to be such, and such only, as in England is presented by the Attorney or Solicitor General. This part of the English common law has plainly become common law with us. As, with us, the powers which in England were exercised by the Attorney or Solicitor General are largely distributed among our district attorneys, whose office does not exist in England, the latter officers would seem to be entitled, under our common law, to prosecute by information, as a right adhering to their office, and without leave of court.'"

In this state it is made the duty of the county attorney, and not the attorney general, to appear in the district courts of their respective counties and defend on behalf of the state or his county all actions or proceedings, civil or criminal, in which the state is interested or a party; and, whenever the venue is changed in any criminal case, or in any civil action or proceeding in which his county or the state is interested or a party, it is the duty of the county attorney of the county where such indictment is found, or the county interested in such civil action or proceeding, to appear and prosecute such indictment, and to prosecute or defend such civil action or proceeding in the county to which the same may be changed. Wilson, Rev. & Anno. Stat. (Okla.) 1903, § 1289. And whenever there shall be no county attorney for the county, or when the county attorney shall be absent from the court, or unable to attend to his duties, the district court may, if it deems it necessary, appoint, by an order entered on the minutes of the court, some suitable person to perform for the time being the duties required by law to be performed by the county attorney; and the person so appointed shall thereupon be vested with all the powers of such county attorney for that purpose. Id. § 1293. Const. § 17, art. 2 (Bunn's ed. § 26), supra, providing that "no person shall be prosecuted criminally in courts of record for felony or misdemeanor, otherwise than by presentment or indictment or by information," enabling a felony to be prosecuted by information, which, under the common law, could only be prosecuted by indictment, did not extend the rule so that a person could be put on trial in a court of record for a felony on information verified and exhibited only by a private prosecutor. To hold that in courts of record such prosecutions for misdemeanor could be maintained by such an information would establish two rules of practice in such courts for exhibiting informations,—one for misdemeanors and another for felonies. When the same officer prosecutes for the state in all such cases, such practice is not presumed to have been intended by the framers of the Constitution.

At common law an information exhibited by the Attorney General or Solicitor General was not required to be verified. It is not necessary to determine whether or not article 4 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, providing that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized," changes the common-law rule as to information in this country, for § 5306, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, provides that "the county attorney shall subscribe his name to informations filed in the probate or district court, and indorse thereon the names of the witnesses known to him at the time of filing the same. He shall also indorse thereon the names of such other witnesses as may afterward become known to him, at such time before the trial as the court may by rule prescribe," and that such information should be verified "by the oath of the prosecuting attorney, complainant, or some other person," it being provided that when the information in any case is verified by the county attorney, it shall be sufficient if the verification be upon information or belief. This section enlarges the common-law rule. Prosecutions originally cognizable in courts of justices of the peace need not be begun by such an information. Const. art. 2, § 17 (Bunn's ed. § 26). But when exhibited in such justice court by any other person than by the county attorney, or his assistant or deputy, or some other person authorized by law, the justice of the peace may require of such private prosecutor a bond for the costs of such prosecution. Const. art. 7, § 18 (Bunn's ed. § 190); Wilson, Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, §§ 5305, 5306, 5307. The provision being made that criminal offenses, including both felony and misdemeanor, may be originally prosecuted by information in courts of record, and in courts not of record, which includes only misdemeanors, by complaint, an information is clearly distinguished from a complaint. An information exhibited under the common law, by leave of the court, by a private prosecutor, is, in effect, merely a complaint as termed in our Constitution.

Hence, since the adoption of our state Constitution, no person can be prosecuted criminally in any court of record in this state for felony or misdemeanor other than by presentment of an indictment by a grand jury, or by information exhibited by the county attorney or other officer authorized by law. The information filed in this case by the private prosecutor, who was neither the county attorney nor any officer authorized by law, was void.

The next question arises as to whether or not the writ of prohibition herein sought is the proper remedy. Such writ will not be issued on account of errors or irregularities in the proceedings of a court having jurisdiction, or on account of insufficiency of averment or pleading, or upon matters of defense which may be properly raised in the lower court. Ex parte Branch, 63 Ala. 383; Epperson v. Rice, 102 Ala. 668, 15 So. 434; Clark v. Superior Ct. 55 Cal. 199; 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1126, and authorities cited in footnotes 2-4. The better rule appears to be that the writ will be issued where the lower court appears to be without jurisdiction upon the record and admitted facts. 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 1128, and authorities cited in footnotes 1 and 2. Such extraordinary writ will not be awarded when the ordinary and usual remedies provided by law, such as appeal, writ of error, certiorari, or other modes of review or injunction, are available. There is no general rule by which the adequacy or inadequacy of a remedy can be ascertained, but the question is one to be determined upon the facts of each particular case. The writ will not be issued on account of the inconvenience, expense, or delay of other remedies, but will be granted where the remedy available is insufficient to prevent immediate injury or hardship to the party complaining, particularly in criminal cases. 16 Enc. It appearing as a matter of record that the information exhibited in the court below was by a private prosecutor, and it being admitted in the answer of the respondent that the county attorney had refused to file an information against the relator, and no other officer authorized by law having filed such information, the county court is without jurisdiction to try said cause. If judgment is pronounced against the relator upon the verdict of the jury, it might result in his being incarcerated in jail pending an appeal. An appeal in such an instance would not be such an adequate and speedy remedy as to prevent immediate injury or hardship to the relator. When it appears to the court having jurisdiction to issue the writ of prohibition that the lower court, under any conditions, is without jurisdiction to try the accused upon the alleged information filed, with all amendments permitted under the law considered as made, to require him to invoke the remedy of appeal, occasioning delay and necessitating a supersedeas bond, or resulting in his being confined in jail pending the determination of his appeal, when the same conclusion as to the lower court being without jurisdiction will be reached, would work an unnecessary and unreasonable hardship upon the accused.

The writ of prohibition is awarded.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

INTERNATIONAL LAND COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

JOSEPH MARSHALL by Next Friend.

(— Okla. —, 98 Pac. 951.)

Equity — clean hands.

1. Equity will refuse to lend its aid in any manner to one seeking its active interposition who has been guilty of any unlawful or inequitable conduct in the matter with relation to which he seeks relief.

Infant — conveyance — false statement of age — cancellation of deed.

2. Where a party fraudulently represents that he is over twenty-one years of age, when in fact he is only nineteen years of age, and such false and fraudulent representations, in connection with his appearance and size, being believed, by means of a deed then and there executed and delivered by him, he, on account of such fraudulent representations, obtains the sum of $125 as a part of the consideration therefor, such party grantor, whilst in possession of the land described in such deed, will not be permitted to invoke the aid of equity to have such deed canceled, although it may be absolutely void, without offering to refund the amount of money so fraudulently obtained.

Headnotes by WILLIAMS, Ch. J.

Note. — The question as to the estoppel of an infant by false representations as to his age is treated in a note to Lowery v. Cate, 57 L.R.A. 684, which is supplemented by a case note to Commander v. Brazile, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1117. See also Tobin v. Spann, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 672, on the same subject.

Same — knowledge of fraud.

3. Although the injured party may have had prior notice that such party was under age, yet, if he believed such false representations, which were fraudulently and intentionally made by such party grantor, and, relying thereon, parted with a consideration as result thereof, such party grantor, although the other party may not have exercised reasonable care, will be refused the aid of equity to cancel such deed, though it may be absolutely void, unless he offers to refund the amount of money thus wrongfully obtained.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the United States Court for the Western District of the Indian Territory in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to compel the reconveyance to plaintiff of certain lands. Reversed.

Statement by WILLIAMS, Ch. J.:

On the 29th day of December, A. D. 1905, the appellee, a minor, by his next friend, Jeff Marshall, as plaintiff, instituted this action in the United States court for the western district of Indian territory, at Muskogee, against the appellant, as defendant, alleging in his complaint that the said plaintiff was a minor under the age of twenty-one years, and brought said action by and through his father and next friend, Jeff Marshall; that on or about the 26th day of December, A. D. 1905, he was a minor, being eighteen years of age, and a citizen of the Creek Nation, and as such there was allotted and patented to him certain described real estate; that on said date the said plaintiff endeavored to borrow some money from the defendant, through C. M. Bradley, its president, and offered to give a mortgage on 40 acres of said land as security therefor, and the defendant, through its said president, informed said plaintiff that it would let him have $125, and would take a deed to 40 acres of said land, with the understanding that plaintiff should have the privilege of returning said money, and the defendant would reconvey said land to him; that thereupon the said plaintiff accepted said proposition, and executed what was thought to be a deed, conveying 40 acres of said land, and delivered same to the president of said defendant company, and that the said defendant paid to said plaintiff the said sum of $125; that soon after plaintiff received said sum of money and executed said deed to the defendant, conveying, as he thought, 40 acres of land, he discovered that said defendant had taken a deed to all of said land, being 120 acres; that immediately plaintiff tendered back to said defendant the said sum of $130 in lawful money, and demanded the reconveyance to him of said land, the said sum of money being sufficient to pay all interest and cost of the executing and recording of the deed, and the said defendant refused to accept said sum of money, and refused to reconvey said land to said plaintiff; that the defendant well knew at the time of the execution of said deed, and before the same was executed, and before the defendant had paid the plaintiff said sum of money, that said plaintiff was a minor, and had no authority to convey said land. Plaintiff then and there in open court tendered to the defendant the sum of $130, alleging that said deed was duly recorded on the 27th day of December, A. D. 1905, in the record of deeds at Wagoner in said district, and said deed is a cloud upon his title. Plaintiff prays for a decree, to the end that the defendant be directed to make and deliver to him a good and sufficient deed, reconveying to him all of the said described land, and, in the event that the defendant fails or refuses to do so, that a commissioner be appointed by the court with full power to act, and that he be instructed to convey all of said land by good and sufficient deed to said plaintiff.

On the 10th day of January, A. D. 1906, the defendant answered, denying that plaintiff is a minor under the age of twenty-one years of age, and that he was under the age of twenty-one years on the 20th day of December, A. D. 1905, and that he did, at the time alleged in the complaint, endeavor to borrow money from the defendant, through its president, and that, in such endeavor, offered to give a mortgage on 40 acres of said land, and that defendant, through its president, agreed to loan plaintiff the sum of $125, and, as security therefor, to take a deed to such land, with the understanding that the plaintiff was to have the privilege of returning said money, upon which the defendant would reconvey to him said 40 acres of land, and that any such proposition was made and accepted for a loan of $125 to the plaintiff, and that, in drawing up the papers, 120 acres, as alleged in the complaint, were covered and included by the deed, when, under the agreement, only 40 acres should have been conveyed, and denies that said plaintiff offered to redeem said land, or any part of it, by paying back or tendering to it the amount he had received from said defendant as part payment under the deed executed by Joseph Marshall to the defendant, conveying to it 120 acres of land, described in the complaint, which defendant admits were allotted to said plaintiff. Defendant denies that, at the time the transaction occurred between it and the plaintiff, at which time the defendant received a deed to the land mentioned in the complaint from plaintiff, its president, C. M. Bradley, acting for it, knew or had knowledge and belief that said plaintiff was a minor under the age of twenty-one years. Defendant admits that said deed executed and delivered to it by the plaintiff on December 26, 1905, was filed and recorded at Wagoner, in the western district of the Indian territory, but denies that said deed is any cloud upon the plaintiff's title. For further answer, defendant avers that, under the allegations of the complaint to the effect that plaintiff is a minor under the age of twenty-one years, and was at the time he made said deed on December 26, 1905, this suit cannot be maintained by him through a next friend, because his right to disaffirm and set aside a transaction of the character alleged does not accrue until his majority. Defendant pleads that it paid the plaintiff, Joseph Marshall, the sum of $375 on the representation of said Joseph Marshall that he was of age, and had a right and capacity to transfer and convey his land, which the defendant, through its president, C. M. Bradley, believed to be true, and, acting upon such belief, paid to said plaintiff the said sum of $375, which defendant avers and pleads said plaintiff should refund before he can ask equity in this court: that on December 26, A. D. 1905, the defendant, through its president, C. M. Bradley, purchased lots 3 and 4 and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 31, township 16 north, range 17 east, in the Creek Nation, Indian territory, from the plaintiff, Joseph Marshall, and agreed to pay him therefor the sum of $1,400; that, under said agreement, it did upon that date pay said plaintiff the sum of $125, and execute and deliver to him a duebill for the sum of $1,275; that it paid the said plaintiff the sum of $250, which was credited on said duebill as a partial payment on said land; that said plaintiff appeared to be twenty-one years of age at the time this contract and deed was made; that he positively and assuredly made the statement to said C. M. Bradley that he was twenty-one years of age, and had capacity to enter into said contract and execute said deed, upon which representations and statements of said plaintiff the defendant, by and through its said representative, paid to said plaintiff the said sum of $375, believing the transaction to be valid, and believing the statements made by the plaintiff were true as to his age; that, on account of the said representations and assurances made by plaintiff as to his age, he should not be allowed to repudiate and disaffirm said contract in a court of equity without first doing equity by paying back to said defendant the said sum of $375, paid to him upon said statements, which, if untrue, were fraudulent. Defendant further pleads that if the plaintiff is a minor, and was such on December 26, A. D. 1905, being less than twenty-one years of age, he cannot repudiate and disaffirm said deed executed and delivered by him to said defendant because of his minority at the time the suit is brought. Said cause was referred to a master to take testimony, and to report his findings and conclusions as to both fact and law, and, on the 23d day of June, A. D. 1906, the cause was heard on the exceptions to the master's report theretofore filed, and the court confirmed the same in all respects, and rendered a decree as prayed for by plaintiff, to which action of the court the defendant saved its exceptions.

In due time an appeal was taken to the United States court of appeals for the Indian territory. On the 25th day of October, A. D. 1906, it was stipulated by counsel that whereas the defendant had prayed and obtained an appeal from the decree of the court in this case to the United States court of appeals for the Indian territory, and desiring to save cost for making up and printing the record, there being but two propositions defendant desires to press upon the appeal, it was agreed that, in the light of the evidence taken and filed in this case, the following facts were established by the evidence on file in the case before the master and before the lower court on the trial of said cause, to wit: (1) That the plaintiff, Joseph Marshall, is a Creek freedman, a citizen of the Creek Nation, not of Indian blood; (2) that, as such citizen, there were allotted and patented to him, as his distributive share of the lands of the Creek Nation, lots 3 and 4, and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 31, township 16 north, range 17 east, in the Creek Nation, Indian territory, for which he received a patent executed by the principal chief of the Creek Nation; (3) that, on the 26th day of December, 1905, said Joseph Marshall was the owner and in the possession of said land; (4) that on said date said Joseph Marshall, by warranty deed in due form, conveyed to the defendant all of the land above described, which was duly acknowledged and properly recorded on the 27th day of December, 1905; that at the time said Joseph Marshall executed said deed he also made an affidavit in words and figures as follows: "Joseph Marshall, being first duly sworn, upon his oath states that he was twenty-one years old on June 21st, 1905, and that he makes this affidavit for the purpose of selling his land and receiving money thereon;" (5) that, at the time of the execution of said warranty deed aforesaid, the plaintiff, Joseph Marshall, was a minor, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under the age of twenty-one years, having been nineteen years of age since the early part of June, 1905; (6) that C. M. Bradley, president of the defendant company, acted for it as its agent in the purchase of said land from the plaintiff, Joseph Marshall; (7) that the defendant, through its said agent, C. M. Bradley, agreed to pay as the consideration for said land the sum of $1,400, $125 of which sum was paid to the plaintiff, Joseph Marshall, on December 26, 1905, at the time he executed and delivered to the defendant the above-mentioned deed, and received from the defendant a duebill for the remainder of the consideration; (8) that on December 26, 1905, said Joseph Marshall, in company with Sanders Anderson, another negro, went to the office of the defendant company, and represented to said C. M. Bradley, acting for the defendant in this matter, that he, Joseph Marshall, was twenty-one years of age, and had been since June 21, 1905; that his mother so informed him, and he made an affidavit to that effect, as appears on the back of the deed, before W. J. Vandiver, notary public, as appears from the above copy of said deed; that the representations of said Joseph Marshall that he was of age, taken with his physical appearance, were believed by said C. M. Bradley to be true; (9) that, believing said Joseph Marshall to be of age, said C. M. Bradley, acting for the defendant, did on December 26, 1905, pay to said Joseph Marshall the sum of $125 as part payment on the land, taking from him the deed above referred to; (10) that on December 27, 1905, the following day, the mother of Joseph Marshall, the plaintiff, went to the office of the defendant, and told the said C. M. Bradley that Joseph Marshall was her son, and that he was only twelve years old, and cautioned defendant not to pay plaintiff any more money on the land; (11) that on December 28 or 29 1905, the defendant, by and through C. M. Bradley, acting for it, paid to Joseph Marshall, the plaintiff, $250 further on the consideration for said land, at which time said Joseph Marshall again represented that he was of age; (12) that on the trial of this case Joseph Marshall testified that he did know his age.

It is further stipulated that the clerk of the United States court for the western district of the Indian territory, in making up the transcript of the record, may omit therefrom the master's report of the evidence, and the exceptions filed by the defendant to the master's report, and, in lieu thereof, insert this agreement: "It is further agreed that the only questions for review in this case on the appeal are (1) whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to any relief without paying back to the defendant the $125 received by him on December 26, 1905, at the time the deed was made; and (2) whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to any relief in this case without paying back to the defendant the $250 received by him on December 28 or 29, 1905, as set out in the statement of facts, both of which questions were on the above facts properly presented to the court below on the hearing, and decided by that court against the defendant, to which decision defendant then and there excepted. It is further agreed that these two questions shall be the only points upon which the defendant, as appellant, will assign error in the case." The appeal was perfected in the United States court of appeals of the Indian territory, and transferred in accordance with law to this court for review.

Mr. George S. Ramsey, for appellant:

An infant of the age of discretion is estopped to disaffirm his deed where he obtained, upon his false representations as to his age, money from the vendee, his physical appearance corroborating his statement that he was of age.

Williams, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two principles settled by the great weight of authority respecting the contracts and liabilities of infants, apparently not antagonistic, abstractly stated, in practical application produce two conflicting lines of adjudications; and to reconcile the same, or, rather, to determine properly where one begins and the other ends, is not without difficulty: (1) The contracts of infants, when not for necessities, impose nothing but voidable liabilities; (2) infancy being in law a shield, and not a sword, cannot be pleaded to avoid liability for frauds, trespasses, or torts.

The first reported adjudication is that of Grove v. Nevill (decided during the reign of King Charles II.), 16 Car. II., Rot. 401, 1 Keble, 778, being "an action upon the case in the nature of deceit on sale by the defendant of goods as his own, whereas in truth they were another's. The defendant pleads nonage at the time of the sale, to which the plaintiff demurred." One of the judges considered that the same was a tort as waste or escape, and that nonage was no plea, but the majority of the court was of the contrary opinion, holding that there was no actual tort, or anything ex delicto, but only ex contractu, which was voidable by plea, and only a tort by construction of law. One of the judges declined to vote either way. The next case is that of Johnson v. Pie (decided a year later), 1 Lev. 169, which was an action of case, "for that the defendant, being an infant, affirmed himself to be of full age, and by means thereof the plaintiff lent him £100, and so he had cheated the plaintiff by this false affirmation. After verdict for the plaintiff of not guilty, and £100 damages, 'twas moved in arrest of judgment that the action would not lie for this false affirmation; but the plaintiff ought to have informed himself by others, and cited Grove and Nevill's Case, to be adjudged in this court in Easter term, 16 Car. II. Rot. 401, where in case against an infant for selling a false jewel, affirming it to be a true one, 'twas adjudged the action did not lie; to which 'twas answered that this is a trespass on the case, and an infant is chargeable for trespasses, though not for contracts." Two of the judges held that the action did not lie because the affirmation, being by an infant, was void, and that it was not like under trespass, felony, etc., for under such circumstances a fact or act was done. The other judge doubted, and was of the opinion that infants are chargeable for trespasses, and so if he cheat with false dice, etc. The English law from the earliest period has thrown the mantle of protection around the minor or infant on account of his ignorance and inexperience, and the courts have experienced great difficulty in applying the facts to said principles. In many cases they have either expressly denied or absolutely ignored the doctrine that an infant can be held liable in a court of law for a fraud or deceit connected with a contract, limiting such application to acts purely ex delicto. They proceed upon the ground that the invalidity of an infant's contract is a matter defensive, for his protection, and of which all persons dealing with him must take notice; that neither an honest belief by the opposite party that he of full age, nor a false affirmation to that effect by himself, operates to take the matter out of the general rule, since the incapacity to bind himself springs not out of the belief of either of the contracting parties upon the subject, but upon the existence of his minority; that to hold an infant liable for or estopped by any fraud or falsehood in any manner connected with a contract, whether before or at the time of making it, is to deprive him of the protection which the law has given him in consideration of his ignorance and inexperience.

There is a long line of decisions, both English and American, sustaining the doctrine announced in the case of Johnson v. Pie. supra. Brown v. Dunham, 1 Root, 273; Norris v. Wait, 2 Rich. L. 148, 44 Am. Dec. 283; West v. Moore, 14 Vt. 447, 39 Am. Dec. 235; Schenk v. Strong, 4 N. J. L. 87; Jennings v. Rundall, 8 T. R. 335; People v. Kendall, 25 Wend. 399, 37 Am. Dec. 240; Penrose v. Curren, 3 Rawle, 351, 24 Am. Dec. 356; Brown v. McCune, 5 Sandf. 224; Wilt v. Walsh, 6 Watts, 9; Price v. Hewett, 8 Exch. 146; Green v. Greenbank, 2 Marsh. 485; Morrill v. Aden, 19 Vt. 505; Jewitt v. Warren, 10 Hun. 560. In the case of Evroy v. Nicholas, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 488, decided in the year 1720, it was said: "A., as heir to his father and special occupant, became entitled to a lease for three lives of certain lands in Hampshire, and, being an infant of about seventeen years of age, B., who was his guardian, or acted as such, in 1727 did, by A.'s approbation, for £157, sign a demise of the said lands to the plaintiff for twenty-one years, to commence from May, 1730, at which time a lease in being would determine, about six months before A. would come to age. The money was either paid to A. himself or to his guardian by his consent, and the infant, to show his good liking of the bargain, witnessed the deed and the receipt of the money. B. proving afterwards insolvent, and having made several disadvantageous bargains for A., he would have set aside this lease, and actually demised the lands to C., another defendant, who entered upon and evicted the plaintiff, and took a crop of corn which the plaintiff had sowed. The bill against A. was to make a new lease of the premises for twenty-one years, or to refund the £157 fine; and against C., to have satisfaction for the crop. And it was objected for A. that no interest passed by the lease of the guardian, who was nonimal, neither testamentary guardian nor guardian in socage; and, if he had been so, such lease could not be obligatory during A.'s nonage, and that, therefore, the lease in point of law was absolutely void; and, although A. witnessed the lease, yet that could not bind him any more than if he had really executed it, which he might have avoided at his coming to age. King, Chancellor: Infants have no privilege to cheat men. This lease was made with the consent and approbation of A., the infant, who was above the age of discretion, and knew what he was doing, and it's certain his consenting to the lease was the only inducement the plaintiff could have to take it at so large a fine, being he was not to possess the lands 'till six months before the determination of the infancy, etc., and therefore, whether ever the money came to A.'s hands or not, he ought to make good the lease or refund the fine; for otherwise the plaintiff and all other persons would be defrauded by the collusion of an infant and his guardian, and so decreed that, on A.'s refusing to make a lease, he shall repay the fine. But, as to the crop, his lordship would not meddle about that, because in point of law the lease was absolutely null." In the case of Drury v. Drury (decided by the Lord Chancellor in the year 1760) 2 Eden, 39, Reg. Lib. A. 1760, fol. 465, it was declared "that the defendant, Lady Drury, being an infant at the time of her executing the indenture on the 5th of October, 1737, was not barred of her dower in the intestate's real estates, nor of her share of his personal estate, under the statute of distribution. After the decree had been pronounced, the Earl of Buckinghamshire and Lady Mary Ann Drury intermarried, and, the cause being revived, an appeal was prosecuted to the House of Lords. Buckinghamshire v. Drury, 2 Eden, 59. In that case the Earl of Hardwicke said: "See the case of Davila v. Davila, 2 Vern. 724, before cited, and Lord Cowper's reasoning at the end of the case, that the husband might think it not necessary to make a will because he might consider his wife barred by the agreement. A contrary construction would be to make this adult infant commit a fraud upon her husband by claiming in contradiction to the articles. But minors are not allowed to take advantage of infancy to support a fraud. There was a decree by Lord Cowper (analogous to the case in 2 Leo. 108, of Piggot v. Russell), where tenant in tail applied to borrow money on a mortgage. The attorney's clerk who engrossed the deed was the issue in tail, was then about the age of eighteen, and knew of his being issue in tail, but took no notice of it. Lord Cowper relieved against this minor, and would not suffer him to take advantage of his own fraud. Vide note following Watts v. Creswell, 9 Viner, Abr. 415. In this case I must take it Sir Thomas Drury relied on this agreement, and therefore made no will, and otherwise that he was drawn in and deceived." And it was ordered by the House of Lords: "That so much of the said decree complained of by the said appeal whereby an account is directed of the personal estate of the intestate, Sir Thomas Drury, etc., be affirmed, and that the residue of the said decree should be reversed; and it was declared that the respondent is bound by the agreement entered into in consideration of, and previous to, her marriage with the said Sir Thomas Drury, and that the same ought to be performed and carried into execution, and that the respondent is thereby barred of her dower, and of any share of the said Sir Thomas Drury's personal estate under the statute for distribution of intestates' estates." In the case of Ex parte Unity Joint Stock Mut. Bkg. Asso. (decided June 1, 1858, before the Lord Justices) 3 De G. & J. 63, Lord Justice Knight Bruce said: "It is unnecessary to say what in this case we might have thought it fit to do if we had been exercising a jurisdiction merely legal, for our jurisdiction is equitable as well as legal. Again, with respect to our equitable jurisdiction, it is not material to say what we might have thought the proper course to be taken in the absence of decision; for I think that, upon the admitted facts, the case is concluded by the judicial opinions of Lord Cowper, Lord Hardwicke, Lord Thurlow, and other eminent judges which it would be improper in us practically to question. A young man who, from his appearance, might well have been taken to be more than twenty-one years of age, engaged in trade, and wished to borrow or to obtain credit, and for the purpose of so doing represented himself to the petitioning creditor as of the age of twenty-two,—expressly and distinctly so represented himself. We feel no difficulty or doubt on the question whether the minor did at the time believe or not believe what he said, for it is impossible from the materials before us to infer that he did believe his statement to be true, or was ignorant of his own age when he obtained the money. The question is whether, in the view of a court of equity, according to the sense of decisions not now to be disputed, he has made himself liable to pay the debt, whatever his liability or non-liability at law. In my opinion we are compelled to say that he has." The Lord Justice Turner: "I have the strongest inclination to expunge this proof, but the authorities are too strong to permit us to do so. If the course which has been taken by courts of equity on this subject is to be altered, it must be so by the House of Lords, and not by us."

The other class of decisions, both English and American, whilst recognizing the nonliability of an infant upon its contract, yet differentiate between holding him upon a contract and making him responsible for his frauds, deceits, and falsehood in matters connected therewith, but not forming a constituent part of it, wherever the action brought or defense pleaded sounds in tort, and not in contract, although the deceit or fraud upon which the same is based was connected with the contract. In the case of Grove v. Nevill, 1 Keble, 778, the gravamen was that the infant having by deceit in the sale of goods as his own, whereas in truth they were another's the complainant was damaged, there being no allegation that the infant then and there falsely alleged that he was over the age of twenty-one years, and that the plaintiff, relying upon such statement, bought said goods; and it appears that the case of Johnson v. Pie, supra, was decided upon the authority of Grove v. Nevill, supra, the reasoning of which was based upon a false assumption. In the argument of Johnson v. Pie the Grove and Nevill Case was cited. "where, in case against an infant for selling a false jewel, affirming it to be a true one, it was adjudged the action did not lie," and the case seems to have been considered as if the affirmation that he was of age was to be regarded as a part of the contract. But there is a wide difference between the two cases. In the Grove and Nevill Case the subject-matter of the contract was the jewel which was sold. The affirmation that it was a true one was a false warranty of the article sold. If the defendant had been of age, assumpsit might have been maintained. The infant was not to be charged by adopting a different form of action. But the representation in Johnson v. Pie and in the present case, that the defendant was of full age, was not a part of the contract, nor did it grow out of the contract or in any way result from it. It is not any part of its terms, nor was it the consideration upon which the contract was founded. No contract was made about the defendant's age. The sale of the goods was not a consideration for this affirmation or representation. The representation was not a foundation for an action of assumpsit. The matter arises purely ex delicto. The fraud was intended to induce, and did induce, the plaintiff to make a contract for the purchase of the land covered by the deed, but that by no means makes it a part and parcel of the deed. It was antecedent to the deed, and, if the infant is liable for a positive wrong connected with the contract, but arising after the contract is made, he may well be answerable for one committed before the contract was entered into, although it may have led to the contract. It has been said that "all the infants in England might be ruined" if infants were bound by acts that sound in deceit. But this cannot be a reason why the action should not be maintained for fraudulent wrongs done, for the same reason would seem to apply equally in cases of slander, trover, and trespass. The latter are as much the results of indiscretion as the former, and quite as likely to be committed. In Bacon. Abr. Infancy, 1, 3, p. 133, it is said: "Also it seems that if an infant, being above the age of discretion, be guilty of any fraud in affirming himself to be of full age, or if, by combination with his guardian, etc., he make any contract or agreement, with an intent afterwards to elude it by reason of his privilege of infancy, that a court of equity will decree it good against him according to the circumstances of the fraud." 3 Gwillim's Bac. 604. If an infant has fraudulently represented that he is of full age, or actively and purposely conceals his minority, whereby the other party is induced to enter into a contract, then it is held that the infant will be estopped in equity by his fraud from avoiding the contract on the ground of infancy to the prejudice of the other contracting party. Ferguson v. Bobo, 54 Miss. 121; Davidson v. Young, 38 Ill. 145; Conroe v. Birdsall, 1 Johns. Cas. 127, 1 Am. Dec. 105. In the state of New Hampshire is an apparent conflict of authority. In the case of Fitts v. Hall, 9 N. H. 441, an infant had bought a lot of hats, for which he had executed his note, and, in an action upon the note, he availed himself successfully of the plea of infancy. Suit was then brought against him for deceit practised in affirming at and before the purchase that he was an adult, and this was maintained in an elaborate opinion, reviewing the same to some extent, and expressly disapproving the case of Johnson v. Pie. Later, in the case of Prescott v. Norris, 32 N. H. 101, the supreme court of the state, while citing the case of Fitts v. Hall, apparently with disapproval, held that an infant who sold and warranted a barrel of gin to be pure could not be held liable for the false warranty, because that was a part of the contract.

Likewise, in South Carolina, in the case of Norris v. Wait, 2 Rich. L. 148, 44 Am. Dec. 283, it was said that an infant could not prejudice his rights in a court of law by neglecting to state his title to the purchaser of his property from another; yet afterwards, in the case of Word v. Vance, 1 Nott & M'C. 199, 9 Am. Dec. 683, it was held that infancy was no defense to an action for a deceit practised in selling a horse. In the case of Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. 359, 8 Am. Dec. 105, the supreme court of that state held that where goods had been obtained by a minor upon the false affirmation that he was of age it vitiated the contract so that no title ever vested in the minor, and that he might be treated as having unlawfully converted them, and might be sued in trover or replevin. This doctrine was approved by Judge Story (Story, Contr. §§ 107-111).

In this case it is not necessary to determine as to the liability in actions at law of infants for frauds and torts connected with contracts. The following propositions are raised in this record: (1) Whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to any relief, without paying back to the defendant, the $125 received by him on December 26, 1905, at the time the deed was made and delivered to the defendant; (2) whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to any relief in this case without paying back to the defendant the $250 received by him on December 28 or 29, 1905, and credited as a part payment on the consideration for said land. It is settled by the great weight of authority that equity will regard the circumstances surrounding the transaction,—the appearance of the minor; his intelligence; the character of his representations; the advantage he has gained by the fraudulent representations; and the disadvantage to which the person deceived has been put by them in determining whether he shall be permitted to invoke successfully the plea of infancy. That an infant must restore the property which he obtains on a contract where he has been guilty of deceit or fraud before he can avoid it is the universal rule in equity. Petty v. Roberts, 7 Bush, 411; Damron v. Com. 110 Ky. 268, 98 Am. St. Rep. 453, 61 S. W. 459; Schmitheimer v. Eiseman, 7 Bush, 298; Davis v. Tingle, 8 B. Mon. 542; Wright v. Arnold, 14 B. Mon. 638, 61 Am. Dec. 172; Hayes v. Parker, 41 N. J. Eq. 631, 7 Atl. 511; Pemberton Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Adams, 53 N. J. Eq. 258, 31 Atl. 280; *Adams v. Stone, 136 Mass. 406; Thormaehlen v. Kaepfel, 86 Wis. 382, 58 N. W. 1089; Ryan v. Growney, 125 Mo. 483, 28 S. W. 189, 755; Davidson v. Young, 38 Ill. 149; Bradshaw v. Van Winkle, 133 Ind. 134, 32 N. E. 877; Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 38 L.R.A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 27 S. E. 413; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 945; 2 Herman, Estoppel & Res Adjudicata, § 1119; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. p. 600; 2 Kent, Com. p. 240. In the case of Alfrey v. Colbert, 7 Ind. Terr. 338, 104 S. W. 647, the court said: "It is contended by the appellants that the appellee misrepresented his age, and perpetrated a fraud in inducing them to pay $550 for the land in controversy. On the other hand, the appellee contends that the money paid to him while a minor has been wasted and squandered, and that consequently he should not be compelled to return the same. The court below found that the plaintiff, at the time of executing the first and second deeds, was inexperienced; that his education and training was limited; that plaintiff was of weak and feeble mind, and, although not insane, his case comes within the category where his property should be placed in the hands of a curator; that the consideration paid by defendants was wholly inadequate. But, in view of the misrepresentations made by the appellee as to his age, we think the court below very properly ordered that the appellee should refund to the defendants within one year from the date thereof all moneys paid to him for and on account of the purchase of said lands, which the court finds to be $555, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum."

From the facts agreed to have been established by the evidence, if the appellee, Joseph Marshall, had been of age, he could have executed a valid deed to the appellant covering said land, and on account of the affidavit made by said appellee for the purpose of selling said land, that he was twenty-one years of age, and had been since June 21, 1905, and, taken in connection with his physical appearance, the appellant, as a reasonable person, believed the same to be true; that the said appellant, at the time the deed was executed, paid to the appellee the sum of $125, and executed a proper note for the balance of the purchase price thereon. "He who comes into equity must come in with clean hands." "He that hath committed iniquity shall not have equity." Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 397. The appellee will not be permitted to invoke the powers of equity for the purpose of having the conveyance canceled without offering to return the said $125.

From the facts agreed, as proved, it further appears that, on the 27th day of December, 1905, the day after the said $125 was paid to the appellee, his mother stated to the appellant that he was only twelve years old, and cautioned the defendant not to pay plaintiff any more money on the land. There is no agreement as to the proof as to whether or not appellant made reasonable investigation in order to ascertain whether or not the statement of appellee's mother was true. It appears that the appellee in fact was nineteen years of age, and that his mother represented him to be only twelve years of age. The question arises as to whether or not negligence on the part of the officer of the appellant company, although the appellee had been guilty of fraud or deceit, more particularly guilty of the specific criminal offense known as false pretenses under the laws in force in that jurisdiction, would take that transaction out of the rule. Equity is to give relief to parties where it cannot be afforded at law; but equity will refuse to lend its aid in any manner to one seeking its active interposition who has been guilty of any unlawful or inequitable conduct in the matter with relation to which he seeks relief. 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 144. From the agreed proof, it appears that the appellee, not only on the 26th day of December, 1905, practised deceit or fraud upon the appellant company, thereby securing the sum of $125, but that, a few days thereafter, by repeating the same fraud or deceit, secured the additional sum of $250. The fact that, in the meantime, information may have come to the officer of the appellant company, which, had it been reasonably followed up and investigated, would have prevented such additional fraud or deceit from having been practiced upon it, does not lessen the fraudulent acts of the appellee. It appears that the appellee is in possession of the land covered by the deed. Is a court of equity to lend its jurisdiction to the party initiating such fraud and deceit by canceling this deed, though it be void? If so, it lends encouragement to such fraud. Equity says to the appellee: "You must invoke my jurisdiction with clean hands, having committed no iniquity in the transaction about which its power is sought to be exercised. If, as a result of your fraudulent act, inconvenience follows to you or the subject thereof, it flows from the necessary consequence of your own act." The doctrine of estoppel does not apply in this case. Act June 30, 1902, chap.

1323. §§ 16, 17, 32 Stat. at L. 503, 504; act April 21, 1904, chap. 1402. 33 Stat. at L. 204. As a general rule an infant's conveyance of realty cannot be conclusively avoided by him until he reaches full age. Welch v. Bunce, 83 Ind. 382; Kilgore v. Jordan, 17 Tex. 341; Cummings v. Powell, 8 Tex. 80; Harrod v. Myers, 21 Ark. 592, 76 Am. Dec. 416; McCarthy v. Nicrosi, 72 Ala. 332, 47 Am. Rep. 418; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Lamb, 81 Mo. 221; Irvine v. Irvine, 5 Minn. 61, Gil. 44; Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794; Stafford v. Roof, 9 Cow. 626; Rool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 119, 31 Am. Dec. 285; Matthewson v. Johnson, Hoffm. Ch. 560; Chapman v. Chapman, 13 Ind. 396. But these authorities apply to voidable, and not void, deeds. No question is raised, however, as to the right of the infant, by his next friend, to institute this action before he attains his majority. However, the rule seems to be that, where the deed of the infant is absolutely void, there could be no objection to a suit during his infancy to have it declared void. Swafford v. Ferguson, 3 Lea, 292, 31 Am. Rep. 639. However, in note to Craig v. Van Bebber, 18 Am. St. Rep. 671, it is stated, referring to the case of Swafford v. Ferguson, supra: "It may be remarked that this case virtually stands alone among recent cases in its persistent adherence to a criterion long since exploded." We are inclined to the doctrine, however, that where the deed is absolutely void, and there is no question of affirmance or disaffirmance, suit may be maintained during infancy to have it declared void. But, in this instance, the appellee, being guilty of unlawful or inequitable conduct in the matter with relation to which he seeks relief, not offering to do equity, cannot have the interposition of the powers of equity. It may be insisted by appellee that after he reaches his majority he can more readily find a purchaser for said premises with this conveyance canceled, although it may be absolutely void; but a party with unclean hands with relation to the matter about which he seeks relief for his convenience cannot be permitted to have the aid of equity without purging himself. If a court of equity were to be permitted to lend its aid for any such purpose without equity being done by the party invoking its aid, the purpose for which courts of equity came into being would become abortive.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, with instructions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHNSTON & GROMMETT BROTHERS, Impleaded, etc., Appts.,
v.

J. E. BUNN et al.

(108 Va. 490, 62 S. E. 341.)

Lien — enforcement — personal judgment.

1. The nonestablishment of the right to a lien in a bona fide proceeding by a subcontractor to enforce a lien against the property of the owner for work performed for the contractor does not defeat the jurisdiction of the court to render a personal decree against the contractor for the amount found due by him.

Construction contract — engineer's estimate — effect of absence.

2. Absence of a final estimate by the engineer upon completion of the work will prevent a recovery by the subcontractor against the contractor for the performance of certain work of the amount alleged to be due, where, by the terms of the contract by which the parties are bound, the procuring of such estimate is to constitute a condition precedent to the right to recover for the work done.

(September 10, 1908.)

Case Note. — Right, upon failure to establish ground of equitable jurisdiction, to obtain in a suit in equity relief that might be obtained at law.

The scope of this note is limited to the question whether, where a complainant fails to state or prove a case which will entitle him to equitable relief, a court of equity will proceed, for the purpose of settling the entire controversy, to decree relief to which he appears to be entitled, but which might have been obtained in a court of law. It does not assume to include cases in which either the relief obtainable at law or the equitable relief sought has been refused in the exercise of the discretion of the court, unless the discretionary refusal of relief under certain circumstances has been so habitual as to have become an established rule. Nor does it include cases where equitable relief has become needless during the pendency of the suit,—as by the defendant's discontinuance of acts sought to be enjoined,—or where the right of the plaintiff to equitable relief passes to another,—as where, during the pendency of a suit for an injunction on behalf of the owner of realty, the plaintiff's death causes the right to the injunction to vest in his heirs, while the right to damages vests in his personal representatives,—or where a like suit is instituted by a tenant whose lease expires pendente lite. Another class of cases which it has been deemed proper to exclude, as involving considerations of a peculiar character, is that in which a plaintiff having certain equitable rights has brought his suit for equitable re-

APPEAL by defendants Johnston & Grommett Brothers from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wise County awarding a personal judgment against them in a proceeding to enforce a mechanics' lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Flannigan & Burnett and Irvine & Morison, for appellants:

No indebtedness is proved by the owner to the general contractor, and there is no foundation for equity jurisdiction.

The personal judgment was not premature.

Roanoke Land & Improv. Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 589.

lief knowing that the relief sought will be impossible, for the real purpose of obtaining compensation in lieu thereof.

The Protean character of the subject under discussion, arising, as it does, in connection with nearly every form of equitable proceeding or relief, not only precludes, but renders undesirable, the working out of the question in such detail as where some specific question of the granting in equity of relief obtainable at law where some particular form of equitable relief is unsuccessfully sought is under discussion. To such an occasion, therefore, may be postponed the consideration of decisions in proceedings of a purely statutory character, as well as cases arising under statutes providing for the recovery of a personal judgment where the main purpose of the proceeding fails,—as often in the case of mortgages and other liens,—and cases where the plaintiff's claim to equitable relief is met by a countervailing equitable right in the defendant,—as where an injunction is sought against the maintenance of a slightly encroaching building, the removal of which would be of little benefit to the plaintiff, but a considerable detriment to the defendant, so that the equities may be best preserved by awarding a money compensation.

It is believed, however, that the present note, while probably not exhaustive of the decisions, so sufficiently presents them as adequately to represent the state of the law on the subject.

A source of difficulty in connection with the subject under discussion is the apparent treatment of the question in some cases as one of the propriety of the exercise of equity jurisdiction, rather than as one of its existence. Such handling of the question obviates the necessity of taking position on the question (with which some courts appear to have trouble) whether or not the jurisdiction of a court of equity depends upon a demonstration of the existence of some right to equitable relief. A complete exposition of the subject under discussion, however, seems to require their inclusion among the cases hereinafter set forth.

Although a few cases are found which can be characterized only as variants from the general rule, the preponderance of opinion in relation to the subject under consideration clearly seems to be that where a case for relief in equity fails, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to award other relief by way of disposing of the entire controversy; unless, indeed, it appears that the remedy at law will be inadequate. Otherwise, as the courts have frequently pointed out, a litigant, by a pretended claim for equitable relief, might deprive his opponent of advantages incident to an action at law.

The logic which makes the jurisdiction of a court of equity dependent upon the establishment of a right to equitable relief has not always met with approval. One case, at least, goes so far as to invoke in this connection the principle that the jurisdiction of the subject-matter does not depend upon the ultimate existence of a good cause of action in a particular case (Walters v. Farmers' Bank, 76 Va. 12, hereinafter set forth at length). A proposed test, that the existence of jurisdiction be determined by the good faith of the complainant, is rejected as unsatisfactory in Hildebrandt v. Savage, 4 Wash. 524, 30 Pac. 643, 32 Pac. 109.

The grouping of the cases following has been made, so far as possible, with reference to the respect in which the complainant fell short of obtaining the equitable relief sought, such arrangement conducing to the juxtaposition of cases containing the greatest number of common characteristics.

Where pleadings are defective.

In Dugan v. Cureton, 1 Ark. 31, 31 Am. Dec. 727, it was held that where no specific ground of equity is alleged in a bill to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to set off a claim for damages based on breach of covenant.

In Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 9 Mackey, 197 (reversed on other grounds in 160 U. S.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed by the appellees to enforce payment of a mechanics' lien, alleged to be due them as subcontractors for work done in constructing a section of the Black Mountain Railroad.

It appears that the Keokee Coal & Coke Company, as general contractors, entered into a contract with the Black Mountain Railroad Company to build for the latter a railroad, several miles in length, between Imboden, in Wise county, and Keokee, in Lee county. The Keokee Coal & Coke Company sublet its entire undertaking, by contract in writing, to the firm of Johnston & Grommett Bros., the appellants, who, in turn, by parol contract, sublet a part of the work to the appellees, Bunn & Monteiro. The evidence shows that under this parol contract the appellees were to be governed by the written contract which had been entered into by the appellants with the Keokee Coal & Coke Company.

The Black Mountain Railroad Company, the Keokee Coal & Coke Company, and Johnston & Grommett Bros. were made parties defendant to the bill, which alleged that complainants had completed their contract and taken out a mechanics' lien for the balance due them on that portion of the roadbed which they had constructed, and prayed that the Black Mountain Railroad Company and the Keokee Coal & Coke Company be required to answer as to the amount they were due, or would become due, to Johnston & Grommett Bros., by reason of the latter's completion of their 171, 40 L. ed. 383, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258), it is said that there is no ground whatever for coming to a court of equity for damages for the failure specifically to perform a contract; and that therefore a bill which, instead of seeking specific performance of an agreement to convey, sought to recover a claim for money due on account of money laid out and expended by complainant, or a claim for damages for not conveying the property, was properly dismissed.

In McKinney v. Springer, 6 Blackf. 511, where complainants filed a bill to obtain a lien on a building erected by them for the amount of their labor and materials, which was not attempted to be maintained as coming within the provisions of the mechanics' lien statute, it was held that there was no ground upon which a court of chancery could grant relief, the bill being in substance one to recover the value of the work done by the complainants.

In Fultz v. Walters, 2 Mont. 165, it was held that where a bank issuing a certificate of deposit was unnecessarily made a party to a suit in equity brought by the transferee of the certificate to compel its indorsement by the payee, for the purpose of obtaining a decree requiring the payment of the certificate, the bill should be dismissed as to the bank.

In Ming Yue v. Coos Bay, R. & E. R. & Nav. Co. 24 Or. 392, 33 Pac. 641, it was held that where a complaint in a suit in equity to foreclose a mechanics' lien, though failing to set out a case for equitable cognizance, sufficiently stated a cause of action for labor performed, the court had no jurisdiction to retain and try such action, but was bound to dismiss the suit, and leave the plaintiffs to prosecute their action at law.

In Dakin v. Union P. R. Co. 5 Fed. 665, it was held that a bill in equity to have full-paid stock issued in place of a mere subscription to stock, which failed to show the payment of anything for the subscription or to offer to pay anything, could not be retained to recover damages, since the entire ground for equitable relief had failed.

Fed. 90, it was held that a complaint in a suit in equity to enforce a mechanics' lien, which failed to show a valid lien, was demurrable, even though it showed facts sufficient to entitle the complainants to recover a personal judgment, the court saying that while such a complaint might be sustainable under the provisions of state codes which have abolished all distinctions existing under the common law as to suits in equity or actions at law, or under a state statute which expressly provides in the act relating to mechanics' liens that such a course may be pursued, the situation is otherwise where the suit is purely one in equity.

See also subdivision, "Where claim is found wanting in equity," infra.

Where proof fails to establish case.

In Pond v. Lockwood, 8 Ala. 669, it was held that where the complainant in a suit to enjoin a judgment failed to make out a case, there was nothing on which to rest the jurisdiction of the court to decree the recovery of a sum of money paid one of the defendants, the court saying: "If it could be entertained because, upon the face, it appeared unobjectionable, then it would be competent to transfer to equity many cases of pure legal cognizance, by making them dependent upon a supposititious statement of facts. This would be a state of things not to be endured, and need but be mentioned to show that the chancellor properly refused to render a decree."

In Bryan v. Cowart, 21 Ala. 92, it was held that where a complainant seeking to have a deed declared a mortgage to secure a note upon which judgment had been rendered, and to enjoin such judgment, failed to make out the only ground for relief which gave a court of equity jurisdiction of his case, the bill could not be retained on account of other grounds of relief of a purely legal character.

In Lewis v. Yale, 4 Fla. 418, it was held that it is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity to award compensation in damages for the injury sustained by the non-contract for the construction of the railroad mentioned. The prayer, further, is that complainants, who are the appellees here, be decreed a lien on that part of the Black Mountain roadbed which was constructed by them between stations 834 and 856, described in their mechanics' lien, which was made a part of the bill, and that they be decreed a sale of the same for the payment of their debt, and be given a personal judgment against the Black Mountain Railroad Company and the Keokee Coal & Coke Company for such sums as they may appear to have owed Johnston & Grommett Bros. on the date they, respectively, received notice of the complainants' mechanics' lien, and for general relief.

Upon the bill, the answers, which deny its allegations, and the evidence in the cause, the decree appealed from was rendered, giving a personal judgment for $2,203.21, subject to a credit of $522.15 and costs of suit, against the appellants, Johnston & Grommett Bros., with the right to issue execution thereon. The decree then refers the cause to a commissioner to ascertain whether the Black Mountain Railroad Company and the Keokee Coal & Coke Company are liable to the complainants by reason of the filing of their mechanics' lien, and if so, in what amount.

We are of opinion that the position taken by appellants, that the court was without jurisdiction to enter the judgment complained of, is not tenable. The appellants contend that the only ground for equitable jurisdiction in this case is that the complainants have a mechanics' lien to be en-performance of a contract in the event of the failure of primary relief by specific performance.

In Printup v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 558, 63 Am. Dec. 258, it was held that where the defendant in an action at law to recover for work and labor done and performed, and materials found, in the improvement of certain premises, filed a bill in equity in which it was alleged that this pretended indebtedness originated upon a parol contract between the parties to the effect that, upon the completion of the improvements by one party, he should be entitled to a conveyance from the other of a moiety of the property, and prayed that he might be decreed to take a deed, and that his action at law be perpetually enjoined, an injunction to stay the proceeding at law, which was improperly granted (the defense at law being complete), could not be resorted to as a pretext for holding on to the bill for specific performance.

In Toledo, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. St. Louis & O. River R. Co. 208 Ill. 623, 70 N. E. 715, it was held that where the complainant's right to equitable relief sought on account of fraud and misrepresentation in procuring a deed, and on account of the nonperformance of a condition subsequent therein contained, and upon the ground that such deed constituted a cloud upon the title of land of which the defendant was in possession, failed for want of proof on the first ground, and on the other grounds by reason of the rules that equity will not lend its aid to enforce a forfeiture, and will not take jurisdiction to hear and determine a bill to remove a cloud from the title to real estate where the lands in controversy are in the possession of the defendant, the court would not retain jurisdiction for the purpose of granting a permanent injunction, which involved the necessity of deciding who was owner of and entitled to the possession of the real estate in question: the court saying: "Mere statements in a bill upon which the chancery jurisdiction might be maintained, but which are not proved, will not authorize a decree upon such parts of the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bill as, if standing alone, would not give the court jurisdiction."

In Brauer v. Laughlin, 235 Ill. 265, 83 N. E. 283, it was held that where a bill for a specific performance of an alleged contract and for an accounting on its face made a case authorizing a court of equity to take jurisdiction, but the proof simply disclosed that complainant had a legal demand against defendant for money loaned, equity could not retain jurisdiction to decree repayment of the loan, where it did not appear that a judgment in a court of law would not be as efficacious as a money decree in a court of chancery. The court said: "The recovery here allowed is upon a purely legal demand, and, if an action had been brought at law, either of the parties would have been entitled to a jury on the trial. Courts will not permit parties to sue in chancery, and, upon failure to establish any basis for equitable relief, have the bill retained for the purpose of a recovery upon a purely legal demand. To allow this to be done would be to deprive the defendant of his constitutional right of trial by jury."

In Clark v. Spears, 7 Blackf. 96, it was held that where the proof failed to sustain a charge in a bill of foreclosure of fraud in the assignment of a note accepted by the mortgagee in partial satisfaction of the mortgage debt, the court of chancery had no jurisdiction with respect thereto, and the complainant's remedy, if any, was by a suit at law on the assignment.

In Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey, 166 Ind. 427, 76 N. E. 520, it was held that where a bill in equity by the trustee of a bankrupt to recover alleged preferences was sought to be sustained upon the theory of a conspiracy between the bankrupt and the preferred creditors, and the proof failed to establish such a conspiracy, the trustee was not entitled to a decree, the court saying: "The former practice in chancery was to dismiss the bill when it was disclosed that there was no ground for equitable interference, even though a cause of action at law appeared to exist; and, under the Code, where law and equity are administered in

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed by the appellees to enforce payment of a mechanics' lien, alleged to be due them as subcontractors for work done in constructing a section of the Black Mountain Railroad.

It appears that the Keokee Coal & Coke Company, as general contractors, entered into a contract with the Black Mountain Railroad Company to build for the latter a railroad, several miles in length, between Imboden, in Wise county, and Keokee, in Lee county. The Keokee Coal & Coke Company sublet its entire undertaking, by contract in writing, to the firm of Johnston & Grommett Bros., the appellants, who, in turn, by parol contract, sublet a part of the work to the appellees, Bunn & Monteiro. The evidence shows that under this parol contract the appellees were to be governed by the written contract which had been entered into by the appellants with the Keokee Coal & Coke Company.

The Black Mountain Railroad Company, the Keokee Coal & Coke Company, and Johnston & Grommett Bros. were made parties defendant to the bill, which alleged that complainants had completed their contract and taken out a mechanics' lien for the balance due them on that portion of the roadbed which they had constructed, and prayed that the Black Mountain Railroad Company and the Keokee Coal & Coke Company be required to answer as to the amount they were due, or would become due, to Johnston & Grommett Bros., by reason of the latter's completion of their 171, 40 L. ed. 383, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258), it is said that there is no ground whatever for coming to a court of equity for damages for the failure specifically to perform a contract; and that therefore a bill which, instead of seeking specific performance of an agreement to convey, sought to recover a claim for money due on account of money laid out and expended by complainant, or a claim for damages for not conveying the property, was properly dismissed.

In McKinney v. Springer, 6 Blackf. 511, where complainants filed a bill to obtain a lien on a building erected by them for the amount of their labor and materials, which was not attempted to be maintained as coming within the provisions of the mechanics' lien statute, it was held that there was no ground upon which a court of chancery could grant relief, the bill being in substance one to recover the value of the work done by the complainants.

In Fultz v. Walters, 2 Mont. 165, it was held that where a bank issuing a certificate of deposit was unnecessarily made a party to a suit in equity brought by the transferee of the certificate to compel its indorsement by the payee, for the purpose of obtaining a decree requiring the payment of the certificate, the bill should be dismissed as to the bank.

In Ming Yue v. Coos Bay, R. & E. R. & Nav. Co. 24 Or. 392, 33 Pac. 641, it was held that where a complaint in a suit in equity to foreclose a mechanics' lien, though failing to set out a case for equitable cognizance, sufficiently stated a cause of action for labor performed, the court had no jurisdiction to retain and try such action, but was bound to dismiss the suit, and leave the plaintiffs to prosecute their action at law.

In Dakin v. Union P. R. Co. 5 Fed. 665, it was held that a bill in equity to have full-paid stock issued in place of a mere subscription to stock, which failed to show the payment of anything for the subscription or to offer to pay anything, could not be retained to recover damages, since the entire ground for equitable relief had failed.

Fed. 90, it was held that a complaint in a suit in equity to enforce a mechanics' lien, which failed to show a valid lien, was demurrable, even though it showed facts sufficient to entitle the complainants to recover a personal judgment, the court saying that while such a complaint might be sustainable under the provisions of state codes which have abolished all distinctions existing under the common law as to suits in equity or actions at law, or under a state statute which expressly provides in the act relating to mechanics' liens that such a course may be pursued, the situation is otherwise where the suit is purely one in equity.

See also subdivision, "Where claim is found wanting in equity," infra.

Where proof fails to establish case.

In Pond v. Lockwood, 8 Ala. 669, it was held that where the complainant in a suit to enjoin a judgment failed to make out a case, there was nothing on which to rest the jurisdiction of the court to decree the recovery of a sum of money paid one of the defendants, the court saying: "If it could be entertained because, upon the face, it appeared unobjectionable, then it would be competent to transfer to equity many cases of pure legal cognizance, by making them dependent upon a supposititious statement of facts. This would be a state of things not to be endured, and need but be mentioned to show that the chancellor properly refused to render a decree."

In Bryan v. Cowart, 21 Ala. 92, it was held that where a complainant seeking to have a deed declared a mortgage to secure a note upon which judgment had been rendered, and to enjoin such judgment, failed to make out the only ground for relief which gave a court of equity jurisdiction of his case, the bill could not be retained on account of other grounds of relief of a purely legal character.

In Lewis v. Yale, 4 Fla. 418, it was held that it is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity to award compensation in damages for the injury sustained by the non-contract for the construction of the railroad mentioned. The prayer, further, is that complainants, who are the appellees here, be decreed a lien on that part of the Black Mountain roadbed which was constructed by them between stations 834 and 856, described in their mechanics' lien, which was made a part of the bill, and that they be decreed a sale of the same for the payment of their debt, and be given a personal judgment against the Black Mountain Railroad Company and the Keokee Coal & Coke Company for such sums as they may appear to have owed Johnston & Grommett Bros. on the date they, respectively, received notice of the complainants' mechanics' lien, and for general relief.

Upon the bill, the answers, which deny its allegations, and the evidence in the cause, the decree appealed from was rendered, giving a personal judgment for $2,203.21, subject to a credit of $522.15 and costs of suit, against the appellants, Johnston & Grommett Bros., with the right to issue execution thereon. The decree then refers the cause to a commissioner to ascertain whether the Black Mountain Railroad Company and the Keokee Coal & Coke Company are liable to the complainants by reason of the filing of their mechanics' lien, and if so, in what amount.

We are of opinion that the position taken by appellants, that the court was without jurisdiction to enter the judgment complained of, is not tenable. The appellants contend that the only ground for equitable jurisdiction in this case is that the complainants have a mechanics' lien to be en-performance of a contract in the event of the failure of primary relief by specific performance.

In Toledo, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. St. Louis & O. River R. Co. 208 Ill. 623, 70 N. bill as, if standing alone, would not give the court jurisdiction."

In Brauer v. Laughlin, 235 Ill. 265, 83 N. E. 283, it was held that where a bill for a specific performance of an alleged contract and for an accounting on its face made a case authorizing a court of equity to take jurisdiction, but the proof simply disclosed that complainant had a legal demand against defendant for money loaned, equity could not retain jurisdiction to decree repayment of the loan, where it did not appear that a judgment in a court of law would not be as efficacious as a money decree in a court of chancery. Courts will not permit parties to sue in chancery, and, upon failure to establish any basis for equitable relief, have the bill retained for the purpose of a recovery upon a purely legal demand. To allow this to be done would be to deprive the defendant of his constitutional right of trial by jury."

shall make and return a final estimate of the work done by contractors, and shall certify the same in writing. It further provides that the procuring of such certificate and final estimate shall constitute a condition precedent to any right of action by contractors against the Keokee Coal & Coke Company.

The evidence shows that during the progress of the work the monthly estimates were made and the appellees paid in accordance therewith; but it clearly appears that no final estimate upon the work done by the appellees has ever been made by the chief engineer; indeed, it is insisted that the work undertaken by the appellees has not been completed. Nor does it appear that appellees have ever mentioned to the chief engineer their claim that the work was completed, or requested of him a certificate in writing showing a final estimate and the balance, if any, due to them. The basis of the personal decree against the appellants is admitted to be a final estimate upon the work done by appellees, made by engineers who were strangers to the transaction, and employed for the purpose by appellees without the knowledge or consent of the appellants. The evidence shows that, in the nature of things, these outside engineers could not make an accurate or reliable estimate showing the balance due upon an undertaking they had previously had no connection with, and that, in some particulars, their estimates would be necessarily the result of mere conjecture.

A sufficient answer, however, to this proceeding by appellees, is that it violates the express terms of the contract by which they agreed to abide. That contract provides that the engineer in charge of the work shall certify in writing its final completion, together with a final estimate showing the balance due. It was error to ignore, married woman's separate estate, alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by her, with the payment of a debt, to which suit her surety was properly made a party, upon the failure to obtain the relief sought a personal judgment might be rendered against the surety. Although expressions used in the opinion seem to depart from the usually recognized doctrine with respect to the granting of legal relief where the main object of the suit in equity fails, the decision finds ample justification in the fact that the right action at law had, during the pendency of the equity suit, become barred by the statutes of limitation. The expressions referred to are to the effect that jurisdiction of the subject-matter does not depend upon the ultimate existence of a good cause of action in a particular case; so that where a plaintiff, in the bona fide assertion of an equitable claim, invokes the jurisdiction of a court of equity, but, from some cause developed in the course of the investigation, fails in establishing his title to the specific relief claimed in his bill, the court may, instead of leaving the parties to their legal rights and remedies, go on and end the litigation by giving complete and final relief.

In Boston Blower Co. v. Carman Lumber Co. 94 Va. 94, 26 S. E. 390, it was held that where, in a suit to enforce an alleged lien, the materials furnished, for which the lien was claimed, were found to be not such as to come within the operation of the lien law, a court of equity had no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment for the amount of the debt in favor of the complainant, who, having retained the title to the goods furnished, had a complete remedy at law. The court said: "Where a plaintiff is properly in equity, that court will oftentimes, in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits and do complete justice, give such relief as is usually afforded only in a court of law; but 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the plaintiff must be in court upon a case properly cognizable in a court of equity."

In Vendome Turkish Bath Co. v. Schettler, 2 Wash. 457, 27 Pac. 76, it was held that where a mechanics' lien was not established, there was nothing in the case of which equity could take cognizance, but that the suit should be dismissed without prejudice to an action at law to recover the amount claimed.

In Hildebrandt v. Savage, 4 Wash. 524, 30 Pac. 643, 32 Pac. 109, it was held that, in the absence of a statute authorizing personal judgment on failure to establish a mechanics' lien, such judgment could not be rendered upon the theory that a court of equity, having once obtained jurisdiction in a cause, will maintain it to the end. The court discusses the question as follows: "But the question is, When does the court obtain jurisdiction in a cause like this? Clearly, the court had no jurisdiction excepting to foreclose a lien. Now, can a party, by coming into court, and setting up a mere pretended lien, which has no validity, confer jurisdiction upon the court to render a personal judgment upon a contract which otherwise would only be triable in an action at law, and thus deprive the defendant of the benefits of such a trial? It is admitted that, if the equitable features of the action were so wanting or ill-founded as to amount to bad faith upon the part of the plaintiff, the action could not be maintained; but it is contended that if it is apparent the plaintiff sought the equity side of the court in good faith, the court would thereby get jurisdiction; in other words, making the jurisdiction of the court depend upon the good faith of the party in asserting his equitable rights. We do not think this position can be maintained in a case like this. As to whether a lien is sufficient upon its face is purely a question of law, and the defects in the lien in without cause, this final arbiter agreed upon in the contract, and adopt the uncertain and arbitrary standard of measurements and estimates furnished by strangers employed by one of the parties to the contract without the consent of the other. There is not shown to have been in this case any unnecessary or unreasonable delay by the engineer in charge in making estimates, nor does there appear to have been any other ground for the course pursued by appellees in employing other engineers to perform the duties they had agreed should be discharged by the chief engineer of the Black Mountain Railroad Company. If the conduct of the engineer designated by the contract was fraudulent, or he was guilty of a mistake so gross as to amount to a fraud on the rights of the opposing party, the latter would not be bound by such estimates, but could maintain their action on the contract to recover the amount due them. Norfolk

& W. R. Co. v. Mills, 91 Va. 613, 22 S. E. 556. No such condition, however, appears in this record. On the contrary, the appellees have obtained a decree based upon final estimates made, without apparent cause therefor, by strangers to their contract, and in violation of its express terms.

We are of opinion that the order of reference made in the cause should be enlarged, so as to require the commissioner, in addition to the other inquiries directed, to ascertain and report whether the appellees had completed their work in accordance with the terms of their contract, and, if so, what balance, if any, was due them from the appellants.

The decree appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

this instance were thus apparent by an inspection. The jurisdiction of the court ought not to be made to depend on the mere intent or belief of the plaintiff. If his good faith is to be justified to any extent by the facts, and subject to inquiry accordingly, the law and practice would be rendered very uncertain in this respect, and present great practical difficulties in the determination of questions of jurisdiction to which it would give rise."

In Robinson v. Brooks, 31 Wash. 60, 71 Pac. 721, it was held that where, in an action in equity to foreclose a lien upon certain wheat, it was found that the right to a lien was lost by the wilful inclusion, in the notice of lien, of items not lienable under the statute, the right to proceed in equity ceased.

In Amick v. Ellis, 53 W. Va. 421, 44 S. E. 257, it was held that where specific enforcement of a contract could not be decreed because it had not been acknowledged for recordation, the contract being on its face void in law for all purposes of equity jurisdiction, the alleged equity jurisdiction was merely colorable or pretended; and that therefore the rule that, having jurisdiction for one purpose, full relief or alternate relief will be given, could not be invoked to warrant a decree in favor of the complainant for the recovery of money paid under the contract.

In Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69, 3 L. ed. 271, it was held that where the only ground of equitable jurisdiction was the discovery of facts solely within the knowledge of the defendant, and the defendant, by his answer, disclosed no such facts, and plaintiff supported his claim by evidence in his own possession, unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the established rules limiting the jurisdiction of courts required that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law.

In Dowell v. Mitchell, 105 U. S. 430, 26 L. ed. 1142, it was held that where, in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage, it was found that such mortgage was not a lien, a court of equity was without authority to render a decree upon the notes which the invalid mortgage was intended to secure. The court said: "The rule is, that where a cause of action cognizable at law is entertained in equity on the ground of some equitable relief sought by the bill, which it turns out cannot, for defect of proof or other reason, be granted, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed further, and should dismiss the bill and remit the cause to a court of law."

In Union Stock Yards Co. v. Nashville Packing Co. 72 C. C. A. 195, 140 Fed. 701, it was held that where, upon removal of a cause into a United States court, the complainant elected to proceed with it as one of equitable cognizance, and failed to establish its claim to an injunction, the case could not properly be retained for the purpose of awarding damages for breach of covenant, or to determine the right of possession of land, since the remedy in a court of law was entirely adequate for either of those purposes.

In Van Raalt v. Schneck, 159 Fed. 248, it was held that where the evidence was insufficient to establish the right to an injunction against infringement of a trade symbol, equity would not retain jurisdiction for the purpose of awarding damages, the complainants having a complete and adequate remedy at law.

—uncertainty.

In Sims v. McEwen, 27 Ala. 184, it was held that where a case for specific performance was not made out, the agreement as charged being vague and uncertain, and it being doubtful whether the other party could fulfil the terms of the contract on his part, the complainant could not properly obtain compensation for services performed by him under the contract, in the absence of any special equity.

In Zeringue v. Texas & P. R. Co. 34 Fed. 239, it was held that where a contract was too indefinite to be the subject of a bill and decree for special performance, the bill could not be retained for the purpose of awarding compensation in damages. The court said: "Section 723, U. S. Rev. Stat. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 583, provides that 'suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States in any case where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law.' Under no head of chancery jurisdiction can a court of the United States sustain a bill in equity to obtain only a decree for the payment of money by way of damages when the like amount can be recovered at law." It may be noted, however, that the statute invoked has, in other instances, been held to be declaratory of a familiar principle, rather than restrictive of the equity jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

Compare Aday v. Echols, 18 Ala. 353, 52 Am. Dec. 225, under title, "Existence of other grounds for equitable relief," infra.

But see Paris v. Haley, 61 Mo. 453, under heading, "Instances in which relief has been granted," infra.

In Harrison v. Deramus, 33 Ala. 403, it was held that where the complainant seeking the rescission or specific performance of a contract to convey lands failed to establish any right to such relief, his right to rescind having been lost by his conduct after notice of the deficiency in the quantity of the lands, and his right to specific performance having been destroyed by his acceptance of a conveyance of all the lands mentioned in the contract to which the defendant ever had any title, after notice that it did not embrace all the lands in the original contract, his bill will not be retained, in the absence of any special equity, for the purpose of awarding damages or compensation on account of such deficiency.

In Findley v. Koch, 126 Iowa. 131, 101 N. W. 766, it was held that where complainants were not entitled to specific performance because of want of diligence in asserting their rights under a contract, they were not entitled to damages for its breach.

In Alger v. Anderson, 92 Fed. 696, it was held that where a bill for the rescission of a contract to purchase lands upon the ground of fraudulent representations failed of its purpose by reason of laches of the complainant, compensation for the portions of the property for which title had failed could not be awarded. The jurisdiction of the United States courts as courts of equity is elaborately considered, the author of the opinion announcing as his conclusion that, "in the exercise of the limited equity jurisdiction in the courts of the United States, a bill which makes a case for equitable relief, and also in the alternative for the enforcement of a legal right, cannot be sustained when no part of the equitable relief is granted, as this would be to exercise jurisdiction over a purely legal demand, as to which the right of trial by jury is secured."

In Beers v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 73 C. C. A. 273, 141 Fed. 957, it was held that where complainant's right to an injunction against the maintenance of elevated railway tracks in the street in front of his lots was lost by laches, equity could not determine his damages and order their payment. The court said: "The ascertainment in equity, as an alternative for an injunction, of the damages suffered, is only the form that a decree may take when, within the discretion of the court, an affirmative injunction ought not to be issued. But for a decree of this form, as well as for a decree for an injunction, there must first be established a case in equity. Until that time the party obtains no foothold in equity. Laches prevents such foothold. Laches being disclosed, no cause in equity exists, the party being already remitted, at the time of the filing of the bill, to his remedies at law."

In Kessler v. Ensley Land Co. 123 Fed. 546, it was held that where stockholders seeking to set aside conveyances of property of the corporation failed, by reason of laches, to obtain the relief sought, they were not entitled to a personal judgment for the damage and loss which the corporation and its stockholders had suffered by reason of the transactions complained of. The court said: "Such relief . . . is merely incidental to the equitable cause of action; and, when that fails, the bill should not be retained to administer relief which is merely incidental, and ordinarily a matter purely of legal cognizance."

—statute of frauds.

In Murdock v. Anderson, 57 N. C. (4 Jones, Eq.) 77, it was held that where, on account of the insufficiency, under the statute of frauds, of the writing relied upon to establish the contract, equity declined to decree specific performance, it could not assume jurisdiction to decree the repayment of the purchase money, the complainant having an adequate remedy at law.

But compare Paris v. Haley, supra, under heading, "Instances in which relief has been granted," infra.

Where claim is found wanting in equity.

In Hurlbut v. Kantzler, 112 Ill. 482, it was held that a person contracting with the lessee for the assignment of a lease, knowing that such assignment could not be made without the express consent of the lessor, was not entitled to damages in a court of chancery in lieu of specific performance.

In Farson v. Fogg, 205 Ill. 326, 68 N. E. 755, it was held that a bill to compel specific performance of a contract to pave a public street, which contract was known by the parties not to be performable without the consent of the city, could not be retained for the assessment of damages, the court saying: "Where the bill makes no case for a specific performance, and shows no ground for such relief, a court of equity will not decree damages, because a court of equity does not sit for the purpose of entertaining bills whose only object is to secure damages. The remedy in such case is at law, and not in equity."

In Sayer v. Brown, 7 Ind. Terr. 675, 104 S. W. 877, it was held that where specific performance of a contract unlawfully to get title to Indian land was refused on account of its illegality, no recovery could be had of a sum of money advanced under the agreement.

In Reinicker v. Smith, 2 Harr. & J. 421, where specific performance of a contract was refused upon the ground of imbecility of the other contracting party, it was held erroneous to decree that his heir should refund the consideration paid.

In Banaghan v. Malaney, 200 Mass. 46, ante, 871, 85 N. E. 839, it was held that, upon refusal of specific performance of a contract to sell real estate because of inequitable conduct on the part of complainant, the bill need not be retained for the assessment of damages, although this might have been done, but complainant may be left to his remedy at law.

In Welles v. River Raisin & G. River R. Co. Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 35, it is held that the court will not aid the party at law to whom it has refused relief in equity on account of the illegality of the transaction.

In Bourget v. Monroe, 58 Mich. 563, 25 N. W. 514, the rule that equity cannot grant damages unless there is some case of equitable relief made out also, to which the damages would be applicable or subsidiary, was applied in a case where specific performance of a contract whereby a man agreed to let his married daughter and her family live on his property if she would support him during his life, and also promised that the lands should be hers after his death, was denied to the daughter's husband, who claimed as her heir, upon the ground that the daughter's death had made performance impossible, even had not the character of the duties to be performed made a decree impracticable.

In Scott v. Billgerry, 40 Miss. 119, it was held that where the contract in question, which was one for the sale of a quantity of cotton, was one of which equity will not decree specific performance, the complainant was not entitled to a decree for the value of the property, since courts of equity do not entertain jurisdiction to give redress by way of compensation or damages for breach of contract or other wrongs, where these are the sole objects of the bill, and are not incidental to other relief, unless some peculiar equity intervenes.

In Roller v. Murray, 107 Va. 527, 59 S. E. 421, it was held that a complainant to whom specific performance was not granted on the ground that the contract was champertous could not recover reasonable compensation for his services upon a quantum meruit, the court saying: "Any claim upon a quantum meruit is a legal demand, to be asserted at law. The doctrine that when a court of equity once acquires jurisdiction of a cause, it will do full justice between the parties, though, in doing so, it has to administer and decide rights properly pertaining to the common-law jurisdiction, does not apply to the case of a bill which goes out of court on a demurrer for want of equity."

In Marks v. Gates, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 317, 83 C. C. A. 321, 154 Fed. 481, it was held that where, on account of the unconscionable character of a contract whereby one party agreed, in consideration of the cancelation of a debt and cash advanced, to convey to the other a one-fifth interest in any and all property which he should acquire, either by location, purchase, or otherwise, in the territory of Alaska,—there being no limit as to the time or manner of acquisition of the property, or as to its character or value,—specific performance was denied, the facts presented in the complaint were not such as to entitle the court to retain the case for the assessment of such damages as the complainant might have sustained for breach of contract. The court said: "A court of equity will not grant pecuniary compensation in lieu of specific performance unless the case presented is one for equitable interposition, such as would entitle the plaintiff to performance but for intervening facts, such as the destruction of the property, conveyance of the same to an innocent third person, or the refusal of the vendor's wife to join in a conveyance."

But compare Bullock v. Adams, 20 N. J. Eq. 367, under title, "instances in which relief has been granted," infra.

Failure to establish ground of jurisdiction.

In Crowell v. Young, 4 Ind. Terr. 36, 64 S. W. 607, it was held that where a Federal court was without jurisdiction of a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage by reason of the lands covered thereby being Indian lands, it could not have decreed the payment of the note thereby secured, because the proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage alone gave jurisdiction to equity, and when that fell the whole case in that forum fell with it.

In Love v. Morrill, 19 Or. 545, 24 Pac. 916, it was held that where the proof in a suit brought under a statute giving courts of equity jurisdiction over disputes as to boundary lines showed that the only controversy between the parties was the legal title to a strip of land claimed to have been acquired by adverse possession, equity could not determine the controversy, but should remit the parties to their remedy at law.

In Denny v. McCown, 34 Or. 47, 54 Pac. 952, it was held that the rule that a court of equity retaining jurisdiction of a case for one purpose will retain it till complete justice is administered had no application to a case where, on account of the invalidity of a trust deed sought to be foreclosed, its jurisdiction could not be legally exercised; and that therefore it could not award a money judgment upon the indebtedness secured.

In Marsh v. Haywood, 6 Humph. 210, it is said that where a bill in equity is dismissed for want of jurisdiction, all the power of the court also fails, except to give judgment for costs.

See also Russell v. Hayner, 64 C. C. A. 424, 130 Fed. 90, under title, "Where pleadings are defective," supra, and Boston Blower Co. v. Carman Lumber Co. 94 Va. 94, 26 S. E. 390; Vendome Turkish Bath Co. v. Schettler, 2 Wash. 457, 27 Pac. 76; Hildebrandt v. Savage, 4 Wash. 524, 30 Pac. 643, 32 Pac. 109; Robinson v. Brooks, 31 Wash. 60, 71 Pac. 721, under heading, "Where proof fails to establish case," supra.

Instances in which secondary relief has been granted.

There are, as hereinbefore stated, a few decisions—some of them clearly of a sporadic character—in which some show of right in a complainant who has failed to establish his claim to equitable relief seems to have led the court to afford relief which might have been obtained at law; and which appear to constitute an irreconcilable minority.

In Downes v. Bristol, 41 Conn. 274, where the rescission of a contract for the exchange of lands was sought on the ground of fraud, but it appeared that the alleged fraudulent representation was made in good faith, and that compensation might be made in damages for the difference in value, it was held that the failure of the plaintiff to establish a right to rescission did not divest the court of jurisdiction to decree the payment of damages.

In Green Bay Lumber Co. v. Miller, 98 Iowa, 468, 62 N. W. 742, 67 N. W. 383, it was held that where an action for the foreclosure of a mechanics' lien was properly brought in equity, the complainant was entitled to judgment for the amount due even though the lien should prove to be invalid.

In Atkinson v. Felder, 78 Miss. 83, 29 So. 767, it was held that where a mortgagee had properly brought a suit in equity for the recovery of the debt and the foreclosure of a mortgage given on lands of a wife to secure the joint note of herself and husband, the fact that the mortgage was adjudged void because of the insanity of the wife did not preclude the court from giving a recovery for the money claimed, though thereby adjudging a purely legal right.

In Paris v. Haley, 61 Mo. 453, it was held that where a bill to obtain the specific performance of a contract prayed in the alternative for its rescission, and specific performance was refused because of the uncertainty of the contract and the failure to reduce it to writing, the court would proceed to grant complete relief. The court said: "It seems to be well established that a court of equity will not turn a party out of court, to pursue his remedy at law, where complete justice can be done by the court of equity, and this, although, in its progress, the court may decree on a matter cognizable at law. . . . In this case the plaintiff has the legal title and the defendant's notes, and it would seem that, so far as he was concerned, his remedy at law was ample; but the court having jurisdiction of the case, as stated in the bill, and asking in the alternative for rescission, the court should proceed to settle the controversy, and we think it may be most equitably settled in the mode above suggested."

In Bullock v. Adams, supra, it was held that where specific performance was refused to a complainant who was in default, the court might, under the prayer for general relief, have directed the money paid to be refunded to the complainant although such money could be recovered at law: upon the principle that when a matter is before the court properly for relief which can only be had in equity, the court will grant such other relief, arising out of the facts of the case, to which the party is entitled, although the relief can be had at law.

In Wolcott v. Sullivan, 1 Edw. Ch. 399, it was held that where a mortgagor had filed a bill against a mortgagee who was also the lessee of the mortgaged premises, requiring an account of what was due for principal and interest, and also on the lease for rents, although it turned out that he was not entitled to a credit on his bond and mortgage for the rents claimed to be due, he had a right to an account of such rents, and, as chancery had obtained jurisdiction for one purpose, it would retain it for all the purposes of the suit; it being as competent to give relief in relation to the rent as a court of law. On appeal, in 6 Paige, 117, in which the decree was affirmed, it was said that the objection that complainant had an adequate remedy at law for the recovery of his rent was not made in defendant's answer in such a form as to enable him to take advantage of it at the hearing, and that the question as to complainant's right to the rent having been fully litigated by both parties, it would have been improper to turn complainant around to a suit at law for the recovery of such rent.

In Salinas v. Ellis, 26 S. C. 338, 2 S. E. 121, the right of a complainant in a foreclosure action to a personal judgment for the indebtedness was recognized, although it was held that a judgment of foreclosure was rendered improper by the fact that the lien of the mortgage had been discharged by a tender.

In Evans v. Kelley, 49 W. Va. 181, 38 S. E. 497, it was held that where, in a suit brought to enforce the payment of a balance of purchase money due as a lien upon two tracts of land, upon one of which it was a purchase-money lien, and upon the other of which security had been given therefor, it developed that, by virtue of a release postponing the lien on the second tract to another lien, such tract, when sold, having failed to bring more than enough to pay such other lien, the first tract was relieved from the lien, a personal judgment upon the note, secured against the surety thereon, was proper, the court saying: "It is now firmly established as a rule of equity that although the relief originally sought is denied, yet, having assumed jurisdiction, equity, to avoid further litigation, will grant relief between the parties to the suit, although such relief is legal in its nature."

In Andrus v. Berkshire Power Co. 77 C. C. A. 248, 147 Fed. 76 (writ of certiorari denied in 203 U. S. 596, 51 L. ed. 333, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784), it was held that where, in a suit to restrain the flooding of complainant's land by the construction of a dam, it appeared that plaintiff's conduct, indicative of his willingness to accept compensation, was such that he was not entitled to an injunction, the court would proceed to ascertain the damages to which he was entitled by reason of the construction, maintenance, and use of the dam.

—existence of other grounds for equitable relief.

There are, however, cases in which the granting of a money decree, even though the complainant fails to establish his claim to the primary equitable relief sought, is clearly rendered proper by the inadequacy of the remedy at law or the presence of some other recognized ground of equity jurisdiction. These cases are in no way at variance with the doctrine hereinbefore stated to be supported by the weight of authority.

In Aday v. Echols, 18 Ala. 353, 52 Am. Dec. 225, it was held that when a purchaser who has entered into possession, and who, upon the faith of the contract, has made valuable improvements upon the land, afterwards files his bill to compel a specific performance, but fails to establish his case with sufficient certainty to entitle him to that relief, the bill may be maintained for the purpose of allowing him compensation, if he has not a full and adequate remedy at law,—as by reason of the insolvency of the other party.

In Glinski v. Zawadski, 8 Fla. 405, it was said that, as a general rule, when specific performance is denied, the jurisdiction of equity terminates, so that compensation cannot be decreed; but that there are exceptional cases in which, whenever a clear equity is found to have arisen between the parties to the contract, growing out of its peculiar character or nature, there can be no doubt that the court may retain the bill for the purpose of having that equity properly adjusted.

In Bourke v. Hefter, 202 Ill. 321, 66 N. E. 1084, it was held that where a bill to foreclose a trust deed and a cross bill praying for its cancellation made a case cognizable in equity, the court, though finding that the party liable on the notes which the trust deed purported to secure was not bound by such trust deed, had power to enter a personal judgment for the amount found due on the notes, and to require its payment as a condition to setting aside the trust deed.

In Nudd v. Powers, 136 Mass. 273, where a bill brought for a sale of an estate, upon the rents of which a charge was created by will, failed to obtain that form of relief, it was held that it might be sustained to declare and enforce the charge, the legal remedies for which, if any, are either derived from equity, and therefore do not take away its jurisdiction, or are inadequate.

In Hawley v. Sheldon, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 420, it was held that where equity refused to decree specific performance, upon the ground of want of mutuality in the contract, it would nevertheless retain the bill for the purpose of ascertaining the costs of the improvements made by the complainant upon the property, and adjusting mutual accounts, the court saying that, from the changes in the title to the property and the singularly indefinite manner in which the business had been transacted, the remedy of the complainant at law would perhaps be difficult and less plain and adequate.

In Anthony v. Leftwich, 3 Rand. (Va.) 238, it was held that where, under the circumstances of the case, a contract ought not in equity to be specifically executed, compensation for improvements made upon the faith of the contract may be awarded.

Effect of Code provisions.

The effect of statutory changes providing for the granting of judgments at law and equitable relief by the same tribunal, and abolishing distinctions in the form of pleadings, may be best traced in detail in the decisions hereinafter set forth. It may here be stated, however, that the inherent distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity are still recognized; and the effect, broadly stated, of such statutory changes, is to permit the retention of a case in which the allegations of the complaint to which an answer has been filed disclose, in addition to a claim for equitable relief, the existence of a cause of action at law. (See cases under heading, "—as warranting relief on legal cause of action," infra.)

But where the complaint, as framed, discloses only a cause of action in equity, the court cannot, upon denying equitable relief, enforce a legal right disclosed by the proof. (See cases under heading, "Rule that pleadings must disclose legal cause of action," infra.) Especially is this true where the right of action at law is inconsistent with the claim to equitable relief. (See Kinsey v. Bennett, 37 S. C. 319, 15 S. E. 965, infra.) And the principle will not be extended to special proceedings, the statutory provisions relative to which do not contemplate the use of the proceeding for the purpose of granting legal relief where the right to the relief primarily sought is not established. (See Dudley v.

Third Order of St. Francis, 138 N. Y. 451, 34 N. E. 281; Weyer v. Beach, 79 N. Y. 409; McDonald v. New York, 58 App. Div. 73, 68 N. Y. Supp. 462; Castelli v. Trahan, 77 App. Div. 472, 78 N. Y. Supp. 950; Gallick v. Engelhardt, 36 Misc. 269, 73 N. Y. Supp. 309; Sinclair v. Fitch, 3 E. D. Smith, 677, infra.)

But the continued recognition of the inherent distinction between actions at law and in equity notwithstanding the changes effected by the adoption of the reformed procedure is best shown by a number of cases which appear to warrant the statement that where the allegations upon which equitable relief is sought prove to be absolutely ungrounded, the case will not be retained as to do so would be to permit a plaintiff at will to convert a cause of action at law into one in equity. (See Miller v. St. Louis & K. C. R. Co. 162 Mo. 424, 63 S. W. 85; W. J. Johnston Co. v. Hunt, 66 Hun, 504, 21 N. Y. Supp. 314; Whyte v. Builders' League, 35 App. Div. 480, 54 N. Y. Supp. 822; Rosenheimer v. Standard Gas Light Co. 39 App. Div. 482, 57 N. Y. Supp. 330; Clark v. Smith, 90 App. Div. 477, 86 N. Y. Supp. 472; American Ice Co. v. New York, 51 Misc. 114, 100 N. Y. Supp. 748; Schroeder v. Ennis, 5 N. Y. S. R. 881, hereinafter set forth at length.)

—in general.

In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Perry, 37 Ark. 164, it was held that where actions are begun in chancery which, upon their face, appear to be exclusively and wholly cognizable at law, they may be transferred to the law side of the court on motion of either party, or by the court on its own motion; failure to do so, however, without a motion by parties for the purpose, not being reversible error; but that, if there be any equitable element to which the jurisdiction of a court of chancery may attach, then the court in the same proceeding may administer all legal relief connected with the subject-matter and essential to do full and complete justice at once to all parties before it.

In Sadlier v. New York, 185 N. Y. 408, 78 N. E. 272, it is said, in discussing the changes effected by the Code: "The inherent, fundamental differences between actions at law and actions for equitable relief, such as determine whether a trial of the action by jury is a matter of right, and otherwise affect the interests of litigants, have not been and cannot be abolished. For such reason and for the very simple reason that a person must, in his complaint, as we have seen, state the facts constituting his cause of action, a plaintiff who brings an action for equitable relief must establish such cause of action or his complaint should be dismissed. It is, therefore, frequently held that damages, as in an action at law, cannot be given in an action in equity, where the plaintiff has failed to establish his right to equitable relief."

—as warranting relief on legal cause of action.

In Becker v. Superior Ct. 151 Cal. 313, 90 Pac. 689, it was held that the court had jurisdiction, in an action to establish a mechanics' lien, although the amount involved was less than the jurisdictional amount for which an action at law might be maintained, to render a personal judgment for the amount due, though the lien failed, since in California legal and equitable remedies may be pursued and granted in a single action; and the fact that the equitable relief is not obtained furnishes no reason in itself for the refusal of legal relief in the same action,—overruling Miller v. Carlisle, 127 Cal. 327, 59 Pac. 785.

A like decision was made in Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 91 Pac. 983.

In Leuschner v. Duff, 7 Cal. App. 721, 95 Pac. 914, it was held that where complainant failed to obtain specific performance of a unilateral contract on account of the offer having been withdrawn by the defendant before the offer of performance by complainant, the trial court, applying the rule that a court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction of a cause, will grant any relief to which the parties are entitled, properly decreed the restoration to the plaintiff of the consideration paid.

In Jaekel v. Pease, 6 Idaho, 131, 53 Pac. 399, it was held that, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, where foreclosure was denied on account of the invalidity of the mortgage by reason of the certificate of acknowledgment not complying with the statute, the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled under the Code to judgment for the amount of the mortgage debt shown by the pleadings and proof to be due him, against defendants personally liable therefor.

In Marquat v. Marquat, 12 N. Y. 336, it was held, in view of the Code provision that, if the defendant answers, the court may grant plaintiff any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue, that where, in an action to establish an alleged lien for money loaned, the plaintiff failed to establish a case entitling him to the relief specifically demanded, but the evidence showed a loan of money to one of the defendants remaining due and unpaid, the court might give judgment therefor.

In New York Ice Co. v. North Western Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 357, reversing 31 Barb. 72, a suit to reform an insurance policy and to recover judgment for a loss thereon, it was held erroneous to turn the plaintiff out of court on the mere ground that he had not entitled himself to the equitable relief demanded, if there was enough left of his case to entitle him to recover a sum in which he was insured.

In Herrington v. Robertson, 71 N. Y. 280, it was held that where a complaint seeking to establish a lien upon certain property for money advanced towards its purchase was so framed as to present a case for equitable cognizance, and there was no demand in any stage of the case by the defendants that a jury should pass upon the case, the court could then, though the plaintiff failed to establish his right to a lien, give him judgment for the amount of the advance.

In Barlow v. Scott, 24 N. Y. 40, it was held, in view of the Code provisions above referred to, that where the facts alleged in a complaint framed for the specific performance of an agreement, and, in default thereof, for compensation in damages, were not sufficient to justify a decree for specific performance, as they showed that the plaintiff had no valid title or interest, and that the same was in the possession of another party, holding under a good and valid title, the court might decree compensation, although it was conceded that, under the former judicial system, a court of equity would not have retained the suit for such purpose, for the reason that actions for damages only were properly cognizable in courts of law, in which a perfect remedy could be had.

In Cuff v. Dorland, 55 Barb. 481 (reversed on other grounds in 57 N. Y. 560), it was said that the rule is now well settled that in actions brought for equitable relief, and tried before a judge, if there appears to be no ground for granting such relief, the court shall retain the case, and grant such legal relief as may be just; and it was therefore held that where specific performance of a contract was refused because of its imperfect character, and because the circumstances under which it was executed were not of a character to call for its enforcement by the court, the case should nevertheless have been retained for the purpose of awarding to the plaintiff the damages he was entitled to for the nonperformance.

See also, as adhering to the same general doctrine, Seeley v. New York Nat. Exch. Bank, 8 Daly, 400, affirmed in 78 N. Y. 608.

In Pendleton v. Dalton, 92 N. C. 185, it was held that where both legal and equitable redress may be had in the same tribunal and in a single action, and a vendor resists specific performance of a contract as being void under the statute of frauds, the court will proceed to adjudge the return of what he has received, or compensation in value.

In Gordonsville Mill. Co. v. Jones (Tenn. Ch. App.) 57 S. W. 630, it was held that under the Code provision that, when the court at chancery refuses a creditor equitable relief, it may, notwithstanding, award him judgment on his claim, a complainant seeking to set aside an assignment upon the ground of fraud was, although unsuccessful, entitled to a decree for the amount of his debt.

In More v. Ruggles, 15 Wis. 275, it was held that where a summons was sued out for damages for breach of covenant and a petition filed claiming a materialman's lien on a building, the insufficiency of the proceedings for the purpose of enforcing the lien was no reason why the plaintiff should not take a personal judgment.

In Leonard v. Rogan, 20 Wis. 540, it was held that although, in an action to charge the separate estate of a married woman with 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the value of services rendered by an attorney with relation to it, equitable relief was denied upon the ground that the contract was one obligatory upon the married woman at law, judgment might nevertheless be given for the value of such services. The court said: "It by no means follows, because the plaintiff has demanded relief in equity when he should have asked a judgment at law for damages, that his action must be dismissed. Judgments at law and relief in equity are now granted by the same judicial tribunals. The old distinction between legal and equitable remedies is abolished, and the forms of pleading in all civil actions in courts of record are now the same. Rev. Stat. chap. 125, § 1. Except in cases where there is no answer, the plaintiff is entitled to any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue, although it be not the relief specifically demanded. Rev. Stat. chap. 132, § 29; Emery v. Pease, 20 N. Y. 64. If the plaintiff demands relief in equity when, upon the facts stated, he is only entitled to a judgment at law, or vice versa, his action does not, as formerly, fail because of the mistake. He may still have the judgment appropriate to the case made by the complaint. This is going, perhaps, somewhat further than this court has heretofore been required to go, but it is no doubt in strict accordance with the letter and spirit of the statutes referred to, and in harmony with the opinion of the highest court in the state of New York upon the same statutes, our legislature having borrowed the provisions from that state." It was admitted, however, that the defendant would have been entitled to a jury trial had she not waived the privilege by failing to demand it.

In accordance with the doctrine laid down in the preceding case, it was held in Stroebe v. Fehl, 22 Wis. 337, that a complaint which fails to make out a case for equitable relief will not be dismissed on demurrer if it states a cause of action at law for damages.

In Hopkins v. Gilman, 22 Wis. 476, it was held that although specific performance could not be granted of the contract set up in the complaint on account of the incompleteness of such contract in requiring the purchase price to be fixed by arbitrators, nevertheless equity might retain the suit for the purpose of awarding compensation for the value of the improvements.

—rule that pleadings must disclose legal cause of action.

But an allegation of grounds in plaintiff's complaint for equitable relief and nothing else, where proof of such grounds fails, does not permit the court to try without a jury a cause of action at law appearing to arise out of the transaction. Bradley v. Aldrich, 40 N. Y. 504, 100 Am. Dec. 528; Brinekerhoff v. Bostwick, 105 N. Y. 567, 12 N. E. 58. In the latter case it is said: "When a party alleges a cause of action of an equitable nature he must prove one, so far as the question of a trial by jury is concerned, and he cannot escape such tribunal by alleging an equitable cause of action, and, while wholly failing to prove it, obtain a trial by the court of a common-law action arising out of the transaction."

See also to the same effect, Gall v. Gall, 17 App. Div. 312, 45 N. Y. Supp. 248; Green v. Stewart, 19 App. Div. 201, 45 N. Y. Supp. 982; Vincent v. Moriarty, 31 App. Div. 484, 52 N. Y. Supp. 519; Horn v. Ludington, 32 Wis. 73; Wrigglesworth v. Wrigglesworth, 45 Wis. 255.

In Hawes v. Dobbs, 44 N. Y. S. R. 890, 18 N. Y. Supp. 123, it is said: "Where a complaint sets forth merely a cause of action in equity, and equitable relief only is asked for, as was done in this case, even if the proof shows a right to a legal remedy, the plaintiff cannot obtain it in that action. And so, where a complaint is drawn only as in a common-law action, equitable relief cannot be granted to the plaintiff in that action. The clear distinction between equitable and legal causes of action, and the remedies appropriate to them, still exists, and a recovery must be had secundum allegata et probata. This has been stated in many reported cases, among them being Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 540; Bradley v. Aldrich, supra; Mann v. Fairchild, 2 Keyes, 111; Peters v. Delaplaine, 49 N. Y. 302; Graham v. Read, 57 N. Y. 681; Stevens v. New York, 84 N. Y. 296; Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 83; Phelps v. New York, 25 Abb. N. C. 152, 11 N. Y. Supp. 657; Arnold v. Angell, 62 N. Y. 508."

In Toplitz v. Bauer, 26 App. Div. 125, 49 N. Y. Supp. 840, it is said that where a complaint alleges facts sufficient to sustain a cause of action in equity only, and such an action is brought on for trial as an equitable action, if the plaintiff fails to prove the facts entitling him to relief in equity, it is the duty of the court to dismiss the complaint, leaving the plaintiff to commence an action at law to recover for a legal cause of action, if any exists in his favor against the defendant; but that where a complaint alleges facts to constitute a cause of action either at law or in equity, and where, upon the trial before a court of equity, it appears that the plaintiff is not entitled to equitable relief, the court may then, in certain cases, retain the action and order it to be tried as an action at law to enforce a legal cause of action which the facts alleged in the complaint would show existed in favor of the plaintiff.

In Von Beck v. Rondout, 15 Abb. Pr. 48 (affirmed without opinion in 41 N. Y. 619), it was held that an action of a purely equitable nature cannot be retained for the purpose of recovering damages which the complaint does not demand.

In Coit v. Fougere, 36 Barb. 195, it was held that it would be plainly unjust, in a case brought to assert a vendor's lien, and where the right to such a lien was not established, to give the plaintiff a judgment for the unpaid purchase money, carrying 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with it the costs of an action which was defended to resist the enforcement of the lien, and would have been differently defended, or perhaps would not have been defended at all, if its purpose had been simply to recover a judgment for the consideration money of the sale.

In Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey, 166 Ind. 427, 76 N. E. 529, it is said: "Under the Code, where law and equity are administered in the same court, a plaintiff cannot be permitted to deprive the defendant of the right to a jury trial by the making of allegations whereby an equitable issue is tendered, and then maintain the finding on the ground that sufficient facts were shown to warrant a recovery in a court of law."

—instances in which relief obtainable at law has been denied.

In Miller v. St. Louis & K. C. R. Co. 162 Mo. 424, 63 S. W. 85, it was held that where, in an action at law, the answer sets up an equitable defense, in which, however, no equity is found, the court will not retain the case to try on its equity side the purely legal issues that may be in it. The court said: "The uniting of law and equity in one suit, as authorized by our Code, does not confuse the two, but only requires both to be tried in one court; the issues in equity being for trial by the judge as a chancellor, the issues in law by the same judge with a jury."

In W. J. Johnston Co. v. Hunt, 66 Hun, 504, 21 N. Y. Supp. 314 (affirmed on opinion below, in 142 N. Y. 621, 37 N. E. 564), it is held that although it may be within the power of the court, in an action in which both equitable and legal relief are sought upon the same state of facts, to retain the action where the plaintiff fails to show himself entitled to equitable relief, and dispose of the question of legal relief as though the action had originally been brought only for such relief, yet it is discretionary with the court as to whether it will retain the action; and that it is a proper exercise of such discretion to dismiss a suit where the evidence discloses the fact that, at the commencement thereof, the plaintiff was not entitled to any equitable relief.

In Whyte v. Builder's League, 35 App. Div. 480, 54 N. Y. Supp. 822 (affirmed on other grounds in 164 N. Y. 429, 58 N. E. 517), it was held that where an action in equity to compel restoration of certain premises to their original condition, and for an injunction against interference with the plaintiff's use and occupancy thereof, and for damages, failed as an equitable action in its entire scope, the court was not bound to retain it for the purpose of ascertaining whether any damage was sustained by the plaintiffs by any act of the defendant.

In Rosenheimer v. Standard Gaslight Co. 30 App. Div. 482, 57 N. Y. Supp. 330, it was said that upon the denial of equitable relief in an action for an injunction against an alleged nuisance, and for damages, it would have been impossible for the court to retain the case for compensation, and that, if the plaintiff had no right to resort to a court of equity, his complaint would inevitably have been dismissed.

In Clark v. Smith, 80 App. Div. 477, 86 N. Y. Supp. 472, an action to vacate a judgment and recover damages, which was based upon the fact that the plaintiff, after having been sued, paid the amount of his debt and the accrued costs, which payment not coming to the knowledge of the attorney in the case, judgment was taken by default, a majority of the appellate court concurred in the reversal of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages. The justice writing the opinion for reversal said that the plaintiff himself having brought about the condition of affairs complained of was not entitled to equitable relief, and, having failed in his right to equitable relief, could not recover the damages, if any were sustained, since, although the award of damages is incident to the enforcement of equitable rights, it cannot of itself sustain a judgment in an equitable action.

In American Ice Co. v. New York, 51 Misc. 114, 100 N. Y. Supp. 748, it was held that where, in an action to restrain a city from completion of a public improvement until damages should be paid, it appeared that condemnation proceedings to acquire title to plaintiff's property were being prosecuted, the plaintiff was entitled neither to injunctive relief nor a judgment for damages. The court said: "The plaintiff correctly states the rule that, the jurisdiction of equity having once attached, the court may retain the cause for the purpose of awarding full and final relief in the premises. The plaintiff errs, however, in applying that rule to this case. Equity has never attached. The only equitable feature was the claim to injunctive relief. The right to that relief never existed. An action at law cannot be converted into one in equity merely by associating with a claim for damages a prayer for equitable relief which, under no circumstances, could be awarded. The substance of this action rests in the demand for damages. Those damages, whatever they may be, are recoverable in the pending condemnation proceedings." This case, however, after being affirmed without opinion in 122 App. Div. 888, 106 N. Y. Supp. 1115, was reversed in (N. Y.) 87 N. E. 765, upon the ground that the plaintiff, although not entitled to an absolute injunction, was entitled to one conditioned upon the failure of the city to move promptly in the condemnation proceedings.

In Schroeder v. Ennis, 5 N. Y. S. R. 881, it was held that where, in an action to compel the specific performance of an alleged agreement to execute a lease of certain premises, and to enjoin the defendant from taking summary proceedings to remove plaintiff from the premises as holding over after the expiration of his tenancy, it was found that the plaintiff never had a case for submission to a court of equity, the court would not pass upon his alleged legal defense to the action of his landlord. The court said: "It was argued that the court, having once obtained equitable jurisdiction of the case, should retain it for the purpose of deciding all the questions and doing justice between the parties. If this be so, all that a party need do, to transfer his litigation to a court of equity, is to allege grounds of equitable jurisdiction, and, upon the trial, come in with a purely legal cause of action or defense. It must be the facts, and not the allegations, which call upon the court to exercise its equity jurisdiction."

A similar doctrine prevails where the equitable jurisdiction is statutory, as in the case of the enforcement of mechanics' liens. In such case it is held that, where no lien exists, such form of proceeding cannot be resorted to for the purpose of enforcing a mere personal contract between the parties, and the unfounded allegation of the existence of the lien does not authorize the substitution of such proceeding in place of the proper common-law action. See Weyer v. Beach, 79 N. Y. 409; McDonald v. New York, 58 App. Div. 73, 68 N. Y. Supp. 462 (reversed on other grounds in 170 N. Y. 409, 63 N. E. 437); Castelli v. Traham, 77 App. Div. 472, 78 N. Y. Supp. 950; Gallick v. Engelhardt, 36 Misc. 269, 73 N. Y. Supp. 309; Sinclair v. Fitch, 3 E. D. Smith, 677.

In Dudley v. Third Order of St. Francis, 138 N. Y. 451, 34 N. E. 281, it was held that, an action to foreclose a mortgage being a statutory proceeding, and the Code provisions relative thereto indicating that it was never intended to permit the joinder in the complaint of two separate causes of action, one at law, for the recovery of personal judgments on the bond for the debt, and the other in equity, to procure a sale of the land covered by the mortgage, a complaint in a foreclosure action contains only a cause of action in equity, although the giving of the bond is stated; and that therefore, when the plaintiff failed to establish the mortgage, he failed to establish his cause of action in its whole scope and meaning, and the court could not render judgment for the amount of the indebtedness. The court goes on to say that the established rule that when equity has obtained jurisdiction of the parties and the subject of the action it may adapt the relief to the exigencies of the case, even to the extent of rendering a personal judgment in order to prevent a failure of justice, does not apply to a case where it appears that there never was, in fact, any ground for equitable relief whatever, but the sole remedy was an action at law; and it was further said that the question is not one of a right to a jury trial, that mode of trial being waived by the plaintiff when he elects to bring an action for relief both legal and equitable in its nature in respect to the same cause of action, and by the defendant when he omits to insist upon it in the answer by taking a proper objection, which is usually done by a distinct allegation that an adequate remedy exists at law, or by demanding it, or raising the question at the proper time in cases where he is entitled to that mode of trial according to the practice in equity cases.

In Kinsey v. Bennett, 37 S. C. 319, 15 S. E. 965, it was held that although where a complainant brings an action on the equity side of court for the purpose of obtaining some relief which that branch of the court is alone competent to render, and fails to establish his equitable demand, the action will not be dismissed, provided his allegations and proofs are sufficient to show that he is entitled to some legal relief, such rule will not permit a plaintiff, whose cause of action rests upon an alleged breach of trust, it being claimed that the defendant undertook to sell a tract of land conveyed to him for that purpose, and, after applying the proceeds to the payment of certain debts due by the plaintiff, to account for the balance, but who has failed to establish such trust, to have a decree upon the theory of a right of action for the purchase money of the land in question, but he must be remitted to another action upon such distinct and different cause of action.

In Park v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 114 Wis. 347, 89 N. W. 542, it was held that where specific performance of a contract to build and operate a railway was refused because of its uncertainty and the impossibility of making the decree effective, no judgment for damages would be rendered in the absence of proof of an adequate remedy at law. The court said: "It must not be overlooked that, as a general rule, legal rights should be enforced in a court of law, where the constitutional right to trial by jury is preserved. Only in exceptional cases, where unnecessary hardship clearly demands, should courts of equity assume that province."

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

C. O. BORING, Exr., etc., of Franklin J. Pool, Deceased, Resp't,

v.

ELI OTT, Appt.

(— Wis. —, 119 N. W. 865.)

Injunction — fraudulent judgment.

1. Equity will enjoin the enforcement of a judgment secured by perjury where the judgment debtor used diligence, but failed to discover the perjury in time to be available at the trial, or to secure the relief provided by statute in such cases.

Same — evidence.

2. Equity will not restrain the enforcement of a judgment on the ground that it was secured by perjury unless the perjury is established beyond all reasonable controversy by evidence clear, convincing, and satisfactory.

(January 26, 1909.)

Note. — For perjury as ground of relief against judgment, see subject note to Graves v. Graves, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ashland County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought perpetually to enjoin the enforcement of a certain judgment alleged to have been procured by perjury. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was brought to perpetually enjoin the defendant, Eli Ott, from further prosecuting an action in which Ott was plaintiff and the plaintiff herein defendant in the circuit court for Ashland county, and enjoining the entry and enforcement of collection of such judgment or any part thereof out of the estate of F. J. Pool, deceased, and for other relief, which judgment was ordered by this court in Ott v. Boring, 131 Wis. 472, 110 N. W. 824, 111 N. W. 833, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 857, where the facts upon which judgment was ordered are stated. The grounds of action to restrain the entry and collection of this judgment are that the contract between Pool and Ott, made in 1887, and upon which the judgment sought to be enjoined in this action was founded, was rescinded and canceled by mutual agreement between Pool and Ott in 1889, fifteen years before Pool's death, and that Ott concealed such fact from Pool's representatives, to whom it was unknown, and, after Pool's death, asserted his claim against the estate of Pool under such contract, which he represented to be in force and valid against the estate, and by fraudulent representations imposed upon and deceived the representatives of Pool and the court, and secured a judgment by fraud and perjury which was not discovered until the rendition of the judgment of this court heretofore referred to, although every reasonable effort to discover the same was made. Ott answered, denying generally the material allegations respecting misconduct and rescission, and set up the decision in Ott v. Boring, former action, as a bar, and also pleaded lack of diligence in former action.

On the trial of this action the court found as follows:

"That, in the fall of 1889, the defendant, Ott, was discharged by the late Franklin J. Pool from his employ, and a few days later was re-employed by said Pool solely as a clerk, at a salary of $15 per week. That at the time of such re-employment the written contract or letter of October 17, 1887, was by agreement between them, as a condition of such re-employment, mutually canceled, rescinded, and abrogated, and said Ott voluntarily then surrendered up and waived all his rights under the same.

"That soon after the death of said Pool, in July, 1904, said Ott, concealing the fact of such surrender and cancelation from the family of Pool and from the plaintiff, set up a claim under said contract of a quarter interest in the store business left by Pool, and filed with the county court his verified claim for such interest against said Pool's estate. That in the county, circuit, and supreme courts he asserted in his action thereon against said estate that he was entitled to said interest under said written letter or contract, and concealed the fact of such rescission and cancelation, and imposed the said agreement upon the estate and court as valid, and thereby procured a decision of the supreme court in his favor, sustaining and upholding his said claim. Such decision was rendered February 19, 1907. 131 Wis. 472, 110 N. W. 824, 111 N. W. 833, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 857. That said verification of his claim as a valid one, and concealment of said surrender and cancelation, under the circumstances, was a fraud upon said estate and upon the court.

"That prior to August, 1904, when said Ott presented said claim to the family of said F. J. Pool, the family and heirs and executors of said Pool and their attorneys did not, nor did any of them, know, and had never heard, of the existence of said agreement of October 17, 1887. That in August, 1904, was the first time they or any of them ever learned of its existence.

"That between February 19, 1907, and February 22, 1907, the plaintiff's attorneys for the first time discovered that said agreement or letter of October 17, 1887, had been surrendered and canceled in the lifetime of said F. J. Pool, and prior to February 19, 1907, neither the family nor heirs of said Pool nor the executors of his estate, nor their attorneys, nor any of said persons, had known or learned, or had any means of knowing or learning, anything of that nature, and had no reason for believing that any such fact existed.

"That, prior to the trials which were had in the county and circuit courts upon said Ott's claim, the said executor and his attorneys used all reasonable and due diligence to ascertain any and all facts bearing upon the validity of said claim, and ascertained everything which was then ascertainable, and were not negligent in failing to discover the fact of said cancelation which afterwards came to light

"That after the discovery of said new facts between February 19, 1907, and February 22, 1907, the said executor or his attorneys were not guilty of negligence in not applying to the supreme court within thirty days from its decision for an enlargement of its mandate upon the facts then within their possession, or in not applying to the circuit court for a trial under the statute. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"That the issue involved in this action was not involved, tried, and passed upon in the former action of Ott v. Boring, determined as aforesaid by the supreme court on February 19, 1907. 131 Wis. 472, 110 N. W. 824, 111 N. W. 833, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 857."

And as conclusions of law the court found:

"That, in suppressing and concealing the fact of cancelation of said contract, said Ott procured the judgment in his favor in said former action by fraud.

"That the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction against the defendant, perpetually restraining and enjoining him, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, from in any manner enforcing, or taking any steps to enforce, the judgment in his favor rendered or entered or to be entered, in this court under the mandate of the supreme court under said decision of February 19, 1907, in said action of Ott v. Boring, as executor, and to have the lien of the same set aside as a cloud upon the title to any real estate left by said F. J. Pool, deceased, upon which the same might appear to be a lien, and with leave to the plaintiff to apply to the court for a further decree upon the foot of the judgment, compelling the defendant Ott to satisfy said judgment, in whole or in part, if such relief should become necessary to protect the plaintiff or the estate of said F. J. Pool therefrom."

Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the findings, from which judgment this appeal was taken.

Mr. Burr W. Jones, with Messrs. Sanborn, Lamoreux, & Pray and Horace B. Walmsley, for appellant.

Mr. James G. Flanders, with Mr. R. Sleight, for respondent:

Any fact which clearly proves it to be against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a court of chancery.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for appellant seasonably objected to any evidence under the complaint for the reason that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court overruled the objection, and this ruling is assigned as error. The basic ground upon which equity is invoked to restrain execution of the judgment is the alleged fraud and perjury in presenting and maintaining the claim against the estate of Pool when no such claim existed, because the original agreement between Pool and Ott had been canceled and rescinded, and the appellant continued in the employ of Pool under a contract of service only. The ground upon which the plaintiff's complaint can be sustained, if at all, is based upon the allegations of perjury in verifying the claim and sustaining it by committing perjury, diligence on the part of plaintiff on former trial, and failure to discover such fraud and perjury in time to be available in the former action. The claim was presented in the county court, disallowed, case appealed to the circuit court, general denial, statute of limitation and payment pleaded, there disallowed, and, on appeal to this court, reversed, and judgment ordered for Ott. After reciting the facts leading up to the reversal by this court in Ott v. Boring, 131 Wis. 472, 110 N. W. 824, 111 N. W. 833, 11 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A. & E. Ann. Cas. 857, the complaint in the present action sets up facts showing rescission and cancelation of the old contract, promise of surrender by Ott, making of the new agreement by which Ott agreed to continue in the employ of Pool on a salary, the alleged false claim that the old contract had been lost, concealment of it until after Pool's death, and intent to defraud the estate of Pool by the false claim that the contract was still in force, wilfully testifying thereto, and thus obtaining the judgment by fraud and perjury, which this action is brought to enjoin. It is strenuously insisted by appellant under this head that the former judgment is conclusive upon the parties to this action, and cannot be questioned in the instant case; while, on the part of the respondent, it is insisted that, the alleged rescission, cancelation, and perjury committed by plaintiff not having been discovered until after judgment in the former action, such question was not in fact litigated, and therefore cannot be held conclusive upon respondent. It is said that release and rescission are new matters, and must be pleaded; and, not having been pleaded or known to respondent at the time of former trial, he is not precluded by the judgment upon such issues. Of course, the doctrine is too well settled in this court to require citation of authority that the parties to an action are not only concluded by the judgment on all matters litigated, but all that might have been litigated between them upon the subject-matter of the suit, so that all defenses to the cause of action sued upon, whether set up or not, are concluded by the judgment in the same action. This general rule does not seem to be denied by respondent's counsel, but they contend that where a new defense arises, not known to the parties at the time of former trial, and which with reasonable diligence could not have been discovered, and which renders it inequitable and unconscionable to permit the other party to retain the fruits of a victory acquired by deceit and fraud, the general rule does not apply, but that equity will take hold for the purpose of granting relief. This subject was very fully considered in Crowns v. Forest Land Co. 102 Wis. 97, 78 N. W. 433, and it was there held that the bill of review under the old practice no longer obtains under the Code, but that the Code provides a complete system in itself, and that relief, therefore, from a judgment under our practice, must be obtained upon the grounds and in the manner prescribed by the Code. Section 2879, Stat., limits the time within which a motion for a new trial may be made on the ground of newly discovered evidence to one year from the date of verdict or finding. This statute, however, does not deprive a defrauded party of remedy in a proper case. In Stowell v. Eldred, 26 Wis. 504, 507, 508, this court said: "The rule seems to be quite well settled that chancery will relieve against a judgment at law on the ground of its being contrary to equity, when the defendant in the judgment was ignorant of the fact in question pending the suit, or it could not have been received as a defense, or when he was prevented from availing himself of the defense by fraud or accident, or the acts of the opposite party, unmixed with negligence or fault on his part." The foregoing language is approved in Crowns v. Forest Land Co. supra, and other decisions of this court. In referring to this subject in Nye v. Sochor, 92 Wis. 40, 53 Am. St. Rep. 896, 65 N. W. 854, this court holds that relief in equity may be had against a judgment obtained by fraud, mistake, accident, or surprise unmixed with laches or negligence on the part of the suitor asking relief, and that perjury in obtaining a judgment is sufficient ground for equitable relief, where the party applying for relief is without fault. When a proper case is made, an action may be maintained to restrain the enforcement of the judgment. In such cases the action is not for a new trial or to review the judgment, but is directed against the party claiming under the judgment, to prevent the execution of it. So, in the present action, the judgment is conclusive upon the parties to it and upon the subject-matter litigated, and relief can be had only in a direct action upon facts showing a right to enjoin its execution. Crowns v. Forest Land Co. supra; Balch v. Beach, 119 Wis. 77, 95 N. W. 132.

The general rule laid down in the leading case of United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93, applicable to this class of actions, is perhaps not broad enough to cover all cases which might arise where a court of equity would enjoin the enforcement of a judgment. In fact, it would be difficult to formulate any general rule sufficiently comprehensive and accurate to fit all cases. The Throckmorton Case probably comes as near to stating a general rule applicable to cases of the class under consideration as any in the books. In that case it is said: "The acts for which a court of equity will, on account of fraud, set aside or annul a judgment or decree between the same parties, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, have relation to frauds, extrinsic, or collateral to the matter tried by the first court, and not to a fraud in the matter on which the decree was rendered." This court approved the Throckmorton rule in the case of Uecker v. Thiedt, 133 Wis. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

148, 113 N. W. 447, and others, but it was not its intention to exclude all cases not coming within the Throckmorton rule. To do so would be in conflict with other decisions of this court, later considered. Even the Throckmorton Case does not assume to go farther than to state a general rule, and, after stating several instances where equity will take jurisdiction, continues: "There is an admitted exception to this general rule in cases where, by reason of something done by the successful party to a suit, there was in fact no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case. Where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case by fraud or deception practised on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise, or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff, or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent a party and connives at his defeat, or where the attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side,—these and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case are reasons for which a new suit may be sustained to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree, and open the case for a new and fair hearing." Just what fraud "extrinsic or collateral" is sufficient to warrant a court to act is not very clearly defined under the authorities, and, as before observed, necessarily so from the difficulty of prescribing a rule.

It will be seen that the United States Supreme Court in a later case went a step farther than it did in the Throckmorton Case, and extended the rule to any case where, from the facts, it appeared to be against conscience to permit the execution of a judgment. Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589, 35 L. ed. 870, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62. In the above case the fraud consisted in the use of a forged letter in obtaining a judgment, which was not discovered within time to be available by a new trial, and but for the use of such letter the judgment would not have been secured. The court said: "Any fact which clearly proves it to be against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a court of chancery,"—citing several authorities, including the Throckmorton Case. In Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 13 L.R.A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, 25 Pac.

970, 27 Pac. 537, relied upon by appellant, where the Throckmorton rule is approved, the court lays down the doctrine that in some cases a former judgment may be annulled for fraud; and it will be seen by an examination of the authorities that it is not easy to determine what frauds may be regarded extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the first court. The reason of the rule seems to be based upon the idea that there must be an end to litigation, and therefore an issue which has been tried and passed upon by the first court should not be retried in an action to enjoin the judgment; otherwise, litigation would be interminable. While the issue might have been litigated, and, in a sense, was, because the continued existence of the contract was the basis, at least in part, of the recovery, still the fact that there was no adversary trial upon the issue of rescission which would have been a defense if established in favor of Boring is an element which should appeal to the conscience of the chancellor in determining the right to equitable relief. In the Throckmorton Case it is said the fraud must be "extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the first court, and not to a fraud in the matter on which the decree was rendered." It is not easy to see, however, why an issue determined in favor of the prevailing party solely by perjury does not amount to such a fraud, where such perjury was unknown to the defeated party, and could not, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have been discovered. It would seem that a judgment thus obtained is as unconscionable as one secured against a party by keeping him away from court or by other corrupt means, and thereby preventing a fair trial upon the merits. Marshall v. Holmes, supra; Tucker v. Whittlesey, 74 Wis. 74, 41 N. W. 535, 42 N. W. 101; Crowns v. Forest Land Co. 102 Wis. 97, 78 N. W. 433; Zinc Carbonate Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 103 Wis. 125, 74 Am. St. Rep. 845, 79 N. W. 229; Johnson v. Huber, 106 Wis. 283, 82 N. W. 137; Balch v. Beach, 119 Wis. 77, 95 N. W. 132; Stowell v. Eldred, 26 Wis. 504. While in Crowns v. Forest Land Co. supra, the question was one largely of procedure, the court, in no uncertain terms, stated that the new procedure under the Code does not "attempt to devalue the courts of the jurisdiction they formerly possessed to protect the rights of parties when fraud had intervened;" but that the remedy must be pursued in the manner prescribed by the Code. The court said: "Courts of equity under the old régime had the power of control over the parties, and would prevent them from asserting rights based upon judgments tainted by fraud or covin. That power exists to-day, but it 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) must be invoked and enforced in harmony with the true spirit and in accordance with the positive requirements of the new order. . . . But suppose, as in this case, the facts upon which the fraudulent character of the transactions resulting in the judgment sought to be attacked depends were not discovered until the expiration of the year, is the party without remedy? While it may rightly be said that the ground upon which defendant seeks relief is newly discovered evidence, yet it is evidence showing fraud and collusion, concealed by the parties to it, and which, it is claimed, has resulted most harmfully to the defendant. This was a favorite subject of relief in equity."

In Zinc Carbonate Co. v. First Nat. Bank, supra, this court, speaking upon the subject respecting an action to enjoin a judgment, said: "In such independent action the complaint may be spoken of as a bill in the nature of a bill of review, in the sense that it is the pleading on the part of a plaintiff to accomplish, in effect, the purpose of the former bill of review. Strictly speaking, bills of review and bills in the nature of bills of review, as such pleadings were known to the old chancery practice, are not known to the Code." And, after discussing the limitations upon motions to open judgments, the opinion proceeds: "Neither does the limitation upon proceedings by motion to open a judgment upon some ground going to the right of plaintiff to the relief granted militate at all against jurisdiction in equity to protect a person from a judgment obtained against him by fraud." This court again had occasion to consider this subject in Balch v. Beach, supra, and we cannot do better than quote from the opinion: "(1) A court of equity has jurisdiction to relieve against a judgment upon the ground that it is contrary to equity where there is no other remedy upon several different grounds, and among them fraud upon the party seeking the relief by the person who obtained the judgment; such party not being guilty of any inexcusable ignorance or negligence in the matter. Stowell v. Eldred, supra; Barber v. Rukeyser, 39 Wis. 590; Hiles v. Mosher, 44 Wis. 601; Johnson v. Coleman, 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. Dec. 193; Nevill v. Clifford, 55 Wis. 161, 12 N. W. 419; Crowns v. Forest Land Co. supra. (2) The jurisdiction of equity is not exercised to disturb a judgment. That can only be done according to methods provided by the Code. But it acts directly upon the party who is in a position to, and might, if not restrained of his liberty, enforce the judgment, tying his hands so as to prevent him from doing so, thus leaving the judgment good in form, but valueless and harmless in fact. Crowns v. Forest Land Co. supra; Zinc Carbonate

Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 103 Wis. 135, 137, 74 Am. St. Rep. 845, 79 N. W. 229; Johnson v. Huber, 106 Wis. 282, 82 N. W. 137; Ludington v. Patton, 111 Wis. 208, 86 N. W. 571. . . . Above all and over all is the supreme principle to which the vigilant, clean-handed, but wronged, party may resort when all legal remedies fail, and even precedents for an equitable remedy also, fitting the situation with exactness as to facts,—that equity suffers no wrong to go without a remedy; the wrong being of sufficient gravity to be appreciated by the conscience of the chancellor, and application being made to its jurisdiction seasonably and with clean hands. Its power and mastery or invention and the flexibility of its arm enable it to fit an infinite variety of situations successfully where otherwise wrongs would go unrighted. Pom. Eq. Jur. 109. Its administration is guarded and guided by precedents which, by judicial policy, fence in its operations more or less closely according to subjects; but in its nature it is expansive, and so may break away ex necessitate, and set a new mark to meet a new situation, and does not hesitate to do so when otherwise just rights would fail of vindication. Land, Log, & Lumber Co. v. McIntyre, 100 Wis. 258, 69 Am. St. Rep. 925, 75 N. W. 969." The court in Stowell v. Eldred, 26 Wis. 504, held that equity will restrain the execution of a judgment obtained by perjury, and the rule there laid down has never been departed from, but repeatedly approved in subsequent cases by this court. Balch v. Beach, 119 Wis. 77, 95 N. W. 132; Crowns v. Forest Land Co. 102 Wis. 97, 78 N. W. 433; Barber v. Rukeyser, 39 Wis. 590; Hiles v. Mosher, 44 Wis. 601; Nye v. Sochor, 92 Wis. 40, 53 Am. St. Rep. 896, 65 N. W. 854; Jilson v. Stebbins, 41 Wis. 235; Tucker v. Whittlesey, 74 Wis. 74, 41 N. W. 535, 42 N. W. 101.

It is insisted by counsel that the late case of Uecker v. Thiedt, 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447, is in conflict with the Stowell Case. We do not so understand it. In the Uecker Case it appears that there was no fraud which induced the rendition of the judgment, and the court so held. Moreover, it is said in the opinion that there was nothing in the case showing that the judgment attacked was inequitable or unfair. Nor is anything said in the case tending in any way to discredit the Stowell Case or other cases in this court. As we have seen, the Stowell Case is well supported by subsequent decisions of this court, and is not wholly without support in other jurisdictions, as will be seen by an examination of the following cases: Maddox v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 596; Peagram v. King, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 295; Moore v. Gulley, 144 N. C. 81, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(N.S.) 242, 56 S. E. 681, where it is held there must be a conviction for perjury. Nelson v. First Nat. Bank (C. C.) 70 Fed. 526; Galena & S. W. R. Co. v. Ennor, 116 Ill. 55, 4 N. E. 762; Moore v. Parker, 25 Iowa, 355; Glover v. Hedges, 1 N. J. Eq. 113; Jewett v. Dringer, 31 N. J. Eq. 586. It is true there is much conflict in the authorities upon this subject, but we see no reason for departing from the rule heretofore laid down and followed by this court. We believe it is in harmony with the general rules of equity jurisprudence, and best calculated to promote the doctrine so often enunciated by this and other courts, "that equity suffers no wrong to go without a remedy, the wrong being of sufficient gravity to be appreciated by the conscience of the chancellor, and application being made to its jurisdiction seasonably and with clean hands." [119 Wis. 87.]

On the allegations of the complaint, we think it showed a case in equity to enjoin the judgment on the ground that it was obtained solely upon the fraud and perjured evidence of defendant, and that plaintiff could not, with due diligence, have discovered the fraud or perjury in time to be available in the first action. Perhaps no court has gone farther than this in upholding the doctrine that equity allows no wrong to go without a remedy, as evidenced by the language heretofore quoted from the Balch Case. That language is a vigorous statement of the doctrine founded upon sound principles and policy. We believe that no new mark need be set in the present case in holding that the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to state a case for relief in equity. If no case is made by the complaint, it would seem that the language quoted from Balch v. Beach, 119 Wis. 77, 95 N. W. 132, rests in a fiction not capable of practical application. We therefore conclude that the complaint stated a cause of action, and no error was committed in overruling the objection to evidence under it.

2. It is further assigned as error that the findings are not supported by the evidence. It is established by all the authorities that a very high degree of proof in such cases is required. Many cases holding that there must be a conviction for perjury before equity will interfere, while others hold that it must be established beyond reasonable doubt, either by admission, documentary evidence, or by such other proof as to leave no reasonable ground for doubt. Moore v. Gulley, supra; Peagram v. King, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 608, 11 Am. Dec. 793; Woodruff v. Johnston, 29 Jones & S. 348, 19 N. Y. Supp. 861; Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 503; Moore v. Parker, 25 Iowa, 355; Jones v. South, 3 the defendant has a defense which he did not seasonably discover, and is free from negligence in that regard, of course, has no substantial support. It would include a multitude of situations where equity might lay hold to disturb adjudications, leaving no stability to judgments, and defeating the public policy that a time must come as to all controversies when they will be considered at rest; remedies having gone as far in the vindication of justice as is practicable; so far that to go further for the purposes of a situation now and then arising would, in general, do a far greater wrong than to leave the few which are within the realms of mere possibility beyond the boundary of the practicable.

That the unqualified statement contained in the Stowell Case was not guarded as it should have been is suggested by the fact that it has never been since applied to relieve from the effect of mere perjury, but, as to fraud, has been confined to fraud upon the court or fraud upon the defeated party by preventing—within the strict meaning of the term, suggesting physical prevention or something equivalent, not mere failure of disclosure and abuse of fiduciary or trust relations and collusion between the prevailing party and the representative or representatives of the adverse party—him from making his defense. The suggested limitations are vindicated by the settled law as we find it laid down in all the standard text-books and substantially all authorities.

It is laid down that the causes for equitable interference are divided into two major classes: 1st, fraud by the prevailing party; 2d, excusable negligence to present a defense, not attributable to the adverse party. Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 488.

The first class does not relate to fraud respecting the merits and creating the condition in the action passed upon by the court, but fraud extrinsic to the action, either practised upon the court or upon the party. Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 489. That is, some act ulterior to the merits, by which the party is prevented from presenting, or induced not to present, his defense. That includes fraud upon the court by presenting the case for judgment under false pretense of having complied with the law as to giving notice to the adverse party so far as the nature of the case would permit, or fraud upon the party by inducing him to absent himself or otherwise keeping him from the trial either by some false pretense or physical prevention, or keeping him away or intimidating him by threats, or taking judgment contrary to an agreement rendering the making of a defense the adversary has unnecessary, or where the attorney for the defeated party corruptly permitted judgment.

ment to be taken, and like situations. All relate, as will be seen, to purely extrinsic matters.—extrinsic fraud. It would take much time to go into details. Suffice it to say that, in all cases, the element of fraud is extrinsic, that it does not have to do with the merits of the case, as by merely making false proof, wilfully or otherwise.

We do not need to discuss the second major class, as it does not, in any view, include such a case as the one in hand. Such class relates to mere excusable neglect on the part of the person asking relief, not chargeable at all to any wrongful conduct on the part of the person against whom relief is sought. But all such relate to matters of an extrinsic character. The subject is dealt with at length along these lines in 2 Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. §§ 488-496, inclusive, and Black, Judgm. 2d ed. §§ 365-387, inclusive.

So the supreme test of competency for equitable relief is whether the facts constituting the fraud are extrinsic. If they are intrinsic in any sense, competency does not exist. That suggests at once that mere perjury, as in this case, does not satisfy the test.

That was evidently overlooked in the Stowell Case. Consider that with the test we find laid down at § 489 in Freeman on Judgments, 4th ed. vol. 2:

"Whenever an issue exists in any action or proceeding, each of the parties should anticipate that his adversary will offer evidence to support his side of it, and should be prepared to meet such evidence with counter proofs. Where he has an opportunity to do this, and does not avail himself of it, or, though availing himself of it, is unable to overcome the effect upon the court or jury of the evidence offered by his adversary, he cannot, in effect, obtain a retrial of the issue before another tribunal by charging that the judgment against him was procured by perjury; and this has been held to continue to be the rule, notwithstanding the existence of a statute authorizing actions to set aside judgments obtained by means of perjury or subornation of perjury."

And in Black on Judgments, 2d ed. vol. 1, § 372:

"In some other jurisdictions, it is thought that if a party to a suit intentionally procures and produces false testimony, suborning his witnesses to perjury, and conspiring with them to secure a judgment, this amounts to such fraud as will enable the adverse party, if defeated in the suit, to secure an injunction against the judgment. But this doctrine is denied in other states, and indeed, the general current of authority is now in favor of the rule that perjury committed by the successful party or his witnesses at the trial is no sufficient ground for vacating the judgment or enjoining its enforcement."

So firmly established in American jurisprudence is that rule, that it has been recognized as not open to invasion except by legislative authorization, and even in face of a plain statute of Minnesota that "in all cases where judgment has been or hereafter may be, obtained in any court of record by means of the perjury, subornation of perjury, or any fraudulent act, practice, or representation of the prevailing party, an action may be brought by the party aggrieved to set aside said judgment at any time within three years after the discovery by him of such perjury, subornation of perjury, or of the facts constituting such fraudulent act, practice, or representation . . ."—the court regarded the letter of the written law as going to such a dangerous length, as regards equitable interference on the ground of mere perjury in obtaining the judgment, as not to have been intended to apply to a case where the subject-matter was in issue in the action, and the losing party had no right to depend upon the evidence of his adversary to disprove the latter's claim or to establish the former's defense. The reasoning of the court on this subject in Hass v. Billings, 42 Minn. 63, 43 N. W. 797, affirmed in Watkins v. Landon, 67 Minn. 136, 69 N. W. 711, is so logical and so directly in line with the general current of American authority that I cannot do better than to quote from it at length: "Besides the reason that the act is in derogation of the common law, there is another reason for a strict construction, furnished by the consequences to which a large construction would lead. All who are familiar with the trial of causes know how ready the defeated party is, however full an opportunity he may have had to present his case, to charge that the result was brought about by false swearing and perjury of the successful party and his witnesses. That is often the feeling of the defeated party, especially where there is a direct conflict between the testimony on one side and that on the other. Had these defendants been defeated in the first action, they might have felt and alleged that it was through perjury on the part of the defense. Should they be defeated in this action, and their former judgment be vacated by the judgment in this, they might allege that the result was reached through perjury of the opposite party; and so on, ad infinitum, as often as the matter should be tried and a judgment rendered. Where, if the statute allows an action to be brought to set aside any judgment upon the naked allegation of perjury, will be the end of litigation? When will controversies between litigious parties be finally determined? If the statute permits controversies to be in that manner perpetually kept open, it is certainly a very mischievous one. We cannot think the legislature intended to go that length."

Except a very few not well-considered cases here and there, we might call the roll of the state and Federal courts in support of the foregoing. My brethren confess a conflict of authority, but fail to confess the very meager and illogical character of the adjudications out of harmony with what we have seen to exist, and fail to confess that the Stowell Case, as to the particular subject in hand, stands alone in this court, and fail to confess that, in most of the cases where it has been cited, in this and other courts, reference to which is made in the court's opinion, substantially all the references are to situations falling within the remediable class, not such as we now have.

As indicated, I have made reference to substantially all the cases in this court. I will now refer to three of the foreign citations as a type of all. Jewett v. Dringer, 31 N. J. Eq. 586. The sole question was whether the court of original jurisdiction could entertain a bill to review a decree entered upon a remittitur from the supreme court, and it was held not. The court incidentally said that it could entertain a bill to avoid a judgment entered therein and procured by fraud, but what the court had in mind by the term "fraud" is not suggested. Reference to other cases in that court will easily show that mere perjured testimony, given in obtaining the judgment, was not thought of. The case has not, as I view it, the remotest bearing on the situation now under treatment.

In Moore v. Parker, 25 Iowa. 355, the action was for relief from fraud aliunde the trial, facts extrinsic, within the rule we have stated. As in Jewett v. Dringer, supra, no such thing as false testimony in obtaining the judgment is suggested as a proper ground for relief. The same is true of Galena & S. W. R. Co. v. Ennor, 116 Ill. 55, 4 N. E. 762. On the subject now in hand the court said:

"It cannot be allowed as a ground for setting aside a judgment, that there was false testimony given on the trial, or false assertions as to liability, previously made. If this were admitted, there would be little stability in judgments."

Wherein do such authorities support the doctrine of the Stowell Case? If they have any bearing thereon I am entirely unable to discover it. A multitude of authorities such as my brethren seem to think point the opinion might be added to the few cited.

tice in individual cases." [98 U. S. 68, 69, 25 L. ed. 96.]

If we were to take time to indicate with appropriate citations the multitude of cases in the courts of this country where that rule and logic have been adopted, the language of the Federal court being quoted, and it is expressly pointed out that perjury in the case is matter intrinsic, not collateral, and so not within the rule as to relief, this opinion would be extended to a very great length. Pages would be occupied with mere titles of cases and where they may be found. The following are a few of the most striking of such cases, directly on the point: Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 91 Md. 360, 46 Atl. 1077, where not only perjury, but subornation of perjury, was held not to be a ground for relief. To the same effect are Gray v. Barton, 62 Mich. 197, 28 N. W. 813; Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 13 L.R.A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537; Woodruff v. Johnston, 29 Jones & S. 348, 19 N. Y. Supp. 861; Demerit v. Lyford, 27 N. H. 541; Kretschmar v. Ruprecht, 230 Ill. 492, 82 N. E. 836; Graves v. Graves, 132 Iowa, 199, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, 109 N. W. 707, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1104; Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, 40 L. ed. 95, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139; Mahoney v. State Ins. Co. 133 Iowa, 570, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 490, 110 N. W. 1041; Richards v. Moran, 137 Iowa, 220, 114 N. W. 1035; Hass v. Billings, 42 Minn. 63, 43 N. W. 797; Hamilton v. McLean, 139 Mo. 678, 41 S. W. 224; United States v. Flint, 4 Sawy. 42, Fed. Cas. No. 15,121; United States v. Gleeson, 33 C. C. A. 272, 62 U. S. App. 311, 90 Fed. 778; United States v. White (C. C.) 9 Sawy. 125, 17 Fed. 561; Cotzhausen v. Kerting (C. C.) 29 Fed. 821; Ritchie v. McMullen, 25 C. C. A. 50, 47 U. S. App. 470, 79 Fed. 522; Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111, 38 Pac. 49; Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736; Pepin v. Lautman, 28 Ind. App. 74, 62 N. E. 60; Steen v. March, 132 Cal. 616, 64 Pac. 994; Gusman v. Hearsey, 28 La. Ann. 709, 26 Am. Rep. 104; Verplanck v. Van Buren, 11 Hun, 328; Wabash R. Co. v. Mirrieles, 182 Mo. 126, 81 S. W. 437; Neun v. Blackstone Bldg. & L. Asso. 149 Mo. 74, 50 S. W. 436; Friese v. Hummel, 26 Or. 145, 46 Am. St. Rep. 610, 37 Pac. 458; Codde v. Mahiat, 109 Mich. 186, 66 N. W. 1093; Ames v. Snider, 55 Ill. 498; Adams v. Secor, 6 Kan. 542. Later Kansas cases depend on statutory change of the rule.

The treatment by my brethren of Pico v. Cohn, supra, and similar cases, as if such cases recognize fraud of the nature here involved to be sufficient to warrant such an action as this, because they hold "that in some cases a former judgment may be annulled for fraud," and the statement by my brethren that just what is included in the term "extrinsic fraud" is not easily determinable, as if the uncertainty gives range to include perjured testimony in the action,—seems very weak support, since, in the California case referred to, and many that followed it, and the very cases suggesting the uncertainty referred to, all agree that "fraud extrinsic" does not include perjury in the action, but unquestionably excludes it.

Now, a word on the suggestion by my brethren that Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589, 35 L. ed. 870, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, where relief was held proper upon the ground that the judgment sought to be set aside was procured by means of plaintiff therein leading the court to believe that he contracted with the defendant through one Boyd, and that he was duly authorized in that regard in writing,—by producing a letter purporting to have been written by the plaintiff to that effect, which was a forgery, modified the Throckmorton rule. The Throckmorton Case was only incidentally referred to, with nothing to indicate expressly modification of it in any way. However, the case bears all earmarks of having been decided without full appreciation of the situation the court had created. It was probably supposed that the forgery of the instrument, and use of it to obtain the contract, ostensibly on the credit of the plaintiff, not the use of it upon the trial, was the real ground of the mischief, and so was fraud extrinsic. It cannot be thought for a moment that any infraction of the rule—which had existed without question for some thirteen years, and become the law of the land in all Federal and all state courts—was intended. That is rendered unmistakable from the fact that in many cases decided since 1891, when the adjudication in question occurred, the Throckmorton rule is found vindicated in all its integrity, particularly as to the very point in controversy in this case. United States v. Gleeson, supra; Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113–207, 40 L. ed. 95–123, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. 46 C. C. A. 639, 107 Fed. 781.

True, after the Marshall Case a controversy arose as to whether the Throckmorton rule, in some of its aspects, had not been modified by the later case, creating an irreconcilable conflict. The Supreme Court was appealed to in Graver v. Fautot, 22 C. C. A. 156, 46 U. S. App. 268, 76 Fed. 257, to settle the matter, but did not reach the supposed difficulty. In Meehan v. Valentine, 145 U. S. 618, 36 L. ed. 839, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, and again in Corey v. Toland, 154 U. S. 499, 38 L. ed. 1062, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1144, an appeal was made to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment, upon the ground that the lower court committed a serious error of law in adhering to the Throckmorton rule instead of the supposed infraction of it. Both applications were denied. It was expressly affirmed in Hilton v. Guyot, supra, in 1894. It was said in United States v. Gleeson, supra, not to have been displaced at all by Marshall v. Holmes, supra, and for more than ten years it has been regarded as the unquestionable rule for the Federal and state courts. In view of this history, I submit that the decision here cannot be justified upon the ground that the doctrine of the Throckmorton Case has been at all disturbed by the court which decided it.

We now turn to our own decisions and show that the rule so firmly established elsewhere has been unqualifiedly adopted here, in place of the rule in Stowell v. Eldred, 26 Wis. 504.

In Uecker v. Thiedt, 133 Wis. 148, 113 N. W. 447, decided so recently as to be fresh in memory of us all, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Dodge, said:

"Fraud which can be made the basis of an attack upon a solemn judgment of a court of record must have directly induced the rendition of the judgment, not merely have induced or brought about a condition upon the real existence of which the court acted as a basis of its decree,"—citing United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93, and other cases to which I have referred. What was left out to make an unmistakable repudiation of the Stowell Case except the addition, almost necessarily to be inferred, "Stowell v. Eldred, supra, overruled?" The two cannot stand together. How can one say there is nothing said in the later case in any way to discredit the early one, merely because the facts of the two were different, since in both the court intended to state a rule of general application? I leave the reader of our opinions to answer this, each for himself. True, there was no fraud in the Uecker Case, as it turned out. True, the court said: "There was nothing in the case showing that the judgment attacked was inequitable or unfair." But both fraud and inequity were claimed, and it was to the claim the court addressed the rule the same as in the Stowell Case. The fact that in the one it stood the test and in the other it did not, since the measuring tests radically differ, does not make the cases harmonize by the logic I must apply.

refer, the Throckmorton rule was again cited with added definiteness, reaffirming the previous approval thereof. That would seem to firmly entrench it in our jurisprudence. I will not say more, excepting to assert that one or the other of the rules must give way, and that the inconsiderate promulgation in the Stowell Case must be that one if we are to be both in harmony with ourselves and with the great weight of authority elsewhere.

In passing, I should make this further brief reference to cases in my brethren's opinion supposed to support the decision. In Nelson v. First Nat. Bank (C. C.) 70 Fed. 526, relief on the ground of perjury was denied, but such relief was held competent under some circumstances. It was a Minnesota case, obviously governed by the Minnesota statute providing for such relief, which statute has been so restricted, as we have seen, as not to materially avoid the Throckmorton rule.

Moore v. Parker, 25 Iowa, 355, we have referred to. If it supports the decision here, and I think it does not at all, there is a statute on the subject of relief on the ground of fraud, and, moreover, the subject was set at rest in Graves v. Graves, 132 Iowa, 199, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, 109 N. W. 707, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1104, where all previous adjudications were reviewed and the court definitely adopted the Throckmorton rule, saying that perjury in obtaining a judgment is not a sufficient ground for an action of this sort.

Galena & S. W. R. Co. v. Ennor, 116 Ill. 55, 4 N. E. 762, as we have seen, is directly opposed instead of in favor of the position now adopted.

In Maddox v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 596, the case did not go on the question here at issue. The Throckmorton rule in its general aspects was approved, but it was said that if the term "extrinsic fraud," as distinguished from "intrinsic," would bar relief where a judgment is obtained by suppressing evidence which the prevailing party, by his relation to the adverse party, is bound to disclose, fiduciary relations of some sort being suggested, the court would not go that far.

Moore v. Gulley, 144 N. C. 81, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 242, 56 S. E. 681, was governed by a very ancient rule in North Carolina that equity would relieve from a judgment obtained by perjured testimony, conditioned upon the perjury being first established by a due prosecution and conviction. The North Carolina doctrine is recognized in the books as peculiar to that state. Woodruff v. Johnston, 29 Jones & S. 348, 19 N. Y. Supp. 861, cited to the point that relief such as is now sought is proper, the perjury being conclusively proved as by a precedent conviction, directly holds, as we have seen, that such an action cannot be maintained at all. The incidental observation, which attracted my brethren's attention, that there must be a conviction before a new trial can be granted on the ground of perjury, had reference to Holtz v. Schmidt, 12 Jones & S. 327, where there was a motion in the action for a new trial, not an equitable action to avoid the judgment. As to the latter, as we have seen, it is said perjury is not a ground of action at all.

Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 503, as I understand it, is of the same nature. Other cases cited, concluding the list, are either under special statutes, or do not refer to such a situation as we have here, or have been displaced by later decisions.

I will not pursue the matter further. If there is any substantial support for the adherence to the early decision in Stowell v. Eldred, supra, I am unable to find it.

Thus, it seems the court after twice, just recently, having adopted the Throckmorton rule, has put aside the opportunity to say directly what is so plainly said inferentially, that the early case is overruled. No other case stands at all in the way of bringing this court into full harmony with the judicial world.

I personally reassert the rule with as much force as, standing alone, I can, so well stated by Mr. Justice Dodge for the court in Uecker v. Thiedt, supra. Fraud, to be the basis of attack upon a solemn judgment of a court, must be extrinsic, and have directly induced the judgment. Mere perjured testimony creating a fictitious condition upon which the court acted as a real one, resulting in the judgment, is not sufficient.

That rule might now and then render a wrong remediless, but, as the learned Federal court and many of the state courts have said, the contrary rule is fraught with great mischiefs, for it would render strife by means of judicial instrumentalities endless. Hardly a hotly contested action is tried but that the defeated party honestly believes his defeat is attributable to perjured testimony on the other side. In that situation, and with such a rule as I contend against, it would be possible for contest to follow contest, as the Minnesota court aptly said, "ad infinitum, as often as the matter be tried and a judgment rendered."

The foregoing no more infracts the rule, "There is no wrong without a remedy," than, as said by Mr. Justice Shaw, "it does the one that fraud vitiates everything." As in the latter the presumed infallibility of judgments, after ordinary litigation has run its course, displaces the maxim, by es-topping the party from setting up the fraud, closing the mouth on one side and the ear on the other, so it makes right, in contemplation of law, what independently of it, from a mere ethical standpoint, is wrong. As has been said, "There is no wrong without a remedy;" but there is no wrong, in legal contemplation, as to that upon which the law's instrumentalities have set their seal, in the ultimate, of right. Judicia sunt tanquam juris dicta, et pro veritate accipiuntur.

The findings of the trial court should be approved, but the judgment reversed because the proved perjury under the circumstances is not relievable in the manner sought.

I. Introduction.

During the last thirty-five years the courts have been called upon many times to impose liability on landowners for injuries to trespassing children by dangerous, unguarded machinery or agencies, on the theory that they were, to the knowledge of the owner, attractive to the children, who, unable to appreciate their peril, were thus lured to their injury. The rule adopted in those cases favoring liability has come to be known as the "attractive nuisance" doctrine, or the doctrine of the turntable cases. It has provoked an extended discussion, in which there has been some show of temper as well as sentiment.

of Negligence, vol. 1, § 1031, says: "It would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon, baited with stinking meat, so that his neighbor's dog, attracted by his natural instincts, might run into it and be killed; and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it and tempted to intermeddle with it by instincts equally strong, might thereby be killed, or maimed for life. In view of what has preceded, the author regrets that he cannot say, as he said in his first edition, that such is not the law. He limits himself to expressing the opinion that it ought [not] to be the law, and to citing with commendation the few decisions which hold that it is [not] the law. Nevertheless, a few decisions of enlightened and humane courts are found, more or less tending to the conclusion that the owner of any machine or other thing which, from its nature, is especially attractive to children, who are likely to attempt to play with it in obedience to their childish instincts, and yet which is especially dangerous to them,—is under the duty of exercising reasonable care to the end of keeping it fastened, guarded, or protected so as to prevent them from injuring themselves while playing or coming in contact with it." He also refers to the jurisdic-

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants separately demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrers were sustained without leave to amend. Judgment was given for the defendants thereon, and plaintiff appeals.

The action is to recover damages for injuries sustained, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The only questions presented are whether or not the facts show that the defendants were chargeable with neglect of any duty owing by them to plaintiff, and whether or not the facts stated show that the neglect of the plaintiff caused or contributed to his injury. The following is a statement of the facts alleged: The plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was twelve years of age. The defendants were constructing a railroad track in and upon one of the public streets in the city of Oakland. The track was laid to a point near the crossing of Fifty-Sixth street. It was placed in a trench some 2 feet deep, with sharp banks on each side, situated about 2 feet distance from the rails. A push car heavily loaded with steel rails was, by the defendants, negligently left standing on this track in the street, unguarded by any person, uninclosed, unlocked, and unfastened, without any brake or device for stopping it when started. It was of such weight that, when put in motion even on a very slight grade, it could not be readily stopped. The grade of the track at that point descended slightly toward Fifty-Sixth street. This was in the center of a populous residence district of the city where many children lived. The lots abutting the street opposite where the car stood were not inclosed, and children were accustomed to congregate there for play. On that day, and during all the time of the construction of the roadbed and track, children from five to fourteen years of age, with the knowledge and consent of the defendants, were accustomed to congregate upon and around said push car and play upon said car. and defendants then well knew of the danger from said car and track to children in that vicinity. The plaintiff lived with his parents about 250 yards distant from the point where the car was left on the track. Other children at play on said push car had put it in motion. "Plaintiff was then and there attracted to said car by its said condition and appearance and said surroundings as a place of play, and said plaintiff was then and there too young and inexperienced to foresee the danger therefrom, and plaintiff then and there got upon said car with said other children," and, in the course of his play upon the said car, and in an attempt to stop it as it was running down the rails upon which it had been left standing by the defendants, he was caught between the side of tions in which liability is denied as jurisdictions in which property is put above humanity.

In Berry v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 214 Mo. 593, 114 S. W. 27, a turntable case, the court, in reaffirming the soundness of the turntable doctrine, also said: "It seems to us good law and good ethics. To hold otherwise would be to exalt mere money and property and put down humanity—would be to offend against little ones; and there is high authority for the proposition that it were better that a millstone were hung about the neck for drowning purposes than that such offense be given."

On the other hand, in Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 25 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, the court said: "There is no more lawless class than children, and none more annoyingly resent an attempt to prevent their trespasses. The average citizen has learned that the surest way to be overrun by children is to give them to understand that their presence is distasteful. The consequence is that they will roam at will over private premises; and, as a rule, this is tolerated so long as no damage is done. The remedy which the law affords for the trifling trespasses of children is inadequate. No one ever thinks of suing them, and to attempt to remove a crowd of boys from private premises by gently laying on of hands, and using no more force than 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

necessary to put them off, would be a roaring farce, with all honor to the juveniles." In commenting on this language, the court, in Edgington v. Burlington. C. R. & N. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 410, 57 L.R.A. 561, 90 N. W. 95, declared that it was sufficient to say that the hoodlums so described found no immunity or protection in the law; and, as the court interpreted it, their mental acuteness was open to no discount or disparagement. They knew the difference between right and wrong, and understood the meaning of trespass as well as the property owner. Ordinarily, they were at no loss to care for themselves. They disregarded property rights for mere love of mischief, and took risks out of mere bravado or in conscious defiance of moral or legal restraint. When a boy was thus injured, we might pity his folly, but justly say, as the law said, that, having intelligently assumed the risk, he ought not to recover damages.

Great alarm has been shown by some of the courts as to the harmful results which might be expected to follow the adoption of the attractive nuisance doctrine, and the difficulties that would be experienced in applying it. But, in some of these cases, it is evident that the dangers have been much overdrawn.

In Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 267, 43 L.R.A. 148, 31 S. E. 993, the court said of the Stout Case, infra, the first of the turn-the car and the bank of said trench, and his foot was thereby thrown beneath the car wheel and badly crushed. He sues for the damage resulting from this injury.

The contrary not being alleged, it is to be assumed that the defendants had the lawful right, under permission from the proper public authorities, to lay their track in the streets, and leave the push car standing thereon. The car being thus rightfully in the street, the plaintiff had no right to go upon it, or to interfere with it in any way, without the consent of the defendants. He would have been, with respect to the car, technically a trespasser, except for the allegation that children were accustomed to play upon it with the knowledge and consent of the defendants.

We cannot perceive wherein the case presented by the complaint, its absolute truth being unqualifiedly admitted by the demurrer, is to be distinguished from the line of decisions commonly known as the "turntable cases." These cases rest upon the same general principle as those which hold liable the owner of premises over which is a path which, with his knowledge and consent, is frequented by the public, and in which he places a dangerous and concealed obstruction which causes injury to a person passing along the path. See 37 Century Dig. cols. 390-393, for citations. For like reasons, one who places an attractive but dangerous contrivance in a place frequented by children, and knowing, or having reason to believe, that children will be attracted to it and subjected to injury thereby, owes the duty of exercising ordinary care to prevent such injury to them, and this because he is charged with knowledge of the fact that children are likely to be attracted thereto, and are usually unable to foresee, comprehend, and avoid the danger into which he thus knowingly allures them. The leading case on this subject in this state is Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 302, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 666, where it was said: "If defendant ought reasonably to have anticipated that, leaving this turntable unguarded and exposed, an injury such as plaintiff suffered was likely to occur, then it must be held to have anticipated it, and was guilty of negligence in thus maintaining it in its exposed position. . . . A child of immature years is expected to exercise only such care and self-restraint as belongs to childhood; and a reasonable man must be presumed to know this, and required to govern his actions accordingly. . . . And it has been held in numerous cases to be an act of negligence to leave unguarded and exposed to the observation of little children dangerous and attractive machinery which they would naturally be tempted to go about or upon, and against the danger of which action their immature judgment opposes no warning or defense,"—citing cases. The same doctrine was af-table cases, that it, "if carried to the length to which it is sought to be carried, would exact of every property owner the utmost watchfulness, vigilance, and expenditure to guard against hurt to children, else he would be every moment in danger of ruinous damages. It attacks the rights of free use of one's property in lawful business. A railroad liable because it happened to leave a turntable unlocked, as turntables often are, on its own track,—a necessary appliance in a lawful business! Ought a farmer to be liable for failing to put a picket fence around his pond, necessary for his cattle? If he does not, some little boy will climb the fence into the farmer's field, drown in the pond, and the farmer is sued on the same principle. The dam that contains water to turn the mill wheel, having a path around it, shaded with willows, is very alluring to the child and the man. Must the miller enclose it? The canal, with its towpath and frogs, is very attractive to the little boy or girl, and dangerous, too. If a child drown in it is the company liable? How many more instances of things useful in lawful business, and withal very attractive to children, and very dangerous, might be put? And the rule contended for says that if the thing causing the injury be attractive or seductive, the liability attends it. How many things are or may be so to children? 'A child's will is the wind's will.' Almost 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) everything will attract some child. The pretty horse, or the bright red mowing machine, or the pond in the farmer's field, the mill pond, canal, the railroad cars, the moving carriage in the street, electric works, and infinite other things attract the child, as well as the city's reservoir. To what things is the rule to be limited? And where will not the curiosity, the thoughtlessness, and the agile feet of the truant boy carry him? He climbs into the high barn and the high cherry tree. Are they, too, to be watched and guarded against him?"

In Twist v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 39 Minn. 164, 12 Am. St. Rep. 626, 39 N. W. 402, the court said that some of the cases had undoubtedly gone too far. By adopting the extreme or extraordinary standard of duty on the part of the landowner, on the one side, and, on the other side, by attributing the conduct of all children to their childish instincts, so as to exempt them from the charge of contributory negligence regardless of age or mental capacity, it was obvious that the rule of the turntable cases was capable of indefinite and unbounded applicability. To the irrepressible spirit of curiosity and intermeddling of an average boy there was no limit to the objects that could be made attractive playthings. In the exercise of his youthful ingenuity he could make a plaything out of almost everything, and then so use it as to expose himself to danger.

firmed in Callahan v. Eel River & E. R. Co. 92 Cal. 89, 28 Pac. 104. See 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 474, for a full citation of cases. The rule, of course, is not to be confined to turntables, but applies to any attractive and dangerous machinery so placed. 1 Kinkead, Torts, § 26; 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 1270.

It is true that, in this state, the rule has been strictly limited to the particular character of cases mentioned in the Barrett Case. In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 349, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 113, 598, wherein it was held that the owner of a lot was not liable for the death of a boy drowned in a pond on his premises, Mr. Justice McFarland, speaking of the so-called "turntable cases," says: "The rule as thus applied rested on the ground that the immature judgment of a young child could not well determine or provide against the danger of meddling with such machinery, and that therefore the railroad company was liable for legal negligence in erecting it and leaving it exposed as an attraction to children, and a temptation to them to intermeddle with it." It is further stated that the principle of these "turntable cases," while well established in this state, is an exception to the general rule that the owner of land is under no legal duty to keep it in safe condition for others than those whom he invites there.

It is claimed by the respondents that later cases have practically repudiated the rule. An examination of the decisions, however, discloses the fact that in each case there was some feature by which it is distinguishable from cases similar to Barrett v. Southern P. Co., supra, and also from the case at bar. The case of George v. Los Angeles R. Co. 126 Cal. 357, 46 L.R.A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184, 58 Pac. 819, is much relied upon as a case holding to the contrary. It is somewhat difficult to agree to the statement made in that case, that the two instructions there considered were not contradictory of each other, but, conceding that they are not conflicting, it is apparent that the instruction chiefly relied on by respondents included some acts of due care on the part of the defendants in that case which do not appear to have been exercised by respondents here. In that case a boy was injured while playing upon trailer cars allowed by the defendant to stand on the railroad track in a street in the city of Pasadena. The jury were instructed that if they found that the cars were held by brakes of the ordinary kind, set in a manner to hold them unless loosened by someone, and that the only danger connected with the car was one open to the observation, and which could be comprehended by a boy of plaintiff's age and of average intelligence, the plaintiff could not recover. One of the conditions of the instruction was that the jury should find, as it did, that the defendant had exercised care and set the brakes

If all this was to be charged to natural childish instincts, and the owners of property were to be required to anticipate and guard against it, the result would be that it would be unsafe for a man to own property; and the duty of the protection of children would be charged upon every member of the community except the parents or the children themselves. The plaintiff was denied recovery in this case on the ground of contributory negligence upon the part of the injured child, who was over ten years of age.

"We did not mean by this," said the court in Stendal v. Boyd, 67 Minn. 279, 69 N. W. 899, "that we would not apply the doctrine to any but 'turntable cases,' but merely that we would not extend the doctrine to cases which, upon their facts, do not come strictly and fully within the principle upon which those cases rest. We would not extend it to an ordinary case of a landowner merely allowing a pool or pond of water to stand on a vacant lot. To bring a case of such a pond within the principle of these cases it would have to be exceptional and peculiar in its circumstances."

In Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 497, the court said a very practical difficulty that confronted the attempt to lay down any legal rule that depended for its limitations upon the attractiveness of objects to children of tender years lay in the extreme improbability that any man, however prudent, would be able to foresee what might or might not be attractive to children.

In Conrad v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1129, 61 S. E. 44, the court said: "We are not unmindful of the peculiarities and frailties of children, nor insensible of the imperious duty, founded upon considerations of humanity and public policy, to throw around them every just and wholesome safeguard; and it would be highly repugnant to our sympathies and natural impulses to withhold from a crippled child any possible right the law gives him; but it is not the province of courts to make laws, or give rights not conferred by law, and we could not do so in this instance without enunciating a principle which, carried to its logical results, would impose an extensive and burdensome restraint upon the dominion of owners over their own property."

The courts denying the soundness of the attractive nuisance doctrine do not assert that the children should look after themselves, but the position taken in these cases is that parents have the duty primarily of looking after children, and that society has a right to expect that it will be performed, and to act accordingly. Iamurri v. Saginaw City Gas Co. 148 Mich. 27, 111 N. W. 884.

so that the car would be held in place. In the present case the allegation is that the car was negligently left unguarded, uninclosed, unlocked, and unfastened. The distinction is pointed out in Loftus v. De-hail, 133 Cal. 217, 65 Pac. 379. It is that the "turntable cases" rest in part upon the proposition that the danger created by the act of the owner could be easily removed by the simple device of locking or fastening the dangerous machinery, and that, while the owner of such machinery is not held to the exercise of great care in protecting it against the trespasses of children, it is required to exercise ordinary care to that end. In Studer v. Southern P. Co. 121 Cal. 404, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39, 53 Pac. 942, the court was not considering the effect of the allegations of a complaint admitted to be true by a demurrer, and averring that the defendant was negligent, and that the child was too young and inexperienced to foresee the danger, but was considering the conceded fact that the boy was of ordinary capacity and intelligence, and the undisputed evidence which the trial court had held sufficient to establish contributory negligence on his part. Many other cases are cited by the respondents in which similar questions arising upon the evidence were considered, and in which it was held that, under the proof made, the child was guilty of contributory negligence either in exposing himself to the danger or in failing to avoid it. Tucker v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 136 N. Y. 668, 33 N. E. 335; Merryman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 634, 52 N. W. 545; Carson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 96 Iowa, 583, 65 N. W. 831; Brown v. European & N. A. R. Co. 58 Me. 384; Twist v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 39 Minn. 164, 12 Am. St. Rep. 626, 39 N. W. 402; Kaumeier v. City Electric R. Co. 116 Mich. 306, 40 L.R.A. 385, 72 Am. St. Rep. 525, 74 N. W. 481. It is, of course, possible in any case that the evidence may show that a child of twelve years of age is guilty of contributory negligence. It is not at all improbable that the evidence in this case would be strongly to that effect. The defendants did not see fit to await the coming in of the evidence, but interposed a demurrer which admits the truth of the allegations of the complaint. The cases involving a consideration of the effect of undisputed evidence showing negligence on the part of the child or evidence upon which a jury has so decided are not applicable to the present case.

It is contended that the car was not in itself dangerous, and Kaumeier v. City Electric R. Co. supra, is cited as holding this proposition. It may be admitted that such a car would not be dangerous when not in motion. The same is generally true of any ordinary machinery. But we cannot agree

In Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Co. 50 W. Va. 457, 55 L.R.A. 911, 88 Am. St. Rep. 884, 40 S. E. 410, the court said that the doctrine of the turntable cases shifted the duty of watchfulness and care from the shoulders of parents, where the Creator had placed it, to the shoulders of the landowners using their property to make a living; and thus materially detracted from the full ownership of property, sacred under the Constitution. It was an infringement upon the right of property.

In some of the cases holding that there is no rule of the common law upon which the doctrine can be founded, it is suggested that the proper remedy is a resort to the legislature.

In Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 862, the court said that the common law applied alike to all landowners under like conditions, and that it would be an anomaly to hold that a doctrine or rule of common law which had its origin before there were either railroads or turntables applied only to railroad companies in the use of their lands on which they had dangerous machinery. While the courts should and did extend the application of the common law to the new conditions of advancing civilization, they might not create a new principle or abrogate a known one. If new conditions could 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not be properly met by the application of existing laws, the supplying of the needed laws was the province of the legislature, and not of the judicial department of the government. The legislature could change the common law as far as it might be necessary to regulate the use of turntables and other dangerous appliances, and leave untouched the common-law rights of the ordinary landed proprietor.

In Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 63, 38 L.R.A. 573, 66 Am. St. Rep. 859, 41 S. W. 62, the court said, in referring to the turntable cases: "The difficulty about these cases is that they either impose upon owners of property a duty not before imposed by law, or they leave to a jury to find legal negligence in cases where there is no legal duty to exercise care. In these cases the courts, yielding to the hardships of individual instances where owners have been guilty of moral, though not legal, wrongs, in permitting attractive and dangerous turntables and water holes to remain unguarded on their premises in populous cities, to the destruction of little children, have passed beyond the safe and ancient landmarks of the common law, and assumed legislative functions in imposing a duty where none existed."

Before entering upon a further discussion of the subject of attractive nuisances, attention should be called to the fact that, under the common law, there was an excepto the proposition that a car set upon rails, upon which it may easily be moved by children, and of sufficient weight to crush a person over whose body it might pass, is not a dangerous thing for children to be allowed to play with. They have an instinctive desire to see machinery in motion, and take delight in riding, and, if they have access to anything upon wheels, they will usually set it going if able to do so, especially if they can ride upon it themselves. In the "turntable cases" the turntable would be harmless if left at rest. The danger arises from the propensity of children to set it in motion. The car in question was dangerous for the same reason.

It is claimed that, as the boy was twelve years of age, he must be considered capable of exercising care for his own protection, and chargeable with negligence to the same extent as a mature person. There is no precise age at which, as a matter of law, a child is to be held accountable for all his actions to the same extent as one of full age. Consolidated City & C. P. R. Co. v. Carlson, 58 Kan. 66, 48 Pac. 635. In that case it is said: "The question as to the capacity of a particular child at a particular time to exercise care in avoiding a particular danger is one of fact, falling within the province of the jury to determine." The child there referred to was ten years of age. In Biggs v. Consolidated Barb-Wire Co. 60 Kan. 223, 44 L.R.A. 655, 56 Pac. 4, the same rule was applied to a boy of fourteen years, the court saying: "We cannot say, as a matter of law, at what age a boy would be possessed of such intelligence, foresight, and judgment as to charge him with contributory negligence in a case like the present." In the case at bar, the question of plaintiff's possession of sufficient intelligence and foresight is foreclosed, so far as the pleading is concerned, by the allegation that "he was too young and inexperienced to foresee the danger." It may be conceded that many boys of the age of twelve years would have perceived the danger attending the acts of the plaintiff which led to his injury. There is, however, no conclusive presumption that a twelve-year-old boy is able to foresee such danger, or that he has sufficient wisdom to avoid it. The question is one of fact, to be shown by the evidence, and is not to be presumed in the face of an averment to the contrary. Jenson v. Will & F. Co. 150 Cal. 408, 89 Pac. 113; Foley v. California Horse-shoe Co. 115 Cal. 190, 194, 56 Am. St. Rep. 87, 47 Pac. 42. If the defendants had gone to trial and awaited the production of evidence upon the subject, it may be that contributory negligence would have been clearly shown. But, by the allegations of the complaint, upon which they chose to rest their case, no such negligence appears. Contributory negligence is matter of defense, where it does not appear upon the face of the complaint, or by the evidence for the plaintiff.

tion to the owner's nonliability to persons entering without his permission where he made a change in the condition of his land adjacent to a public highway, so as to endanger the safety of travelers who might, without fault on their part, accidentally stray from the highway. This is adverted to in WHEELING & L. E. R. Co. v. HARVEY, and SWARTS v. AKRON WATER WORKS Co., and must not be confused with the subject of attractive nuisances. Cases of injuries to children turning upon the fact that the dangerous condition of the land was adjacent to the highway are not included in the note.

II. Origin of the doctrine.

All courts point to Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, decided in 1841, as the pioneer case on what has now come to be known as the attractive nuisance doctrine; but not until the first turntable case had been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1873, was there any extended discussion of the questions involved in that doctrine.

In the original turntable case (Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. Fed. Cas. No. 13,503, second trial in 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504), the turntable was constructed in the ordinary manner, and was located in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) a hamlet of about 100 persons, on uninclosed ground belonging to the railroad company, about one quarter of a mile distant from its depot house. The plaintiff, a six-year-old boy who lived with his parents about three quarters of a mile distant from the turntable, was injured while at play on the turntable. The complaint was based upon the theory that the turntable, as it was constructed, was of a dangerous nature and character when unlocked and unguarded, and that, being in a place much resorted to by the public, and where children were wont to go and play, it was the duty of the defendant to keep the same securely locked or fastened so as to prevent it from being turned or played with by children, or to keep the same guarded so as to prevent injuries to them.

A recovery in favor of the plaintiff in 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504, was affirmed in 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. Mr. Justice Hunt, in writing the opinion of the court, after declaring that the fact that a turntable was a dangerous machine, likely to cause injury to children who resorted to it, might fairly have been inferred from the injury which actually occurred, and that the jury was justified in believing, upon evidence, that children had been at play upon

v.

MICHAEL MCPADDEN, Jr., et al., Appts.

(79 Conn. 367, 65 Atl. 157.)

Master — independent contractor — removal of building.

1. Neither one who purchases a building to be torn down and removed from the premises, and who is a suitable person for the purpose, nor his agents, is a servant of the landowner, so as to render him liable for their negligent conduct in the performance of the work.

Same — care — immateriality.

2. Whether or not a landowner used due and proper care in selecting one to whom to sell a building to be removed from his land is immaterial if the person is found to have been competent in fact.

Unsafe premises — protection against children.

3. Persons engaged in the demolition of a building which is left with standing chimneys on Saturday night are not, although the building is uninclosed, bound to anticipate that children may, during the next day, trespass upon the property undermine the chimneys, and be injured by their fall, so as to be bound to protect against such an occurrence.

Evidence — immateriality.

4. Upon the question of the safety of chimneys left standing during the demolition of a building, evidence is immaterial that a person, in passing the building, the turntable on other occasions, that they would probably resort to it, and that the defendant should have anticipated that such would be the case, said that this could certainly have been prevented by locking the turntable, which could have been done at an inconsiderable expense. Thus reasoning, the jury would have reached the conclusion that the defendant had omitted the care and attention it ought to have given, and that it was negligent, and that its negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff. Though the evidence was not strong, and the negligence was slight, the court was not able to say that there was not evidence sufficient to justify the verdict.

Four cases were relied on as authorities for the position taken by the court, that the plaintiff's right of recovery was not affected by the fact that he was a trespasser at the time of the accident. These cases were Lynch v. Nurdin, supra; Birge v. Gardiner, 19 Conn. 507, 50 Am. Dec. 261; Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 26 Conn. 591, 68 Am. Dec. 413, and Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628, and these cases have been cited many times since in support of the attractive nuisance doctrine.

In Lynch v. Nurdin, supra, the pioneer case, the defendant left his horse and cart walked on the opposite side of the street because he was afraid the chimney would fall.

Trial — questions to witness — immaterial error.

5. Mere refusal to enforce formal rules for the questioning of witnesses is not ground for new trial where no material harm is done to the objecting party.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Hamersley, J.:

Action to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff's intestate, resulting in his death, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants, brought to the superior court in Fairfield county, and tried to the jury before Roraback, J. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $750, and appeal by the defendants, claiming error in the rulings of the court during the trial, in the denial of their requests to charge, and in the charge of the court.

The judgment appealed from was rendered upon a retrial of the cause. See 78 Conn. 276, 61 Atl. 1069. The defendants Patrick Heery and Martin Whalen made a joint defense, and, in their answer, denied material allegations in the complaint; moreover they alleged that the plaintiff's intestate in the highway. The plaintiff, a boy under seven years of age, in the absence of the cartman, got upon the cart, and another boy led the horse on. The plaintiff, who, at that time, was getting off the shaft, fell, and was run over by the wheel, and had his leg broken. It was held that the fact that the plaintiff was a trespasser would not deprive him of his remedy. Lord Denman, Ch. J., said: "But the question remains, Can the plaintiff, then, consistently with the authorities, maintain his action, having been at least equally in fault? The answer is that, supposing that fact ascertained by the jury, but to this extent, that he merely indulged the natural instinct of a child in amusing himself with the empty cart and deserted horse, then we think that the defendant cannot be permitted to avail himself of that fact. The most blamable carelessness of his servant having tempted the child, he ought not to reproach the child with yielding to that temptation. He has been the real and only cause of the mischief. He has been deficient in ordinary care; the child, acting without prudence or thought, has, however, shown these qualities in as great a degree as he could be expected to possess them. His misconduct bears no tate was a trespasser on their premises, and that, if said premises were in a dangerous condition, they were rendered so by the acts of the plaintiff's intestate, or other trespassers, and that such acts were the occasion of the injury to him. The defendant Michael McPadden made a separate defense through a separate counsel, and, prior to the second trial, filed a substituted answer. This answer contains a denial of the material allegations of the complaint, and, by way of a second defense in the nature of a plea in bar, alleges the following facts: (1) On May 3d, 1903, McPadden was the owner of the lot of land described in the complaint. (2) On April 28, 1903, McPadden sold to the defendant Heery, for a valuable consideration, a two-story frame building standing upon said premises, and surrendered to him the possession and control thereof. (3) Said Heery was a suitable person to whom to sell said building, and he agreed to remove the same in a safe manner, and within a reasonable time; and, on the day following the purchase, he began to demolish the building, and remove it from McPadden's lot. (4) Said building was in a safe condition, capable of being taken down and removed without danger to any person; and, in its character and situation, would not be a source of danger in the process of such demolition and removal. (5) McPadden did not reserve, or exercise, any control over said work, or in the selection of the servants and agents of said Heery by whom said work was in fact performed. (6) The acts and omissions complained of were not rendered necessary in the proper demolition and removal of said building, but any dangerous conditions existing on said 3d day of May, 1903, and caused by the state of said building or parts thereof, and by its alleged unguarded condition, were created solely by the mode of performing said work of demolition and removal, in which the defendant McPadden had no part. The court sustained a demurrer to this second defense "for the reason that it does not appear from the pleading questioned that the defendant took necessary and reasonable precaution in selecting the contractor." McPadden thereupon amended his second defense by adding the following: "(7) The defendants Heery and Whalen were masons and builders by trade, and competent and experienced in the kind of work involved in the performance of said contract, which required peculiar knowledge and experience, and this defendant used due care in selecting them to perform the same." Upon the trial, the court treated McPadden's second defense as equivalent to the defense of "independent contractor." Upon McPadden's request to charge and the charge of the court in respect to the legal effect of proving the facts alleged in McPadden's second defense, questions similar to those raised by the demurrer were raised proportion to that of the defendant, which produced it."

Whether this case has been overruled, or whether it is still the law of England, the courts do not seem to know. There appears to be as much difference in opinion on this subject as there is upon the attractive nuisance doctrine itself. But it has been doubted, certainly in several cases not dealing with that doctrine, and at least two later cases on the question appear to be in conflict with it.

In Hughes v. Macfie, 2 Hurlst. & C. 744, a cellar lid was left leaning nearly upright against a warehouse. The plaintiff, a child of tender years, pulled this lid over upon himself while at play. Pollock, C. B., said: "Had he been an adult, it is clear he could have maintained no action. He would voluntarily have meddled, for no lawful purpose, with that which, if left alone, would not have hurt him. He would therefore have contributed by his own negligence to his damage. We think the fact of the plaintiff being of tender years makes no difference. His touching the flap was for no lawful purpose, and, if he could maintain the action, he could equally do so if the flap had been placed inside the defendants' premises, within sight and reach of the child."

There was also another action growing out of the name accident. Abbott v. Macfie, 2 Hurlst. & C. 744. In the Abbott Case it 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was held that the plaintiff, who was also hurt by the fall of the door, could recover if he was not playing with the other plaintiff, so as to be a joint actor with him. This fact not appearing, the case was sent back, the jury rendering a verdict for the defendants.

This, said the court, in Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 410, 57 L.R.A. 561, 90 N. W. 95, was a nice distinction, which, assuming both children too young to exercise care or prudence, a few courts of this day would be willing to follow.

In Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239, a machine was exposed for sale in a public street, and a four-year-old boy, at the direction of an elder brother, put his fingers between the exposed cogwheels on one side of the machine while one of his companions turned an unfastened handle on the other side. It was held that there was no liability for the resulting injury to the child. Bramwell, B., said that the defendant was no more liable than if he had exposed goods colored with a poisonous paint, and the child had sucked them. "It may seem a harsh way of putting it," he continued, "but suppose this machine had been of a very delicate construction, and had been injured by the child's fingers, would not the child, in spite of his tender years, have been liable to an action as a tortfeasor? This shows that it is impossible to hold the defendant liable.

and determined in the same way. In his separate appeal, McPadden assigns as error these rulings of the court. The negligence, charged in the complaint, and denied by all of the defendants, is stated as follows: "On said 3d day of May, 1903, said premises were uninclosed, and the building was unguarded by any obstruction, and was of a situation and character calculated to attract children thereupon, and was carelessly and negligently maintained by the defendants in a condition likely to cause injuries to children who might go in and upon and around said building. The defendants did not maintain a watchman about or upon said premises to give notice of, or to guard against, any danger to persons going in or near or upon said building, or give any notice of the dangerous condition of said building."

Mr. Henry E. Shannon, for appellant McPadden, Jr.:

A landowner who sells an old house to competent and experienced masons and builders, under an agreement that they shall demolish and remove it in a safe and proper manner, is not responsible to a stranger who is injured by the negligent acts or omissions of such independent contractors.

Messrs. Chamberlain & Hull, for other appellants:

Defendant cannot be liable for an injury which arises from the unsafe condition of his premises when this condition arose from the acts of trespassers which the defendant could not have reasonably anticipated.

W. 1023; Dooley v. Sullivan, 112 Ind. 451, 2 Am. St. Rep. 209, 14 N. E. 566; Theissen v. Belle Plaine, 81 Iowa, 118, 46 N. W. 854; Welsh v. Lansing, 111 Mich. 589, 70 N. W. 129; Myers v. Kansas City, 108 Mo. 480, 18 S. W. 914; Klatt v. Milwaukee, 53 Wis. 198, 40 Am. Rep. 759, 10 N. W. 162; Mullen v. Rutland, 55 Vt. 77; Mahoney v. Libbey, 123 Mass. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 6.

There is no place for the "attractive premises" doctrine.

But, further, I can see no evidence of negligence in him. If his act in exposing this machine was negligence, will his act in exposing it again be called wilfully mischievous? If that could not be said, then it is not negligence, for between negligence and wilful mischief there is no difference but of degree."

In Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, it is pointed out that there was nothing to show that the defendant in the last-mentioned case, or in the Macfie Cases, knew or had reason to apprehend, that the dangerous agency would be likely to attract children.

The Macfie and Mangan Cases, supra, are apparently in conflict with Lynch v. Nurdin, but Mr. Justice Harlan, as was stated in WHEELING & L. E. R. Co. v. HARVEY and SWARTS v. AKRON WATERWORKS CO., doubts the correctness of the statement often made, that the early case has been overruled by Mangan v. Atterton, supra, and refers to Clark v. Chambers, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 327, in which Manisty, J., in commenting on the Mangan Case, says: "If the decision as to negligence is in conflict with our judgment in this case, we can only say we do not acquiesce in it. It appears to us that a man who leaves in a public place, along which persons, and among them children, have to pass, a dangerous machine 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

which may be fatal to anyone who touches it, without any precaution against mischief, is not only guilty of negligence, but of negligence of a very reprehensible character; and not the less so because the imprudent and unauthorized act of another may be necessary to realize the mischief which the unlawful act or negligence of the defendant has given occasion."

The same view as to the effect of Clark v. Chambers is taken in Smith v. Hayes, 29 Ont. Rep. 283, and Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. supra.

But in Clark v. Chambers, the court was not dealing with the case of a trespasser, much less one of tender years. In that case the defendant had placed on his own premises a hurdle with cheraux de frise on top to keep the public from looking into his grounds. Someone had removed the hurdle to another place, and the plaintiff, not knowing of its removal, ran against it in the dark while he was passing along the highway, and was hurt. If, in the language quoted, the court, instead of referring to this situation, was referring to the situation in the Mangan Case, the statement is obiter at least.

The latest English cases, however, approve the Lynch Case and the attractive nuisance doctrine.

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was before us at the October term, 1905, when the judgment rendered upon a former trial was set aside. See 78 Conn. 276, 61 Atl. 1069. This appeal is taken from the judgment rendered upon a retrial of the cause.

The trial court erred in sustaining the plaintiff's demurrer to the second defense of the substituted answer of the defendant McPadden. Upon the sale of a house standing upon the vendor's land to a suitable person for the purpose and upon the conditions stated in the second defense, neither the vendee nor his agents, while engaged in moving the property sold, are the servants of the vendor, for whose careless conduct the vendor can be held liable under the doctrine of respondent superior.

The court also erred in substantially charging the jury that, if they should find from the evidence that the defendants Heery and Whalen, in the removal of the house, were acting as contractors in a business independent from McPadden, and that all the facts alleged in McPadden's second defense have been proved, and that Heery, to whom the building was sold, was a competent and experienced person to properly and safely perform the work involved in the removal of the building, it would be necessary, in order came so rotten as to constitute a nuisance, it was held that the owner was liable for injury to a boy who, in indulging the natural instincts of one of his age, climbed upon it, causing it to fall upon him. And in this case it was said that Lynch v. Nurdin had never been overruled.

In a House of Lords decision not yet reported, the attractive nuisance doctrine seems to have been upheld in a turntable case. In this case a turntable was maintained on ground adjacent to a public road. There was a gap in a hedge large enough to permit a child to pass through. There was evidence that, on one previous occasion, at least, a man in the employment of the company had seen boys at play on the turntable, and that they ran away at his approach. It was held that although the defective condition of the hedge was not the efficient cause of the accident, yet, that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the company sufficient to go to the jury. This seems to be in line with the doctrine of the Stout Case.

The critics of the attractive nuisance doctrine do not regard Lynch v. Nurdin, supra, as a very strong authority in its favor.

In Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 497, the court, in referring to that case, said that, curiously enough, the existence of a duty to the playing children, whose breach would constitute actionable negligence, was not 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

made the subject of argument. It appeared clearly that no question was raised before the court upon this point. Defendant's negligence having been conceded by counsel, the remarks of the chief justice were hardly to be treated as a considered judgment upon that question. The only controverted point that seemed to have been determined was that, although the plaintiff's own act co-operated to produce his injury, he was not, for that reason, debarred from recovering compensation in respect to defendant's negligence, and this because of the plaintiff's tender years.

In Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, the court said that the Lynch Case seemed to have gone off upon the questions of negligence and contributory negligence, no question of trespass being discussed. The inference was perhaps a proper one that it was found by the jury that the owner was negligently in leaving his horse loose in the public street, and that the child had shown as much prudence as could be expected of him.

In Birge v. Gardiner, 19 Conn. 507, 50 Am. Dec. 261, the second authority mentioned in the Stout Case on the question of the effect of trespass on the right of recovery, a boy under seven years of age was injured by a heavy gate which had been erected on defendant's land, along a highway. The boy, as he was passing, put his hands upon the gate, and shook it, causing it to to relieve McPadden from liability for the negligence of Heery and Whalen, that they should also find that McPadden used due and proper care in selecting a competent person to perform this work. It is possible that the court, in detailing the conditions that would relieve McPadden from liability on the theory of his having employed Heery as an independent contractor, did not intend to make the finding of every condition detailed essential to such relief; but a careful reading of the whole charge, in connection with the denial of McPadden's request to charge, compels the conviction that the jury must have so understood the instructions of the court. If all the other facts alleged in McPadden's second defense were found to be true, it would be manifestly immaterial to the sufficiency of that defense whether the jury were satisfied or not satisfied that McPadden used due and proper care in selecting Heery, whom they find to have been in fact a competent person to perform the work he undertook to perform as an independent contractor. The court should have so charged the jury. Lawrence v. Shipman, 39 Conn. 590; Corbin v. American Mills, 27 Conn. 274, 280, 71 Am. Dec. 63; Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk, 63 Conn. 495, 524, 525, 529, 28 Atl. 32; Wilmot v. McPadden, 78 Conn. 276, 61 Atl. 1069. For this reason there is error in McPadden's appeal, and the judgment against him must be set aside.

fall upon him. It was urged that he was a trespasser, and that, although of tender years, was responsible for the civil consequences of his trespass; but the court refused to decide the question, and held the defendant liable on the ground of gross negligence.

In Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283, the court asserts that the last-mentioned case rests upon the doctrine that the owner of land has no right to use his land near a highway in such a manner as to make it a public nuisance. That is not, of course, the attractive nuisance doctrine.

In Fitzmaurice v. Connecticut R. & Lighting Co. 78 Conn. 406, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 149, 112 Am. St. Rep. 159, 62 Atl. 620, it was held that the doctrine announced in Birge v. Gardiner, supra, did not apply where a child strayed upon defendant's land, remote from a highway, over a broken fence, and was burned on a heap of hot ashes, since, in such a case, the child was a mere trespasser, and the presence of the child could not reasonably have been anticipated, and the dangerous object was not one calculated to attract children. This was not a repudiation of the attractive nuisance doctrine, and might be taken as an inferential indorsement of it.

In WILMOT v. MCPADDEN, however, the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The other errors assigned in McPadden's appeal are substantially the same as those assigned in the appeal of Heery and Whalen, and they will be considered together. The following facts appear from the record to have been practically conceded: On and some time prior to May 3, 1903, the defendant McPadden owned a piece of land in Bridgeport, fronting on Pembroke street, which piece of land was uninclosed. On part of this land there stood a building in which Alva F. Wilmot (the plaintiff's intestate) lived with his parents; there was also on another part of the land a dwelling house of wood on a stone foundation, with brick chimneys, which house was old, and in a dilapidated condition. For a few days prior to May 3d the defendants Heery and Whalen, acting under authority derived from McPadden, were engaged in taking down and removing the said dwelling house. At the close of work on Saturday, May 2d, all of the house had been removed except the foundation, the first floor, and two brick chimneys. On the afternoon of the following day, Sunday, Alva Wilmot, then about seven and one half years of age, with other children of about his own age, was upon the first floor of said house when one of said chimneys collapsed and fell, and, in falling, injured Alva so that he shortly afterward died. The children were on the first floor of the house without warrant or permission of the defendants. When the work-court says it deals with the attractive nuisance question for the first time, and repudiates it, declaring it was not involved in the case of Birge v. Gardiner, supra.

The next authority cited in the Stout Case was Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 26 Conn. 591, 68 Am. Dec. 413. In this case a child less than three years of age was hurt while playing on a railroad track by a passing train. The fact that the plaintiff herself participated in causing the injury by being on the track, or being there without authority, and therefore being a trespasser, was held not to stand in the way of recovery. The court said that, if she was a trespasser, she was only technically so, and, under the charge given in the case, the jury must have found that she was moved only by the impulse of childish instinct, and was not old enough to be charged with fault or blame for being in a place of danger. The court is here evidently referring to the childish instinct as it bears upon the question of contributory negligence.

In Bird v. Holbrook, the last authority cited in the Stout Case upon the question of trespass, the plaintiff was injured by spring guns. This case has no bearing upon the attractive nuisance doctrine, but is authority only for the rule that the mere fact that a person is a trespasser will not prevent him from recovering damages for injuries received from spring guns.

men left the house on Saturday night, and on the Sunday following, it was uninclosed and unguarded by any obstruction, and no watchman was maintained, or other notice given of the condition of the building. The plaintiff, in her complaint, alleges that the injuries and death of her intestate were caused solely by the negligence of the defendants, and this negligence is described as follows: "In maintaining, on said May 3d, said land uninclosed, and the remnants of said dwelling house (being of a character to attract children thereupon, and of a character likely to cause injuries to children who might go upon it) unguarded, and in not maintaining a watchman or otherwise giving notice of the dangerous character of said building.

Upon the trial there were two contested issues of fact: (1) "Was the chimney which fell down left by the defendants on Saturday night in an unsafe condition, with its supports removed, so that it was in danger of toppling over, and without being properly shored, or propped up?" The plaintiff claimed to have proved the affirmative of this issue. The court's statement of the law applicable to the fact of such unsafe condition (if the jury should find it proved), in connection with the other facts, is not specially assigned as error. (2) "Were the bricks supporting the chimney, which the defendants had left in a safe condition on Saturday night, removed on Sunday afternoon by the plaintiff's intestate and another child, a little older, digging out the supporting bricks with sticks they had obtained for that purpose, so that the chimney fell down in consequence of its being thus undermined?" The defendants offered evidence to prove, and claimed to have proved, the affirmative of this issue. They asked, and were entitled to, a statement by the court of the law defining their liability upon the state of facts as thus claimed by them to have been proved. The court, having instructed the jury that the denial of the plaintiff's allegation that, on May 3d, the uninclosed and unguarded building was of a character to attract children, and was in a condition likely to cause injury to children who might go into it, raised one of the controlling issues of the case; and having stated to the jury that the plaintiff claimed, as of the substance of his charge of negligence, that the partly demolished building, with its standing chimneys, unguarded and uninclosed, and near a public street, was a place calculated to attract young children, and likely to cause injury to children, which the defendants were bound to anticipate; and having stated that the defendants, on the other hand, contended that there was, under the circumstances, no duty on their part on May 3d to inclose the building, or maintain a watchman, that the building stood on a private lot, removed from the street, that the boy Alva was only a trespasser without Peckham, J., in Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1068, said that the difference between Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628, and a turntable case, was so plain as to require no discussion.

One other case frequently cited as an authority for the attractive nuisance doctrine is Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277. In this case the owner set spring traps on his land so near the plaintiff's courtyard, where the latter's dogs were kept, that they might scent the bait without committing any trespass on the defendant's property, and plaintiff's dogs were thereby enticed from the highway into the traps and wounded. Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., said that every man must be taken to contemplate the probable consequences of the act he does. And therefore, when the defendant caused traps scented with the strongest meats to be placed so near to plaintiff's house as to influence the instinct of those animals, and draw them irresistibly to their destruction, he must be considered as contemplating this probable consequence of his act. What difference was there, in reason, between drawing the dog into the trap by means of his instinct, which he could not resist, and putting him there by manual force? It appeared in this case that the defendant rewarded his gamekeeper at the rate of so much a head for every dog that he caught. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

It will be observed from an examination of the foregoing cases that, up to the time the Stout Case was decided, in 1874, there was very little authority for the attractive nuisance doctrine, and in England even up to the present day there has been but little discussion of the subject.

It is therefore the turntable cases which are responsible for the great impulse given to the discussion, and it is to turntables that the doctrine of attractive nuisance has been mostly applied. It will be found by an examination of the cases in this note that while there has been an effort made to extend the doctrine announced in those cases to injuries received in other ways by trespassing children, the effort has not met with great success. The present tendency in this country seems to be to restrict it to the narrowest limits, and to put railroad turntables in a class by themselves. It will be impossible to discuss the doctrine of attractive nuisances without a reference to some of the leading turntable cases on which it is founded, and such cases as are necessary for this purpose will be mentioned in this note. A full list of the turntable cases, showing the jurisdictions in which the doctrine has been adopted or rejected, will be found in a note to Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 80.

As has already been seen, the English and American cases relied on to support the doc-invitation, and that, if the premises were in a dangerous condition, they were rendered so without the knowledge of the defendants, by the acts of the boy Alva and his associates, over which the defendants had no control and should in no way be made responsible,—thereupon charged the jury as follows: "If you find that said building and chimneys were left in a safe condition by the defendants, and that the chimney causing the injuries was rendered dangerous and unsafe solely by the improper conduct of this boy Alva or his associates, which was the sole cause of its toppling over and falling, then, gentlemen, under such circumstances, you should find for the defendants, unless you further believe and find from the evidence that such conduct and action upon the part of the children could have been fairly and reasonably contemplated upon the part of the defendants."

We think there is error in this charge. Generally speaking, actionable negligence, as related to the circumstances of this case, implies (1) careless conduct in doing a lawful act without actual intention of injuring another; (2) consequent damage to another who, at the time and place, has the legal right to require of the actor the exercise of ordinary care in doing their lawful act. The essence of actionable negligence is the infringement of the legal right of another, or, in other words, the violation of a duty imposed by law in respect to another. Upon trine of the turntable cases were either not analogous, or, in any event, not very satisfactory authority. Even the Stout Case, the first of the turntable authorities, is not as strong as some of the decisions of the state courts in which the doctrine is adopted and amplified. In fact, in the Stout Case, it seems to have been taken for granted that the railroad company owed a duty of reasonable care to prevent injury to the child. Of course, if the company owed such a duty, the question whether it had been fulfilled might well have been left to the jury, under the circumstances of that case. This point is well brought out in Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 63, 38 L.R.A. 573, 66 Am St. Rep. 859, 41 S. W. 62, in which it was said that "in the Stout Case, there were three questions to be determined: (1) Did the law impose upon the company a duty to use care to keep its property in such condition that persons going thereon without its invitation would not be injured? (2) Was the child, six years old, guilty of contributory negligence? and (3) Was the company guilty of negligence in leaving the turntable unlocked? The first and most important question, without an affirmative answer to which the third could not rise, was not even referred to; and, if we may judge from the opinion, that learned court's attention was not called to its presence in the case; the second was admitted by the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the state of facts as claimed by the defendants, it is plain that they had the legal right to take down, and remove, the building standing on their land, to suspend the work of demolition during Sunday, to leave the chimney in question—then in a safe condition—uninclosed and unguarded, and without using any means of notification to the public of the patent condition of the building; and that, in doing this, they in fact exercised ordinary care, and neither infringed the legal rights of others, nor violated any duty imposed upon them by law in respect to others. It is plain that the plaintiff's intestate, at the time of receiving his injury, had no legal right to be upon that part of the defendants' land, and, being there, had no right to interfere with the chimney there standing, and to change it from a safe to a dangerous structure. But the claim is urged that, when the defendants suspended their lawful work on Saturday night, they might reasonably have anticipated that some person might, on the following day, unlawfully enter their land, undermine the chimney, and receive fatal injuries from its fall thus brought about; and that the law imposed upon the defendants the legal duty of using appropriate means for the prevention of such unlawful entry, and gave to the plaintiff's intestate the legal right to demand of the defendants the use of ordinary care for the purpose of preventing him from exposing himself to railroad in favor of plaintiff; and the third, if the first were determined in the affirmative, was clearly a disputed question of fact, which the court correctly held was settled by the verdict. The main force of the opinion is spent upon this third question, in attempting to show that the evidence was of such a character that the jury were justified in finding that the company had not used such care in guarding the turntable as a reasonably prudent person would have done under similar circumstances. There could have been no doubt upon this question. The opinion of the court would have been much more satisfactory if it had undertaken to establish, instead of assuming, the affirmative of the first question."

Thus, the attractive nuisance doctrine was not built upon very firm foundations. How it has been amplified and extended will be seen by an examination of the cases in the following subdivisions of the note.

III. Basis of liability.

a. Intentional injuries.

The reasons which have been given in support of the attractive nuisance doctrine will now be considered.

In Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, the court said that it might be true dangers created by his unlawful act. It may be true that these defendants, in suspending, on Saturday night, the work of taking down the building on their land, situate, as it was, on the street of a populous city, could have fairly and reasonably contemplated that some heedless and thoughtless persons might, on the following Sunday, unlawfully enter upon their land, recklessly amuse themselves by digging away the supports of the chimney, left in a perfectly safe condition, and thus cause it to fall upon themselves. But, whether this be true or not, it is not true that such persons had any legal right to require the defendants, under such circumstances, to surround their property with barriers, or to use other means adequate to prevent their entry on the land. The law on this point is settled beyond controversy. The owner of land holds his property subject to certain legal rights of others and their correlative duties; he cannot use it so as to endanger others entitled to the use of the adjoining highway or adjoining land, or of others whom he brings or invites to come upon his land, without using that care commensurate to the occasion. He may be liable to those unlawfully on his land, who are hurt through concealed sources of danger prepared with the intention of injuring such persons. But the owner or tenant of land has the right of exclusive possession; whoever violates this right is a trespasser; and such trespasser assumes all risk of danger which is incident to the condition of the premises; as to him, the owner does not owe the legal duty of exercising care in keeping his premises in a safe condition for his use, especially when the trespasser is wrongfully interfering with the condition of the property as left by the owner. A similar rule of reciprocal right and duty is applicable to one who enters upon the land of another as a mere licensee. Pomponio v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 66 Conn. 528, 537, 32 L.R.A. 530, 50 Am. St. Rep. 124, 34 Atl. 491; Rooney v. Woolworth, 74 Conn. 720, 723, 52 Atl. 411; Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 221, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396, 9 Atl. 790.

In the present case, the land (as claimed by the defendants) was in a perfectly safe condition as respects all persons not intermeddling with its condition, and a trespasser, by his own act, rendered the safe condition unsafe, and in consequence suffered harm; and the claim is that, notwithstanding the defendants clearly owed no legal duty to such trespasser, they did owe a legal duty to children who might be tempted by the (to them) attractive condition of the land to do the same acts. In that, in a majority of the turntable cases, which were necessarily few, the Stout Case, supra, had been followed, but there should be a legal principle underlying the rule laid down in that case, and that principle had been assiduously sought for by some of the courts, without success. Others had asserted different reasons for following it. One gave us to understand that a child was licensed to go wherever he could find that which attracted him; a Texas court had held that children of tender years could not be trespassers; while other authorities were content to rest their approbation of and adherence to the alleged rule upon the inhumanity of the doctrine that a landowner must not be held responsible for injuries suffered by trespassing children when, by ordinary thoughtfulness and care, he could have anticipated and prevented it; and the generic term "attractive nuisances" was applied to the great variety of things which might naturally be expected to allure young children upon private premises. The term "attractive nuisance," as applied, was a new one in the books, and the plausible applications of the well-known principle that one must so occupy his own as not to do harm to the rights of others should not be construed to so restrict the use of private lands as to make it necessary to guard and protect trespassers.

Before liability can arise under the common law for an injury received by one person upon the land of another it must be shown: (1) That the injury was intentional or wanton; or (2) that, if not intentional, it was received by a person who was invited upon the premises by the landowner because of a failure of the landowner to exercise due care for the safety of him to whom the invitation was extended.

A trespasser falls within the protection of the first rule, but not, of course, the second, since, in going upon the land under such circumstances, he would not be a trespasser. In case of an injury to an infant trespasser, received while at play on a turntable or other dangerous machine or instrumentality, a recovery could not be justified unless, first, the case were deemed to fall within one or the other, or both, of the above-mentioned rules; or, second, a statutory duty to avoid injury in such cases were imposed. In the absence of statute, the courts have invoked both of the above-mentioned rules to justify recovery. These rules will be examined in the order named. First, the rule as to intentional injury:

In Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277, supra, where the dogs were lured to the traps by the bait, there was clearly an intention to catch them in that manner, although the landowner might not have intended to entrap the plaintiff's dogs. Nevertheless, there was an intention to lure the dogs to the traps. In the turntable cases the dangerous machinery is said to be a trap for the children, who are lured to it by their love of motion as the dogs were drawn to the traps by the scent of the bait. Are the cases analogous?

other words, that whenever the owner or possessor of land which, although in a perfectly safe condition, may yet be likely to tempt children to come upon it, and there create a condition dangerous to themselves, the law imposes upon such owner or possessor the legal duty of protecting such children from exposing themselves to such danger, and gives to such children the legal right to require of the owner or possessor the use of ordinary care and diligence in anticipating such conduct by children, and in the use of appropriate means for protecting them against themselves. We think this claim has no solid foundation. Temptation is not always invitation. As the common law is understood by the most competent authorities, it does not excuse a trespass because there is a temptation to commit, or hold property owners bound to contemplate the infraction of property rights because the temptation to untrained minds to infringe them might have been foreseen." Holbrook v. Aldrich, 168 Mass. 16, 36 L.R.A. 495, 60 Am. St. Rep. 364, 46 N. E. 115. The legal duty of restraining children from going into unsafe places is imposed by law upon their parents, and those who stand in loco parentis, and is not imposed upon strangers. The natural instinct to help the helpless would induce anyone, in a position properly to do so, to restrain a child from exposing itself to danger; but to impose the duty of exercising such restraint as a legal duty upon all strangers, or upon a particular class of strangers, such as the occupants of all tenements that might seem to the childish mind attractive, would prove impracticable and intolerable. The parental duty of restraint implies the parental power of correction, or of the use of preventive force.

It is true that in cases where the plaintiff seeks to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, and it is claimed that the fault of the plaintiff concurred with that of the defendant in producing the injury, that the conduct required of the defendant may be affected by the helplessness of the plaintiff; what might be careful conduct in dealing with a vigorous person or an adult might well be careless conduct in dealing with an infirm person or a child, and conduct of the plaintiff which might establish his negligence or fault if he were a vigorous person or an adult might fail to establish such fault if he were infirm or a young child; and so it has been held in such cases that the youth of the plaintiff, as indicating his helplessness and incapacity to commit a fault, may be considered in determining the question of

In an article on Liability of Landowners to Children, by Jeremiah Smith, 11 Harvard Law Review, 349,—the ablest criticism of the attractive nuisance doctrine that has been written,—he says: "The decision in Townsend v. Wathen, supra, is not in point to establish the liability of a railroad to a child attracted by a turntable upon defendant's premises unless it is proved that the railroad company maintained the turntable with the express intention of catching and maiming the children of the neighborhood, and that the directors were in the habit of rewarding the section foreman at a certain rate per head for each innocent babe thus slaughtered. When Lord Ellenborough intimates that there is no difference between 'drawing the animal into the trap by means of his instinct, which he cannot resist,' and 'putting him there by manual force,' the learned judge is evidently speaking in both cases in reference to results intentionally produced; i. e., acts done with the intent of bringing the animal into the trap."

In this article he also says: "Failure to advert to probable consequences, or even knowledge that certain consequences are probable, is not equivalent to intent or desire that such consequences shall follow. In such cases it may or may not be right to hold the landowner liable on the ground of negligence. That is a separate question. . . . But it is not right to hold him liable on the ground of intention where no intent actually existed. Nor is it right, while considering whether to hold him on the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) ground of negligence, to throw into the scale against him the argument that he must be regarded as having actually intended the result. This sort of reasoning, carried to its logical extreme, would annihilate the distinction between negligence and intention. It also blurs the distinction between knowledge and intent."

As to the importance of maintaining the distinction between intentional injury and negligence, he says: "If, . . . as a general rule, defendants are professedly held liable on the ground of negligence, and if full damages are recoverable for negligence, why spend time in criticizing the language of the court, implying that the same result might also be reached on another and distinct ground; viz., implied intention? The answer is twofold. First: Because all this talk implying the existence of intent tends to obscure the issue as to negligence. Second: Because this talk tends to prejudice the defendant in the decision upon the issue of negligence."

Peckham, J., in Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co., 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1069, in referring to Townsend v. Wathen, supra, points out that the act of the defendant was not done in the prosecution of his immediate and proper business, but was a mere malicious, successful attempt to entice his neighbor's animals upon his property, the enticement being effected by the means spoken of; and said that to liken a turntable case to the allurement of dogs by the spreading of tainted meat his contributory negligence as well as that of the defendant's negligence. Wilmot v. McPadden, 78 Conn. 276, 283, 61 Atl. 1069. To this extent the instinct of humanity and the claims of the helpless are recognized as elements in determining what is ordinary care in cases where such care is imposed upon one as a legal duty; but these cases have no legitimate relation to the broad proposition that must be maintained to support the charge of the court as given, viz.: the law attaches to the ownership or possession of land which, in its lawful and proper use, may be in a condition attractive to children and dangerous to them, the legal duty in the owner or possessor of protecting children from yielding to the temptation to unlawfully enter his land, and there heedlessly exposed themselves to danger. The distinction between the latter and the former proposition may become difficult to draw in some of the infinite variety of cases where the claim of liability for negligence is made, but, in its essence, the distinction is clear and vital. In the former an injury occurs to one of two persons, each in the exercise of a legal right subject to the right of the other, and requiring, of necessity, reasonable care in each. Liability for the injury is incurred by the one in fault. If both are in fault, there is no liability. In the latter the injury occurs to one not in the exercise of a legal right, and the liability is placed upon one who, in the exercise of his legal right, has infringed no right of others. It is the distinction between a liability arising from one's own fault, and a liability arising from another's misfortune; between the enforcement of a debt and the compulsion of a gift.

The theory of a liability in innocent land-owners for injuries directly resulting from the acts of children trespassing on their premises finds support in a line of cases commonly called "the turntable cases" (Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745; Koons v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 65 Mo. 592; Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686, 691, 31 Am. Rep. 203; Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 301, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 666; and others), and is vigorously rejected by courts in other jurisdictions. We have never had occasion to deal directly with this question. It was not involved in Birge v. Gardiner, 19 Conn. 507, 50 Am. Dec. 261; any expressions that might favor the doctrine, in Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 26 Conn. 591, 68 Am. Dec. 413, are modified and corrected in Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 53 over traps on defendant's lands, done for the very purpose of injury, was to lose sight of the different principles upon which the cases rested.

Or, to put it a little more clearly, as was stated in Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 862, this "is to lose sight of the difference between negligence and intentional wrongdoing."

In Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 63, 38 L.R.A. 573, 66 Am. St. Rep. 859, 41 S. W. 62, in holding a railroad company not liable for the death of a child drowned in a pool of water on its premises, the court said it did not wish to be understood as holding that one was not liable for injuries to persons going onto his land uninvited; that is, where a pit was sunk, or a gun was set on one's land to injure trespassers. In such cases the liability was based upon the breach of a duty imposed by law not intentionally to injure even a trespasser; and such intent might be evidenced by circumstances, as where one secretly dug a pit across a pathway over his land where he had reason to believe another would pass at night. In such cases the liability was not based upon the assumption that the owner owed a duty to the uninvited person to keep his premises reasonably safe, but upon the fact that he owed a duty to such person not intentionally to injure him. The failure to observe this distinction has led to much confusion.

So far as intention or implied intention to injure is concerned, Townsend v. Wathen, supra, and the turntable cases, are not alike, since the prime object of the turntable is not to catch children.

b. Implied invitation.

The other rule, that of implied invitation, is the one more generally relied upon.

In Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, one of the early cases in which the turntable doctrine announced in the Stout Case was taken up and elucidated, the injured child was not considered a voluntary trespasser, the court saying that the turntable, being attractive, presented to the natural instincts of young children a strong temptation, and such children following, as they must be expected to follow, those natural instincts, were thus allured into a danger whose nature and extent they, being without judgment or discretion, could neither apprehend nor appreciate, and against which they could not protect themselves. The difference between the case of a child who was injured on a turntable and that of a voluntary trespasser, capable of using case, consisted in this: That the child was induced to come upon a turntable by the company's own conduct, and that, as to him, the turntable was a hidden danger and a trap.

In Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Fox, 38 Ind. App. 268, 70 N. E. 81, where a six-and-one-half-year-old child was injured while playing on an unfastened turntable, the court, in holding the company liable, said that the du-Conn. 461, 474, 4 Atl. 106; and in Rohloff v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 76 Conn. 689, 694, 58 Atl. 5, and in Fitzmaurice v. Connecticut R. & Lighting Co. 78 Conn. 406, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 149, 112 Am. St. Rep. 159, 62 Atl. 620, we left the question an open one.

For the reasons above indicated we are satisfied that, upon the facts assumed in the charge under discussion, the plaintiff's intestate, whether regarded as a mere licensee or a trespasser, assumed all risk of danger which was incident to the then condition of the premises, notwithstanding his age was seven and one half years. This view of the law is substantially maintained in the following cases: Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L.R.A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 682; Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396, 9 Atl. 790; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283; Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1068.

The objection to the charge of the court in relation to the measure of damages is not well taken. The plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all, is entitled to recover damages on the same grounds and measured by the same rule as if the action had been brought by her intestate in his lifetime. Wilmot v. McPadden, 78 Conn. 284, 61 Atl. 1069.

During the trial the plaintiff produced a witness who testified that, on the Sunday in question, on his way to church, he walked on the side of the street next the defendants' premises, and, on his return from church, walked on the opposite side of the street. Thereupon, and against the objection of the defendants, the court permitted the question, "Why did you do so?" The witness answered: "Because I was afraid that the chimney would fall upon me." The matter was not pursued further. For the purpose of drawing from the witness his opinion based upon observation of the actual condition of the chimney the form of the question was not correct, and unless asked for this purpose it was inadmissible. But the answer it elicited was immaterial. The unfounded, cautious timidity of this witness was not a fact relevant to the actual condition of the chimney. It is not necessarily error for a court to refuse to enforce formal rules for the questioning of witnesses; at times this course may be advisable; and such conduct of the court, involving no material harm to an objecting party, cannot be sufficient ground for a new trial. The objection to the charge of the court in relation to the measure of damages is not well taken. The plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all, is entitled to recover damages on the same grounds and measured by the ty of the defendant in such cases might be based upon what might be called one species of implied invitation not involving the actual intention or wish of the defendant that the plaintiff should come upon the defendant's premises, or do the act which resulted in his injury, but consisting in leaving a thing exposed and unguarded which was of such a nature as to tempt and allure young children or others not sui juris, to play with it, or otherwise to use it, at a place where, within the knowledge of the defendant, such incompetent persons assembled or were likely to do so, the injurious thing being such that the defendant might enjoy the use of such property for the purpose to which it was adapted and for which it was intended without leaving it in a condition thus dangerous to such persons, it being of such a nature that, at slight expense, he might secure it when not in such use so that it would not be thus dangerous.

In the same case, pointing out the limitations of the doctrine, the court said that the so-called invitation or tortious allurements which would be a violation of duty would not be involved where the defendant could not carry on his lawful business or pursuit in the necessary and ordinary manner, and, at the same time, take precautions to prevent injury to such incompetent persons through the indulgence of their natural instinct to seek enjoyment or diversion; in which case, the injury being attributable, not to the fault of the injured person, but rather to the indulgence of an innocent instinct, no blame was attached to the defendant. "Thus, for instance," said the court, "would be the case of the intrusion of a child upon a railway train during its temporary stoppage at a station for the discharge and the reception of passengers, where the child enters the car along with other persons. In such case the railway company does nothing not incident to the usual and necessary way of conducting its lawful business. So might be the case of a child jumping upon the steps of a moving railway train. But a turntable, not constantly, but only occasionally, used to change the direction of locomotive engines, may, without undue interference with the company's full enjoyment thereof, be securely fastened when not in use, without great expense or inconvenience, and such precaution may even tend to the preservation of the property itself, which, however, would be a matter within its own discretion."

In Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396, 9 Atl. 790, a turntable case, the court, in discussing the question whether the defendant was liable on the ground of implied invitation, said: "One having in his possession agricultural or mechanical tools is not responsible for injuries caused to trespassers by careless handling, nor is the owner of a fruit tree bound to cut it down or inclose it, or to exercise care in securing the staple and lock with which his ladder is fastened, for the protection of trespassing boys who may be attracted by the fruit. Neither is the owner or occupant of premises upon which there is a natural or artificial pond or blueberry pas-trial, and ought not to be assigned as error.

There is error. The judgment of the Superior Court is set aside, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

In this opinion the other Judges concur.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIS SWARTWOOD'S GUARDIAN et al., Appts.,
v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

(— Ky. —, 111 S. W. 305.)

Railroad — trespassing children — active care.

1. A railroad company is not required to maintain in populous communities a lookout for children who are in the habit of jumping on and off its cars while in motion, and provide against injuries to them.

Negligence — attractive nuisance — injury to child.

2. That a railroad company has left a pile of lumber legally required to exercise care in securing his gates and bars to guard against accidents to straying and trespassing children. The owner is under no duty to a mere trespasser to keep his premises safe; and the fact that the trespasser is an infant cannot have the effect to raise a duty where none otherwise exists."

Referring to this language, the court, in Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 410, 57 L.R.A. 561, 90 N. W. 95, said that, if intended as sarcasm, it was proper to observe that there was not a rule known to the law, no matter how sacred or universally recognized, which would not, by an extreme and exaggerated application of its principles, be made to appear ridiculous.

In Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. supra, the court said that no landowner supposed for a moment that, by growing fruit trees near the highway or where boys were accustomed to play, however much they might be tempted to climb the trees and take his fruit, he was extending to them an invitation to do so, or that they would be any the less trespassers if they did go into his orchard because of the temptation. No one believed that a landowner, as a matter of fact, whether a railroad company or a private individual, who made changes in his own land in the course of the beneficial user, which changes were reasonable and lawful, but which were attractive to children, and might expose them to danger if they should yield to the attraction, was, by that act alone, inviting them upon his premises.

of sand unguarded on a vacant lot adjacent to its tracks, which is attractive to children, will not render it liable to a child who, attracted thereto to play, attempts to board a passing train, to its injury.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. F. Graziana for appellants.

Messrs. Benjamin D. Warfield, S. D. Rouse, John Galvin, and Maurice Galvin for appellees.

O'Rear, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for decision in this case is whether railroad companies whose lines traverse cities and towns, or other populous communities, must maintain a lookout for children who are in the habit of jumping on and off the cars while in motion, although the railroad people did not know the particular child who might be injured by such taken that the liability of a railroad company to a child hurt while playing on a turntable cannot arise out of a duty imposed on the company by reason of a supposed implied invitation. The opinion of the court in this case is sufficiently stated in Briscoe v. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. This is as strong a criticism of the implied invitation doctrine as is to be found in any of the cases.

The doctrine of constructive invitation was also repudiated in Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283, and it was held that a child drawn upon the company's premises by the attractiveness of a turntable was a mere trespasser, and that the company was therefore not liable for injury to it while at play thereon. In this case the court said that the cases relied upon to establish the company's liability might be divided into two classes. Those of the first class rested upon the proposition that, if a turntable was of a dangerous nature and character when unlocked or unguarded, in a place much resorted to by the public, and where children were wont to go and play, it was the duty of the railroad company owning the turntable to keep the same securely locked and fastened, so as to prevent it from being turned or played with by children, or to keep the same guarded. The second class of cases proceeded upon the doctrine of constructive invitation; that is, that, if a person was allured or tempted by some act of the railroad company to enter upon its land, he was not a trespasser.

The classification suggested by the court is hardly scientific, since the doctrine of practice was in fact upon its cars, and to provide against such injuries.

The petition in this case, which was held bad on demurrer, alleged that the infant plaintiff, aged eight years, was attracted to appellees' trains in the city of Covington by other children jumping on and off the cars while in motion, stealing rides, and that the defendants were aware of the practices of such children at that point; that a watchman of the appellees, whose duty it was to lower and raise a nearby gate across a street railroad intersection, also knew of the practice of the children, but, on the occasion of the plaintiff's injury, took no precaution to learn whether he was on the train or not; that plaintiff, following the practice of the other children, and in attempting to jump on one of the moving cars, slipped and fell beneath it, thereby having a foot cut off. It is not charged that the defendants knew that plaintiff was attempting to make his perilous try at the time he did it, or that defendants neglected to use any precaution to save him from injury after discovering his peril. So the question comes down to the point stated in the beginning of this opinion. It is a fact of which we all know that railroads traverse streets and lots in our cities on their grade; that there is little or no protection against trespassing upon the railroad tracks; that children and others do so in spite of the well-known dangers of the practice. The legislature has not taken action to require the railroad companies or the cities to maintain barriers against such trespassers. The habit of such trespassing, including, perhaps, the childish tendency and practice of clambering onto the moving cars to get a short free ride, is well known also to everybody, including, of course, the railroad people. If the operators of the train know of the actual presence of such trespassers, for such they are, they are required by the humaneness of the law to not injure them if, with the means at their command, they can avoid doing so. Nor will the inconvenience and annoyance entailed be counted. The courts have never gone further than that. The legislature may, but it has not. Any other rule, particularly the one contended for by appellant, would require practically that such railroads should police all their lines and vehicles in such cities and towns in anticipation of the dangers to thoughtless and heedless persons. Because of their inexperience and childish instincts, infants of tender years are not always held to the same strict accountability as adults in such matters. The latter are constructive invitation mentioned as the basis upon which the second class of cases proceed is merely the reason given for imposing a duty in the first class referred to.

A few cases may be referred to in which the question of what may or may not be considered an implied invitation, which will render a landowner liable for injuries to trespassing children, was decided.

Merely abstaining from driving children off of a lot is not an invitation which will impose any duty or responsibility for the condition thereof upon the owner of the land. Galligan v. Metacomet Mfg. Co. 143 Mass. 527, 10 N. E. 171.

Nor can one who goes into railroad yards, not for amusement, but to pick up grain scattered along the right of way, be said to have been invited upon the premises by the company, so as to render it liable for subsequent injury under the doctrine of the turntable cases. Union Stock Yard & Transit Co. v. Butler, 92 Ill. App. 166.

A railroad company which leases part of its premises on one side of a switch yard for a circus does not thereby extend an implied invitation to a twelve-year-old boy to take a short cut to the show grounds over the switch yard, so as to render the company liable for his death, where he is run over while crossing the tracks, especially where he is twice warned to keep out. Clark v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Wash. 139, 59 L.R.A. 508, 69 Pac. 636.

That children are in the habit of crossing the land of a company which maintains a building in which there is an unused water wheel does not amount to an invitation to go upon the land, so as to render the company liable for injury to a child, received while attempting to rescue another child caught by the wheel with which it was playing. Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644. The court said that, as to the question of license or invitation, there was no difference between children and adults.

Tacit permission to boys to enter a barn does not amount to an invitation which will fasten liability upon the owner for the death of a seven-year-old boy who goes into the building in the absence of employees of the owner, and is killed by the falling of a door upon him. Formall v. Standard Oil Co. 127 Mich. 496, 86 N. W. 946.

In Wilson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 66 Kan. 183, 71 Pac. 282, it was held that the fact that a slowly-moving train might be a temptation to boys to mount and ride thereon could not be regarded as an invitation by a railway company to do so, and that the boy who went upon such a train without invitation or right was a trespasser, and the extent of the duty of the company toward him was not to injure him wantonly or recklessly.

Where the sole negligence charged against the company is that its servants invited the injured boy to assist them in turning the turntable, the case is not within the attractive nuisance rule. Belt R. Co. v. Charters, 123 Ill. App. 322.

charged with their own negligence in wilfully going into such perilous places without right to do so; but, even if they were not negligent, as for example, if they were insane, the rule would not be different. So the rule is not based entirely upon the negligence or even wrong of the so-called trespasser. Rather, the reason a recovery is denied is because the railroad company has not been legally negligent of any duty owed to such person. Without legal duty there cannot be actionable negligence. The duty is not owing, because, as such person had not the right to be at the place, his presence need not be expected, and need not therefore be provided against. It is true it is known that such trespasses are probable; but they are sporadic. The railroads are required to serve the public by running their trains over their tracks. They are held to a rather strict accountability in many matters connected therewith. To require this additional duty would be to put railroad operations beneath the rights of trespassers upon the railway tracks. It would be hard, if not impracticable, to draw a line between wilful trespassers and those of other degrees, or between those who trespass in towns and those who trespass in the country. Both quarters are alike subject to the practice, though with varying frequency. Hence, no distinction is recognized as existing with respect to such.

The courts have gone as far as seems allowable within the principles of the common law, in applying the doctrine of liability to technical trespassers; where for example, the public uses a railroad as a street or passway for such time and with such frequency as to show with reasonable certainty that they are present at all times, the railroad company, by its acquiescence, seemingly assenting to and inviting such use, the traveler is not deemed a trespasser, or, if he is, the company is charged with notice of the fact of his presence. It may be thought harsh and arbitrary to draw a line between such and children who are allowed to habitually trespass on the moving cars. But the line must, of necessity, be drawn somewhere. And, where the gradation becomes shadowy and indistinct, it may appear that the line is drawn arbitrarily. But it is not so in this instance. A very practical differentiation exists logically. The public—which, of course, includes everybody—may 415, 34 N. E. 186, it was held that leaving street cars in a street was not an invitation or license to children to play upon them, although the street car company knew that they were calculated to attract children, and did attract them.

Recovery of damages for injuries to children in the turntable and kindred cases can hardly be justified on the ground of implied invitation, as that doctrine was formerly understood, any more than it can be justified on the ground of implied intention to injure; but, if the circumstances of the cases are such that the landowner ought to be made liable, there is perhaps no great sin in extending the doctrine of implied invitation to meet the demands of advancing civilization. The whole doctrine of implied invitation is no doubt founded in "judicial legislation," ready as the judges would be to deny it. The courts adopting the attractive nuisance doctrine have "legislated" once more, that is all; but this is not saying that, as between the children and the landowner, the judges, in throwing this weight in the scale in favor of the little ones, have done well or ill. Certainly the dire results that some of the courts have feared have not yet come to pass, and probably much good has been done in the way of forcing the guarding of exposed machinery dangerous to children, and preventing them from trespassing in places where they are liable to be hurt.

c. Child not regarded as trespasser.

In some of the cases, the injured child seems to be regarded as not a trespasser, not 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) on the ground that he went upon the premises on an implied invitation, but because he is a child too young to commit a trespass.

In Lewis v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ind. App.) 84 N. E. 23, it was said that the courts of Indiana do not regard as a trespasser a child of tender years, attracted by something on the premises which appeals to his curiosity.

In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Simpson, 60 Tex. 103, in sustaining a verdict in favor of a twelve-year-old boy hurt while playing on a turntable, the court said that it appeared that the turntable was uninclosed and near a pond to which boys went to fish. The entry upon such a place was not a trespass in a child which would deprive it of the right to recover for an injury resulting from the attempted use of the dangerous machine to which children would be attracted for sport or pastime.

And in Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Robertson (Tex.) 14 L.R.A. 781, 16 S. W. 1093, where the turntable was located not far from the business portion of a town, in an open and uninclosed place where persons were in the habit of passing, there being nothing to prevent free access to the place, and where children had frequently resorted to play on the turntable, and where accidents had happened previous to the injury of the plaintiff, the court held, on the authority of the last-mentioned case, that the entry upon such a place by a child was not a trespass which would deprive it of the right to recover for the injury.

In Lynchburg Telegraph Co. v. Booker, 103 Va. 594, 50 S. E. 148, it was held that a child who thrusts his hand through a rail-obtain an easement in land by prescription. The particular land thereby is dedicated to the public use. As railroads do run upon streets of cities, it is not inconsistent that streets may be opened up along the railroad track. If the railroad, in fact, so dedicates its track in a city, or allows it to be so used for such a length of time as that the public right attaches as if there had been such dedication, then the public are there as a matter of right; or, at least, the railroad, because of its acquiescence and seeming invitation, will not be heard to deny it. Its duty in that event is to maintain a lookout for such persons, knowing they are probably present; and to take precautions against injuring them. But this rule of presumptive dedication does not apply as to sparsely settled sections, or where the use is comparatively infrequent, and without semblance of an assertion of a public right. These rules obtain without any respect to the ages or mental conditions of those using such ways. Now, as to the cars, there is no such thing as the public's acquiring a right to use them by prescription. There is no precedent for such a claim, and no principle in law analogous to it. All who venture unbidden by the company, and unknown to it, upon its trains, do so at their own peril, as they can have no right, and the company therefore owes them no duty, in such case. This rule also applies from the very necessity of the matter, without respect to the age or condition of the trespasser; for the court must deal with the question first of legal duty, not compassionate innocence.

Counsel for appellant cites and relies upon Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Popp, 96 Ky. 103, 27 S. W. 992; Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193, and a line of cases known as the "turntable cases." In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Popp, supra, the injured child was known to be on the car by the trainmen when they bumped other cars against it so violently and negligently as to throw the plaintiff off and hurt him. The principle on which the recovery was allowed in that case is one firmly fixed; namely, the known presence of a trespasser imposes the duty on the trainmen to use care not to injure him. They have the right to eject him because he is a trespasser; but not to kill or maim him. Bransom v. Labrot, supra, rests on the same principle as the turntable cases; namely, the negligent leaving, and grasps a live wire on private premises, mistaking it for a string, was not such a trespasser as would relieve the owner of the wire from responsibility for resulting injuries. The court said that, in legal contemplation, it might be that any unauthorized entry upon the premises of another whose title extended to the center of the earth downward and without limit upward, by putting one's hand through or over the boundary fence, was a trespass. But it would certainly seem that the trespass had reached its vanishing point when it was committed by a child eight years of age. The owner of the premises would find it difficult to maintain such a defense if he had knowingly permitted so grievous a danger to exist within reach of a public street, and thereby caused an injury to one incapable of contributory negligence.

d. Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas.

In some of the turntable cases reference has been made to the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas as a reason for imposing liability for injuries to children.

In Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 862, the court said that there might be more, but there was one, conclusive answer to this argument, and that was that it referred only to acts of the landowner, the effects of which extended beyond the limits of his property.

e. Circumstances showing negligence.

landowner to avoid injuries to trespassing children having been given, what has been deemed to amount to a breach of this duty, that is, what constitutes the negligence upon which the liability arises, will now be considered. The grounds upon which railroads have been held liable in the turntable cases may be summed up as:

1. That the turntable is easily accessible to children.

2. That it is peculiarly attractive to children, and calculated to entice them.

3. That, when set in motion, it is a source of latent danger.

4. That it was left unguarded and unfastened, although, at slight expense, it could have been guarded and fastened.

5. That the company knew that children were accustomed to play there, and ought to have known the danger to them.

In Gates v. Northern P. R. Co. 37 Mont. 103, 94 Pac. 751, in reversing a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the death of an eleven-year-old child killed by the toppling over of a car, set bottom side up on the slope of an embankment, the case not having been brought within the requirements for recovery under the attractive nuisance doctrine, Brantly, Ch. J., did not approve the doctrine of the turntable cases, but Smith, J., who wrote the opinion of the court, and Holloway, J., both approved it, and the former said that, in his opinion, when the owner or occupier of grounds brought or artificially created something thereon especially attractive to children, as shown by the nature of the thing itself, and the fact that a child was, or children were, attracted to it, and left it so exposed that ing upon one's lands unguarded, dangerous contrivances attractive to children, whereby they are lured onto the real property of the negligent owner, and sustain injury. But that principle has not a place here. The cars were not left in unguarded lots, but were being used in the only way the conditions permitted them to be used at the time and place.

So far, we have discussed this case omitting to mention another allegation of the petition which appellant seems to place some stress upon as supporting a right to recover in this action; that is, it is alleged that on an open lot owned by defendants, adjacent to their track where the injury occurred, defendants had placed a pile of sand and left it unguarded, which was attractive to children, and did attract them and the plaintiff to that point to play; that whilst they were there the train came along, when plaintiff left the sand pile, and attempted to board the cars. The allegation as to the sand is wholly redundant. The sand had no connection with the injury, and was not a proximate cause of it. If the plaintiff had been injured by the sand, or by rolling or slipping from it under the train, and thereby got hurt, a different question would be presented. But such was not the fact.

they were likely to come in contact with it, either as a plaything or an object of curiosity, and where their coming in contact with it or playing about it was obviously dangerous to them, the person exposing the dangerous thing should reasonably anticipate the injury that was likely to happen to them from its being so exposed, and was bound to use ordinary care to guard it so as to prevent injury to them. Holloway, J., said: "At present I am not prepared to go further than to say that I think such landowner should be held liable to the injured child only in a case presenting all the following facts: (1) That the injured child was too young and inexperienced to appreciate the danger, and was therefore incapable of contributory negligence; (2) that the injury was caused by an unguarded dangerous machine or other dangerous thing peculiarly attractive to children of the class to which the injured one belongs; (3) that the landowner impliedly invited children of that class to come upon his premises. This invitation may be implied from the fact that the landowner knew, or, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have known, that such children were in the habit of coming on his premises to play or to gratify their childish curiosity."

As a usual thing, it will be found that, in most of the turntable cases in which the railroad companies were made to pay for the injuries inflicted, the table was in a place easily accessible to children.

In Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686, 31 Am. Rep. 203, the doctrine of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We are of the opinion that the ruling on the demurrer was without error; and the judgment must be affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

WALTER H. BRISCOE, by Next Friend,
v.
HENDERSON LIGHTING & POWER COMPANY, Appt.

(148 N. C. 396, 62 S. E. 600.)

Pleading — alleyway — meaning.

1. The use of the term "alleyway," in describing the place where a personal injury occurred, does not, of itself, imply that the strip of land was dedicated to public use.

Dangerous premises — attractions — liability.

2. The mere erection of a building with large windows and doors through which can be seen machinery constantly in motion, upon a lot unfenced from the highway, which is calculated to allure children to see the machinery, does not render the owner liable for injury to a child falling into an insecurely covered well of hot water in an open space some distance from the building, where there is nothing to show that chilattractive nuisances was applied to a turntable located in an open prairie within less than half a mile of a populous city, where persons frequently passed and repassed, and where boys often played; the court saying that it would naturally attract boys and induce them to ride upon it, as all men ought to know. "Everybody knows," said the court, "that, by nature and by instinct, boys love to ride, and love to move by other means than their own locomotion. They will cling to the hind ends of moving wagons; ride upon swings and swinging gates; slide upon cellar doors and the rails of staircases; pull sleds up hill in order to ride down upon them on the snow, and even pay to ride upon imitation horses and imitation chariots swung around in a circle by means of steam or horse power. This last is very much like riding around in a circle upon a turntable. Now, everybody knowing the nature and the instincts common to all boys must act accordingly. No person has a right to leave, even on his own land, dangerous machinery, calculated to attract and entice boys to it, there to be injured, unless he first take proper steps to guard against all danger; and any person who thus does leave dangerous machinery exposed without first providing against all danger is guilty of negligence."

"Here," said the court, in Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, commenting on the last-mentioned case, "we have the doctrine of the turntable cases carried to its natural and logical result. We have only to add children had ever been allured to the premises by the machinery, or that the injured child was so allured.

Same — open space — theater.

3. The mere maintenance of an insecurely covered well of hot water upon an open space unfenced from the street, near the rear of a theater, will not render the owner liable for injury to a thirteen-year old child of average intelligence, who falls into it, although the child was allured to the place by a desire to see what was going on in the rear part of the theater.

(October 14, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vance County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

The plaintiff, suing by his next friend, alleges: That the defendant is a duly chartered corporation, engaged in supplying light to the inhabitants of Henderson, North Carolina, and heat and power to some of them. That the defendant has and operates its light and power and heating plant on Spring street, very near Main street of the town of Henderson, in a populous part of the said town, where there is much passing. That the defendant has and operates a large, attractive brick building, very large dynamos, shaftings, and pulleys, engines and boilers, and, by means of large doors and windows, these machines may be seen from the street, the railway tracks, and the alley near by. That Spring street crosses Main street at a point 114 feet from defendant's said plant. That defendant's manager, Mr. Woodsworth, lives on the corner made by the intersection of said streets, his residence lot being 61½ feet on Main street and 114 on Spring street. That next to his lot is the Grand Theater, on a lot 54 feet on Main street and running back 110 feet. That the light and power plant extends from Spring street across or along the rear of these two lots, and the space between the power plant building and the rear of Mr. Woodsworth's lot, which is inclosed by a high fence, and the rear wall of the Grand Theater, forms an alleyway about ——— feet wide, extending from Spring street, at a point near the Southern Depot, to an open lot which extends around the north side of the theater building to Main that every man who leaves a wheelbarrow or a lawn mower or a spade upon his lawn; a rake, with its sharp teeth pointing upward, upon the ground or leaning against a fence; a bed of mortar prepared for use in his new house; a wagon in his barnyard, upon which children may climb, and from which they may fall; or who turns in his lot a kicking horse or a cow with calf,— does so at the risk of having the question of his negligence left to a sympathetic jury. How far does the rule go? Must his barn door and the usual apertures through which the accumulations of the stable are thrown be kept locked and fastened, lest twelve-year-old boys get in and be hurt by the animals, or by climbing into the haymow and falling from beams? May a man keep a ladder, or a grindstone, or a scythe, or a plow, or a reaper, without danger of being called upon to reward trespassing children whose parents owe, and may be presumed to perform, the duty of restraint? Does the new rule go still further, and make it necessary for a man to fence his gravel pit or quarry? And, if so, will an ordinary fence do, in view of the known propensity and ability of boys to climb fences? Can a man nowadays safely own a small lake or fish pond? and must he guard ravines and precipices upon his land? Such is the evolution of the law less than thirty years after the decision of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, when, with due deference, we think some of the courts left the solid ground of the rule that trespassers cannot recover for injuries received, and due 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) merely to negligence of the persons trespassed upon."

On the other hand, where the turntable on which a nine-year-old boy was hurt was not in a public street, or in a place where persons generally were in the habit of passing, it was held that, in view of its isolated position, the company was not guilty of such want of care as would lawfully charge it with damages for the accident. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Bell, 81 Ill. 76, 25 Am. Rep. 269.

In Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484, the court did not regard the last-mentioned case as opposing, but rather as endorsing, the doctrine of the turntable cases.

Simply because a turntable, however, is located in an out-of-the-way place, 28 rods from the nearest highway, does not relieve the company from keeping watch to find out whether it is being used by children, where there are no fences or obstructions to prevent children from gathering upon it. Berg v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 95 Minn. 404, 104 N. W. 293, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 375.

The turntable or other injury-producing agency must next be attractive or alluring to the infantile mind under the attractive nuisance doctrine, and many of the cases in jurisdictions where the doctrine is recognized turn upon this question. It is because of the attractiveness of the thing, of course, which draws the child upon the premises, that the invitation is implied.

In an action against a company for injury to a boy of tender years by a turntable, it street. That this open alleyway is the property of, or in possession and control of, the defendant. That the said theater building and the residence of the said manager are heated or warmed by hot air, or steam, or hot water, supplied by pipes extending underground from engines in defendant's power plant across said alley into said buildings. That just on the edge of said alleyway, and next to the manager's fence and the theater building, are three small wells or receptacles several feet deep, into which the hot water from the heating pipes of said plant escapes. That these wells are filled or nearly filled all of the time with very hot water, and that this condition existed at the time hereinafter referred to. That the defendant, in the month of October, 1907, unlawfully, negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully permitted said alleyway to remain open in immediate proximity to Spring street, and did unlawfully, wrongfully, and negligently fail to cover up securely or in any manner guard one of said hot water wells, but unlawfully covered or permitted to be covered the said well with a thin and weak covering, which the plaintiff believes was a banana case. That the plaintiff, being only a small boy, with the intelligence, usual in boys of his age, in passing through said alleyway at said time, did not and could not see the well or hole of hot water aforesaid, or know that it was under the thin, weak piece of wood; and, not having been guarded or cautioned against it, stepped upon the thin wood covering, which instantly gave way, and precipitated plaintiff into said hole or well of hot water, which instantly, before he could extricate himself, burned and scalded the plaintiff's right foot and leg so that the skin and parts of the flesh came off, and the remaining flesh was lacerated and wounded and made dangerously sore from the bottom of the foot to 3 inches above the knee, and the plaintiff suffered great pain and anguish of body for a long time, and was put to great cost and expense for nursing and for medicines, and for attendance and services of a physician, to the plaintiff's damage of $2,000. The plaintiff further alleges that the entrances to the engine rooms and the power house and the theater were in said alley, and the machinery, being constantly in motion, is calculated to attract and allure boys and others to see the machinery and what may be seen in the theater, and the defendant was negligent and at fault in permitting said wells to remain in said alleyway, uncovered or defectively covered, and should be alleged that the child was drawn to it by childish curiosity, or that the table was attractive to children, or that the injured boy was then so young that he was unable to appreciate the danger of the situation. Belt R. Co. v. Charters, 123 Ill. App. 322.

To fix upon a railroad company the charge of negligence in the maintenance of a turntable attractive to children, it must be established that the turntable, having regard to its construction and situation, was of a kind which, if left unfastened or unguarded, was likely to attract children, or that the danger was so apparent that the defendant ought, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, to have anticipated that children would resort to the machine and be injured by it. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Crocker, 131 Ala. 584, 31 So. 561.

So it was held that, in an action for injury sustained by a boy of tender years on a turntable, based on the theory that it was an attractive nuisance, evidence tending to prove that other boys had been seen around the turntable before the accident, and that it was situate in a residence district, is admissible. Belt R. Co. v. Charters, supra.

In San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Morgan, 92 Tex. 98, 46 S. W. 28, reversing (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 169, the court said that, in so far as the turntable and other cases involving injuries upon dangerous machinery on private property might be considered to lay down the broad proposition that the owner could be held liable without proof of either an intent to injure or an invitation, it did not think they were based upon sound principle. It was contended in this case that when an owner placed or permitted anything to be upon his property which was attractive to another, who was thereby induced to go thereon, the invitation might be inferred as a fact by the court or jury. But it was held that, in order to amount to an implied invitation, the owner must maintain upon his premises something which, on account of its nature and surroundings, was especially and unusually attractive. The petition in the case, having failed to show an invitation, in that it neither alleged a direct invitation nor alleged that the turntable upon which the injury was caused was unusually attractive, and having failed to allege that there was any intent to injure, was held demurrable.

But, in San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Morgan, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 62, 58 S. W. 544, it was held that it was not necessary specifically to set up an implied invitation where the petition alleged that the turntable was a dangerous machine for children of tender years and immature judgment to play with, on account of its nature and surroundings, and especially because they could easily revolve it and ride upon it; that when it was not locked it was especially and unusually calculated to attract, and did attract, such children, and appealed to their instinct to play, and that it tempted and lured them and thereby caused them to enter thereon when it was not locked, to turn it round and ride thereon, and in other such negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the plaintiff's great injury and suffering.

The defendant demurred to the complaint for that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it did not allege or appear: (1) That the defendant owed the plaintiff or the public the duty of keeping said alleyway (so-called) on or across its own premises open or free from obstruction so as to be used by the public, or that defendant owed the plaintiff any special duty whatsoever. (2) That the plaintiff or the public had any right to go upon the premises of the defendant or upon the alleyway, or to use the same for any purpose whatsoever. (3) That the alleyway was used by the plaintiff or the public, or that defendant knew that the plaintiff was in the habit of going on said premises, or had ever invited him there. (4) That the defendant knew that the alleged alleyway was a common resort of children of tender years in which to congregate and play, or that defendant was guilty of any act constituting negligence. For that it did appear from the allegations of the complaint: (5) That the open alleyway where the plaintiff alleges he was injured was the private property of the defendant, and that defendant was in the possession and control thereof, and was using the same for the purposes permitted in its charter. (6) That the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the premises of the defendant, and was of such age as to be guilty of contributory negligence, and that the injury of which he complains was due to his own negligence, and not to the negligence of defendant.

His Honor overruled the demurrer, and gave defendant time to file answer. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Messrs. A. C. Zollcoffer and J. H. Bridgers, for appellant:

More attractiveness to children will not justify a recovery, and especially where the injury complained of occurred on the private property of the owner.

ways to make it a means of childish sport and diversion, the children being ignorant of the danger they thereby incurred, and that the defendant had knowledge of the practice of children to amuse themselves by playing thereon.

In San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Morgan (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 672, a case in which the petition was almost identical with that in the last-mentioned case, it was said, on rehearing, that, to arrive at the conclusion in that case, it became necessary to overrule a long line of decisions, ranging through more than 30 volumes of the Texas reports.

The language of the court in San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Morgan, supra, as to the necessity of showing invitation to bring a case within the turntable doctrine, was approved in Driscoll v. Clark, 32 Mont. 172, 80 Pac. 1, rehearing denied in 32 Mont. 192, 80 Pac. 373.

In Denison & P. Suburban R. Co. v. Harlan, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 87 S. W. 732, it was contended in effect that inasmuch as there was no evidence of direct invitation to the injured child to ride upon the turntable, the invitation being implied only from the attractiveness of the turntable for children, it was permissible to give positive proof that the turntable was no more attractive than ordinary pools of water where they could fish or paddle or sail boats. The court, however, held that such evidence was immaterial, and that the issue was whether or not the maintenance of the particular turntable where located, unlocked, unfenced, and unguarded, so that it could be and was used by children as a plaything, rendered it so peculiarly and unusually calculated to attract them as to constitute an implied invitation to them to go upon and use it to their amusement.

In Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 24 Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 666, in holding that it was not an answer to the claim of liability against the company that the child was a trespasser, and that, if it had not meddled with the defendant's property, it would not have been hurt, and that the law imposed no duty upon the defendant to make its premises a safe playground for children, the court said that in the forum of law, as well as of common sense, a child of immature years was expected to exercise only such care and self-restraint as belonged to childhood; and a reasonable man must be presumed to know this, and required to govern his actions accordingly. It was a matter of common experience that children of tender years were guided in their actions by childish instincts, and were lacking in that discretion which was ordinarily sufficient to enable those of more mature years to appreciate and avoid dangers; and, in proportion to this lack of judgment on their part, the care which must be observed toward them by others was increased.

In Houck v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 116 Mo. App. 559, 92 S. W. 738, the court said that difficulty had been experienced in stating a principle for the turntable decisions which could be reconciled with the proposition that the owner of premises was not responsible for injuries to trespassers on them, received in consequence of the condition of the premises, when there was no carelessness or wilful conduct by the owner. The court thought the controlling circumstance was the extent to which the machinery was likely, from its construction and situation, to attract children, together with the dangerous character of the appliance. According to the rule in analogous matters it should be for the jury to say whether the attractiveness or danger was so great as to hold the owner liable if an injury occurred; but the cases showed that the court had exercised much control over this question.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The diagram attached to the complaint shows that the defendant's power house and

In Smalley v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. (Utah) 98 Pac. 311, the court said that it was not the keeping or leaving of all kinds of dangerous and attractive machines or other instruments upon premises that rendered the owner or occupant liable if he did not take precautions to guard or protect them, or to prevent intrusions and unauthorized visits of children. The instrument or agency must not only be dangerous and attractive, but the circumstances of leaving and maintaining it must also be such as to induce young children to believe that they are at liberty to enter and handle or play about it. That is, it must be made to appear, either from the character of the instrument or agency itself, or from the manner and circumstances under which it was maintained or left about the premises, or from other conduct on the part of the owner or occupant of the premises, that an inducement or its equivalent was held out to young children to enter. Not necessarily the doing of something on the part of the owner or occupant for the purpose of inducing the entry, but the doing of something other than a mere operation of the machine or instrument in the ordinary and engine room are located on Spring street, which intersects with Main street. The manager's residence fronts on Main street. At its intersection with Spring street, adjacent to the dwelling fronting on Main street, is the theater, and adjacent thereto is an usual manner, which had the effect of causing or inducing the entry.

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Crocker, supra, the court said: "Common prudence forbids that one may arrange even on his own premises that which he knows, or, in the exercise of common judgment and prudence ought to know, will naturally attract others into unsuspected danger or great bodily harm. It is the apparent probability of danger, rather than rights of property, that determines the duty and measure of care required of the author of such a contrivance, for ordinarily the duty of avoiding known danger to others may, under some circumstances, operate to require care for persons who may be at the place of danger without right."

But, in Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 805, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 497, the court said that the fact that a dangerous place or object was attractive to children of tender years was legitimately significant where the question of their own want of care was raised. But there were fundamental and insuperable difficulties standing in the way of adopting the rule that the mere attractiveness of private property gave to the persons attracted rights against the owner. One difficulty was that the rule pro tanto ignored the distinction between meum and teum. And on what principle was it to be limited to cases of trespass? Why did it not apply equally to the conversion of personal property or even to larceny? If those who temporarily, and for limited purposes, converted the private property of their neighbors to their own use, were not to be excused, but justified, where, by reason of their tender years, they were tempted to trespass, and, at the same time, were to have rights of action against the open or vacant lot. In the rear of the dwelling there is a high fence. Between this fence and the power and engine house is a vacant space, called, in the complaint, an "alleyway," opening on Spring street, and extending the distance of the width of the power and engine house on one side and the dwelling and theater on the other, and finding an outlet into the vacant lot. The width of this "alleyway" is not given, but the depth of the lot upon which the dwelling is located is 114 feet from the corner of Main street. In the space, or alleyway, the defendant has dug three small wells or receptacles several feet deep, into which the hot water from the heating pipes escapes. "The dwelling and the theater are heated by hot air or steam, supplied by pipes extending underground from defendant's engines, across said alleyway into said buildings." The wells are usually full of hot water. The distance of the wells from Spring street is not given, but from the map it appears that the one into which plaintiff fell is about 62 feet from said street, and just back of the rear wall of the theater. For the purpose of operating its business of supplying light to the city of Henderson, the defendant has erected "a large, attractive brick building, very large dynamos, shaftings, and pulleys, engines and boilers, and, by means of large doors and windows, these machines may be seen from the streets, the railway tracks, and the alley near by." It is further alleged that the entrance to the power and engine rooms are in the said "alleyway," and "the machinery, being constantly in motion, is calculated to attract and allure boys and others to see the machinery and what may be seen in the theater." Plaintiff, a boy of thirteen, "with the intelligence usual in boys of said age," passing through said alleyway on October —, 1907, not knowing or being warned of the existence of said wells, and the one in controversy not being securely covered, stepped into it and was injured. The negligence alleged is not covering up securely or in any way guarding "one of said wells," but permitting it to be covered with a thin, weak covering, etc. The demurrer is based upon the failure of the plaintiff to allege true owners for the failure to exercise care about rendering the property suitable for their use, why might not those who, under similar temptations, converted the property of others wholly to their own use, be likewise justified, and, instead of the right of action, gain a complete title to the property by simply appropriating it?

In Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L.R.A. 833, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 682, it was held that a railroad company was not liable for injury to a child by a turntable, although the table was located in an open field, on the land of the company, within 90 feet of a public street, and was entirely unguarded and unprotected. It was held to be erroneous to leave the case to the jury on the theory that, if the turntable was a structure of a character to tempt children to meddle with it, and dangerous to them, the railroad company was chargeable with the duty of using reasonable care to protect them from harm, the negligent performance of which would render the company liable for the injuries received.

In the following cases in which the attractive nuisance doctrine was invoked, the element of "attractiveness" was not present.

The turntable doctrine does not apply to a case in which a ten-year-old girl leaves the highway to go across land used by a city as a dumping ground for garbage and manure, the refuse forming a crust over an excavation filled with water, upon which crust the child attempts to walk, and through which she breaks, and falls into the water, and is drowned, since there is nothing alluring or enticing to children upon the premises. Dehanitz v. St. Paul, 73 Minn. 385, 76 N. W. 48.

doctrine against the owner of premises attractive to children for injuries to a nine-year-old boy, caused by catching his clothes in an unprotected revolving shaft, where the injured boy was not in fact attracted to the spot, and was not induced to go there by reason of his childish instincts and inclinations. O'Leary v. Brooks Elevator Co. 7 N. D. 554, 41 L.R.A. 677, 75 N. W. 919.

And where a child fifteen months old was run over by an engine, it was held that there was nothing to bring the case within the doctrine of the attractive nuisance cases, where there was neither allegation nor proof that there was anything in the railroad track, its ties or rails, to attract or hold out an implied invitation to such a child as to require a railroad to guard its right of way against children. Cowley v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 87 Ill. App. 123.

In Norman v. Bartholomew, 104 Ill. App. 667, it was held that an eight-year-old boy who was hurt by a mangle in a laundry could not be said to have been attracted by the machinery, so as to render the owner liable under the doctrine of the turntable cases, where it appeared that his mother, who worked in the laundry, called him into the room in order to restrain him from quarreling with another boy. The court said that there was no disposition to extend the turntable doctrine to cases not clearly within the rule.

A depot is not a place which allures children of tender years, or holds out to them an implied invitation or special attraction to visit it. Ling v. Great Northern R. Co. 165 Fed. 813.

A four-year-old boy who is induced to go into a railroad switch yard by his elder brother, in order that the latter may have him under supervision while picking up any facts showing that defendant owed him any duty in respect to placing, using, or covering the wells upon its premises. The plaintiff does not allege that the space called an "alleyway" was ever used, or intended to be used, either as a public or private way for passing upon or over defendant's premises, nor does he allege that he ever so used it. He does not allege the purpose for which he entered upon the premises, or that any relation existed between defendant and himself entitling him to enter upon the alleyway. For the purpose of bringing himself within a class of cases decided by the courts, imposing a higher degree of care upon persons having upon their premises structures or other things which are calculated to attract children, he says that "the machinery, being constantly in motion, is calculated to attract and allure boys," etc., "to see the machinery and what may be in the theater." He does not allege that boys were ever, in fact, allowed to go into the alleyway for either purpose, or that he was so attracted or allured. It appears from the complaint that the alleyway belonged to and was under the control of defendant, and that the premises were being used for a lawful purpose, and that the wells were useful and necessary for such purpose.

The liability of owners of premises adjacent to the public highways for injuries sustained by persons using such highways by reason of obstructions or pits placed so near thereto as to render them dangerous is well settled. Bunch v. Edenton, 90 N. C. 431; Walker v. Reidsville, 96 N. C. 382, 2 S. E. 74. No question of that kind is presented by the complaint, because it is not alleged that plaintiff, while using the highway, fell into the well. He expressly negatives this suggestion by saying that, "in passing through said alleyway," he was injured. The well was 62 feet from the street. While the term "alleyway" is used to describe the space upon which the wells were dug, plaintiff does not allege that it was used by the public, or that the public were, either expressly or impliedly, invited to use it as a public passway, or that any persons so used it. The use of the term "alleyway" does not of itself imply that the strip of grain that is scattered along the tracks, is not attracted to the premises by any activity of enterprise that is there being carried on, so as to make the company liable under the attractive nuisance doctrine for his subsequent injury while trying to leave the place. Union Stock Yard & Transit Co. v. Butler, 92 Ill. App. 166.

For other cases in which the element of attractiveness has been held absent, see IV. infra.

In the cases in which the attractive nuisance doctrine is discussed, it will be observed that the dangerous character of the thing causing the injury is mentioned; that is, the fact that it is in itself, in the position in which it is, inherently dangerous to children; and many of the cases turn upon this ground. A point is also made that the danger must not be obvious.

In Driscoll v. Clark, 32 Mont. 172, 80 Pac. 1, rehearing denied in 32 Mont. 192, 80 Pac. 373, it was held that it was not enough, under the turntable cases, that the owner of an endless chain knew that it attracted children, to render him liable for a resulting injury, since it must be shown that the machinery was so especially and unusually alluring to children as to attract them. To bring this class of machinery within the rule it must also be shown to have been inherently dangerous.

Another point that is made in favor of the turntable doctrine is that the children could be easily protected from injury while the turntable is not in use, and at slight expense. This is one thing which tends to place the turntables in a class by themselves. The unusual attractiveness of the table itself, it being a sort of a merry-go-round, might not be enough to impose liability on the company if it were impracticable to fasten it; but it can be fastened so easily, and at so slight an expense, and the moral duty to protect those unable to protect themselves is so high, that it is not surprising that liability should have been imposed in these cases. The practicability and expense of guarding the thing or place often marks the dividing line between a case in which the attractive nuisance doctrine is applied and one in which it is not. It might be practicable to lock a turntable when not in use; but it would be impossible to lock the revolving entrance door to a building, and have it of any use; and so it would be, if not impossible, at least too much to expect, that an artificial pond should be protected by a fence high or fast enough to keep a small boy out if he desired to reach it to fish or swim. All the ridicule to which the doctrine has been subjected has been due to the suggested application of it in situations where application would be ridiculous, because imposing a duty impossible of performance, or practically so. A very important fact which must be taken into consideration in connection with the turntable cases is the ease with which the table can be protected. This requirement of the doctrine prevents its application to a very wide range of cases.

In Lewis v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ind. App.) 84 N. E. 23, the court said that railroad companies are not to be deprived of the use of structures or appliances necessary for the carrying on of their business because they are attractive to children, and may result in injury to them by reason of their ignorance or want of judgment: but where, with but little expense, such properties may be made safe when not in use, the company should be required to make them so.

land was dedicated to the public use. Milliken v. Denny, 135 N. C. 19, 47 S. E. 132. One may well use a portion of his private lot as an alley for domestic purposes, or a manufacturing establishment, or, as in this case, an electric light plant, for uses connected with his or its business, without subjecting it to a public use. Of course, if, when so used, its servants or others who are invited or entitled to pass over it are injured by pitfalls or obstructions placed there, the owner of the premises is liable. This liability arises out of the duty imposed upon the owner by reason of his relation to his employee or licensee. As we construe the language of the complaint, the defendant did not, by leaving the space on Spring street open, invite or grant any license to the public or to the plaintiff to enter upon or pass over the open space or alleyway. He was a trespasser upon the defendant's premises. The liability to him for injuries sustained, therefore, depends upon the measure of duty which it owed to him. We had occasion at the last term to consider this question in McGhee v. Norfolk &

S. R. Co. 147 N. C. 142, 60 S. E. 912. After a careful re-examination of the question in the light of numerous well-considered authorities, we see no reason to change our opinion as expressed in that case. In view of the adoption of the "stock law" in this state, and the custom generally prevailing in our towns, of dispensing with fences around lots, the question becomes of more practical importance with us than heretofore. It would impose an unreasonable burden upon the owners of cultivated lands and of lots in towns to require them to guard every pathway or alley used for their own convenience against the intrusion of trespassers, or, in default thereof, be held liable for every injury sustained in passing over their premises or through their property. We do not find that any court has so held. In Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, it is said: "The owner of the land is not bound to protect or provide safeguards for wrongdoers. . . . No duty is imposed by law on the owner or occupant to keep his premises in a suitable condition for those who come there solely

In Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 217, 65 Pac. 379, the court said that the gist of the decisions in the turntable cases lies not alone in the fact that the danger is one especially created by the act of the owner, but that the danger is one which can be removed by a lock, without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the machine; and that the turntable may also well be considered peculiarly attractive to children as a movable machine in the nature of a merry-go-round; and that the unprotected machine itself becomes a trap for them, since the children are ignorant of the dangers and injury to which they are exposed when revolving it.

In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 349, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 113, 598, the court said that the owner of a thing dangerous and attractive to children was not always and universally liable for an injury to a child tempted by the attraction. His liability bore a relation to the character of the thing, whether natural and common, or artificial and uncommon; to the comparative ease or difficulty of preventing the danger without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the thing; and, in short, to the reasonableness and propriety of his own conduct, in view of all the surrounding circumstances and conditions. As to common dangers, existing in the order of nature, it was the duty of parents to guard and warn their children; and, failing to do so, they should not expect to hold others responsible for their own want of care. But, with respect to dangers specially created by the act of the owner, novel in character, attractive and dangerous to children, easily guarded and rendered safe, the rule was, as it ought to be, different; and such was the rule of the turntable cases, of the lumber-pile cases, and all others of a similar character. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Another element going to make up the liability of the landowner in the attractive nuisance cases is his knowledge that the place is attractive. But this need not necessarily be actual knowledge. Having the knowledge that the dangerous thing is attractive to children, and that children resort to it, he is said to extend an implied invitation to them to come upon the premises.

If the company knows the probable consequences of maintaining an unguarded and unfastened turntable, and that children play and ride upon it in ignorance of their danger, and a child is injured while at play thereon, the company is liable. Lewis v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. supra.

In Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, the court said that it was true that the defendant did not leave the turntable unfastened for the purpose of injuring young children; and that, if the defendant had no reason to believe that the unfastened turntable was likely to attract and to injure young children, then the defendant would not be bound to use care to protect from injury the children that it had no good reason to suppose were in any danger. But the complaint in the case stated that the defendant knew that the turntable, when left unfastened, was easily revolved, and was attractive and dangerous to children, and that it knew that many children were in the habit of going on it to play. The defendant, therefore, knew that, by leaving the turntable unfastened and unguarded, it was not merely inviting young children to come upon the turntable, but was holding out an allurement which, acting upon the natural instincts by which such children were controlled, drew them by those instincts into a hidden any facts showing that defendant owed him any duty in respect to placing, using, or covering the wells upon its premises. The plaintiff does not allege that the space called an "alleyway" was ever used, or intended to be used, either as a public or private way for passing upon or over defendant's premises, nor does he allege that he ever so used it. He does not allege the purpose for which he entered upon the premises, or that any relation existed between defendant and himself entitling him to enter upon the alleyway. For the purpose of bringing himself within a class of cases decided by the courts, imposing a higher degree of care upon persons having upon their premises structures or other things which are calculated to attract children, he says that "the machinery, being constantly in motion, is calculated to attract and allure boys," etc., "to see the machinery and what may be in the theater." He does not allege that boys were ever, in fact, allowed to go into the alleyway for either purpose, or that he was so attracted or allured. It appears from the complaint that the alleyway belonged to and was under the control of defendant, and that the premises were being used for a lawful purpose, and that the wells were useful and necessary for such purpose.

The liability of owners of premises adjacent to the public highways for injuries sustained by persons using such highways by reason of obstructions or pits placed so near thereto as to render them dangerous is well settled. Bunch v. Edenton, 90 N. C. 431; Walker v. Reidsville, 96 N. C. 382, 2 S. E. 74. No question of that kind is presented by the complaint, because it is not alleged that plaintiff, while using the highway, fell into the well. He expressly negatives this suggestion by saying that, "in passing through said alleyway," he was injured. The well was 62 feet from the street. While the term "alleyway" is used to describe the space upon which the wells were dug, plaintiff does not allege that it was used by the public, or that the public were, either expressly or impliedly, invited to use it as a public passway, or that any persons so used it. The use of the term "alleyway" does not of itself imply that the strip of grain that is scattered along the tracks, is not attracted to the premises by any activity of enterprise that is there being carried on, so as to make the company liable under the attractive nuisance doctrine for his subsequent injury while trying to leave the place. Union Stock Yard & Transit Co. v. Butler, 92 Ill. App. 166.

For other cases in which the element of attractiveness has been held absent, see IV. infra.

In the cases in which the attractive nuisance doctrine is discussed, it will be observed that the dangerous character of the thing causing the injury is mentioned; that is, the fact that it is in itself, in the position in which it is, inherently dangerous to children; and many of the cases turn upon this ground. A point is also made that the danger must not be obvious.

In Driscoll v. Clark, 32 Mont. 172, 80 Pac. 1, rehearing denied in 32 Mont. 192, 80 Pac. 373, it was held that it was not enough, under the turntable cases, that the owner of an endless chain knew that it attracted children, to render him liable for a resulting injury, since it must be shown that the machinery was so especially and unusually alluring to children as to attract them. To bring this class of machinery within the rule it must also be shown to have been inherently dangerous.

Another point that is made in favor of the turntable doctrine is that the children could be easily protected from injury while the turntable is not in use, and at slight expense. This is one thing which tends to place the turntables in a class by themselves. The unusual attractiveness of the table itself, it being a sort of a merry-go-round, might not be enough to impose liability on the company if it were impracticable to fasten it; but it can be fastened so easily, and at so slight an expense, and the moral duty to protect those unable to protect themselves is so high, that it is not surprising that liability should have been imposed in these cases. The practicability and expense of guarding the thing or place often marks the dividing line between a case in which the attractive nuisance doctrine is applied and one in which it is not. It might be practicable to lock a turntable when not in use; but it would be impossible to lock the revolving entrance door to a building, and have it of any use; and so it would be, if not impossible, at least too much to expect, that an artificial pond should be protected by a fence high or fast enough to keep a small boy out if he desired to reach it to fish or swim. All the ridicule to which the doctrine has been subjected has been due to the suggested application of it in situations where application would be ridiculous, because imposing a duty impossible of performance, or practically so. A very important fact which must be taken into consideration in connection with the turntable cases is the ease with which the table can be protected. This requirement of the doctrine prevents its application to a very wide range of cases.

In Lewis v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ind. App.) 84 N. E. 23, the court said that railroad companies are not to be deprived of the use of structures or appliances necessary for the carrying on of their business because they are attractive to children, and may result in injury to them by reason of their ignorance or want of judgment; but where, with but little expense, such properties may be made safe when not in use, the company should be required to make them so.

land was dedicated to the public use. Miliken v. Denny, 135 N. C. 19, 47 S. E. 132. One may well use a portion of his private lot as an alley for domestic purposes, or a manufacturing establishment, or, as in this case, an electric light plant, for uses connected with his or its business, without subjecting it to a public use. Of course, if, when so used, its servants or others who are invited or entitled to pass over it are injured by pitfalls or obstructions placed there, the owner of the premises is liable. This liability arises out of the duty imposed upon the owner by reason of his relation to his employee or licensee. As we construe the language of the complaint, the defendant did not, by leaving the space on Spring street open, invite or grant any license to the public or to the plaintiff to enter upon or pass over the open space or alleyway. He was a trespasser upon the defendant's premises. The liability to him for injuries sustained, therefore, depends upon the measure of duty which it owed to him. We had occasion at the last term to consider this question in McGhee v. Norfolk &

S. R. Co. 147 N. C. 142, 60 S. E. 912. After a careful re-examination of the question in the light of numerous well-considered authorities, we see no reason to change our opinion as expressed in that case. In view of the adoption of the "stock law" in this state, and the custom generally prevailing in our towns, of dispensing with fences around lots, the question becomes of more practical importance with us than heretofore. It would impose an unreasonable burden upon the owners of cultivated lands and of lots in towns to require them to guard every pathway or alley used for their own convenience against the intrusion of trespassers, or, in default thereof, be held liable for every injury sustained in passing over their premises or through their property. We do not find that any court has so held. In Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, it is said: "The owner of the land is not bound to protect or provide safeguards for wrongdoers. . . . No duty is imposed by law on the owner or occupant to keep his premises in a suitable condition for those who come there solely

In Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 217, 65 Pac. 379, the court said that the gist of the decisions in the turntable cases lies not alone in the fact that the danger is one especially created by the act of the owner, but that the danger is one which can be removed by a lock, without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the machine; and that the turntable may also well be considered peculiarly attractive to children as a movable machine in the nature of a merry-go-round; and that the unprotected machine itself becomes a trap for them, since the children are ignorant of the dangers and injury to which they are exposed when revolving it.

In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 349, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 113, 598, the court said that the owner of a thing dangerous and attractive to children was not always and universally liable for an injury to a child tempted by the attraction. (N.S.)

Another element going to make up the liability of the landowner in the attractive nuisance cases is his knowledge that the place is attractive. But this need not necessarily be actual knowledge. Having the knowledge that the dangerous thing is attractive to children, and that children resort to it, he is said to extend an implied invitation to them to come upon the premises.

If the company knows the probable consequences of maintaining an unguarded and unfastened turntable, and that children play and ride upon it in ignorance of their danger, and a child is injured while at play thereon, the company is liable. Lewis v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. supra.

In Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, the court said that it was true that the defendant did not leave the turntable unfastened for the purpose of injuring young children; and that, if the defendant had no reason to believe that the unfastened turntable was likely to attract and to injure young children, then the defendant would not be bound to use care to protect from injury the children that it had no good reason to suppose were in any danger. for their own convenience or pleasure, and who are not either expressly invited to enter or induced to come upon them by the purpose for which the premises are appropriated and occupied, or by some preparation or adaptation of the place, for use by customers or passengers, which might naturally and reasonably lead them to suppose that they might properly and safely enter thereon." In Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. v. Rourke, 10 Ill. App. 474, Bailey, J., says: "It is a general rule of law that the owner of private grounds is under no obligation to keep them in a safe condition for the benefit of trespassers, idlers, bare licensees, or others who come upon them, not by any invitation, either express or implied, but for their own convenience or pleasure, or to gratify their curiosity, however innocent or laudable their purpose may be." In this case the deceased, while passing over defendant's premises, "without any invitation from the defendant, express or implied, and without any legal right," was injured. There was evidence that other persons were in the habit of passing over the premises for their own convenience without any objection on the part of defendant. It was held that defendant was not liable. In Cooper v. Overton, 102 Tenn. 211, 45 L.R.A. 591, 73 Am. St. Rep. 864, 52 S. W. 183, the court said: "There can be no liability unless it was the defendant's duty to fence the pond. It surely is not the duty of an owner to guard or fence every dangerous hole or pond or stream of water on his premises for the protection of persons going upon his land who have no right to go there. No such rule of law is laid down in the books, and it would be most unreasonable to so hold."

In Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 641, 33 L.R.A. 755, 56 Am. St. Rep. 543, 36 S. W. 659, Sherwood, J., after discussing the allegations of the complaint, says: "The petition, we think, fails to state a cause of action against the defendants, and that the demurrers were rightfully sustained. The single question presented by the record is whether the owner of a vacant lot upon which is situated a pond of water or a dangerous excavation is required to fence it, or otherwise insure the safety of strangers, danger; and having thus knowingly allured them into a place of danger without their fault (for it could not blame them for not resisting the temptation it had set before them), it was bound to use care to protect them from the danger into which they were thus led, and from which they could not be expected to protect themselves. The court added: "We agree with the defendant's counsel that a railroad company is not required to make its land a safe playground for children. It has the same right to maintain and use its turntable that any landowner has to use his property. It is not an insurer of the lives or limbs of young children who play upon its premises. We merely decide that when it sets before young children a temptation which it has reason to believe will lead them into danger, it must use ordinary care to protect them from harm. What would be proper care in any case must, in general, be a question for the jury, upon all the circumstances of the case."

Actual knowledge that children resort to a railroad trestle to play is immaterial in an action brought to recover for the death of a child killed by the fall of an iron placed thereon by the company, since it is bound to take notice of the habits of children, the character of the place, and the natural consequence of so placing the iron. Dwyer v. Missouri P. R. Co. 12 Mo. App. 597.

In Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 660, the court said that, if the defendant ought reasonably to have anticipated that, by leaving a turntable unguarded and exposed, an injury to a child was likely to occur, it must be held to have anticipated such injury, and to have been guilty of negligence in thus maintaining the table in an exposed position. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

IV. Extent of application.

a. Attraction on private premises.

1. Dangerous things in general.

It will be seen by a reference to the cases in the following subdivisions of this note, that there has been, as before stated, but a very limited extension of the attractive nuisance doctrine beyond the turntable cases.

In Coleman v. Robert Graves Co. 39 Misc. 85, 78 N. Y. Supp. 893, it was held that one who kindles a pile of shavings on his own premises, in the proper conduct of his business, owes no duty of active vigilance to prevent children from playing with the fire, and so is not liable for injuries received by a nine-year-old girl who, while poking in the ashes, allows her dress to catch fire, since setting the fire is not in the nature of setting a trap for the unwary, a child of that age knowing that the fire will burn.

The turntable doctrine will not be extended so as to render a railroad company which sets fire to stumps and rubbish on its unfenced right of way, and leaves the fire unguarded, liable for the death of a four-year-old child who goes to play with the fire, and is burned so that it dies. Erickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 82 Minn. 60, 51 L.R.A. 645, 83 Am. St. Rep. 410, 84 N. W. 402. The court said that it was not practicable to lay down any absolute rule as to the limitations of the doctrine. The manifest trend, however, of all the decisions of the court, was to limit its application to attractive and dangerous machinery and to other similar cases where the danger was latent. The court was not prepared to say that cases might not arise outside of this classification old or young, who may go upon said premises, not by his invitation, express or implied, but for the purpose of amusement or from motives of curiosity,"—citing Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, and many others, sustaining a demurrer. In that case it appeared that boys had been in the habit of bathing in the pond. There was "a sudden depression, making the water some 15 feet deep." A boy of nine years was drowned by going into the depression. In Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Bingham, 29 Ohio St. 364, 23 Am. Rep. 751, Boynton, J., after reviewing the authorities, thus sums up his conclusion: "The principle underlying the cases above cited recognizes the right of the owner of real property to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the same without liability to others for injuries occasioned by its unsafe condition, where the person receiving the injury was not in or near the place of danger by lawful right, and where such owner assumed no responsibility for his safety by inviting him there without giving him notice of the existence or imminence of the peril to be avoided."

In such cases the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, is in no sense infringed. In its just sense it means: "So use your own property as not to injure the rights of another." When no right has been invaded, although one may have injured another, no liability has been incurred. "Actionable negligence exists only where the one whose act causes or occasions the injury owes to the injured party a duty, created either by contract or by operation of law, which he has failed to discharge." The inducement to enter must be equivalent to an invitation. Mere permission is neither inducement, allurements, nor enticement. Carleton v. Franconia Iron & Steel Co. 99 Mass. 216. The principle, with its limitations, is clearly stated by Pollock, C. B., in Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire R. & R. D. Co. 4 Hurlst & N. 67: "When an excavation is made adjoining to a public way, so that a person walking upon it might, by making a false step, or being affected with sudden giddiness, . . . be thrown into the excavation, it is reasonable that the person making such excavation should be liable for the conse-

to which the doctrine ought to be extended, but held that, as a general rule, the doctrine of the turntable cases must be limited to cases of attractive and dangerous machinery and to other similar cases where the danger was latent. This rule might not be strictly logical, but it was a necessary one, unless landowners were to be made insurers of the safety of children when trespassing upon their premises.

One who, for the purpose of burning up waste material, starts a fire on vacant land, need not so guard it as to prevent injury to one who is attracted there by childish instincts. Paolino v. McKendall, 24 R. I. 432, 60 L.R.A. 133, 96 Am. St. Rep. 730, 52 Atl. 268.

Hot water in a ditch cannot be said to be an allurements sufficient to attract a child from a path, to his injury. Etheredge v. Central R. Co. 122 Ga. 853, 50 S. E. 1003.

The owner of a vacant lot is not liable for injury to a nine-year-old trespassing boy who gets into a pile of hot ashes or embers while at play, and is burned, where there is nothing attractive to children on the lot, and the plaintiff himself testifies that he was not attracted to the lot by anything in it, but merely went there to play. American Advertising & Bill Posting Co. v. Flannigan, 100 Ill. App. 452.

One who dumps ashes and cinders upon private grounds cannot be said to be thereby setting a trap to catch boys or other intruders, where there is no such intention. Smith v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. 82 Mo. App. 9.

The doctrine of the turntable cases will not be extended so as to render a railroad company liable for injury to a five-year-old boy who goes off of a path on the company's 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

premises, and falls into a ditch of hot water. Etheredge v. Central R. Co. supra.

No cause of action arises for injury to a twelve-year-old trespassing boy by the sudden discharge of steam and hot water upon him on premises upon which he has gone for the purpose of stealing type metal and lead junk. Mergenthaler v. Kirby, 79 Md. 182, 47 Am. St. Rep. 371, 28 Atl. 1065.

A recovery cannot be based on evidence that a three-year-old child lost its life by having fallen into a pool of hot water discharged on defendant's premises through an escape pipe, 60 feet from a public road, in the neighborhood and vicinity of several inhabited dwelling houses, since the plaintiff must show that the place was attractive to children, or that, to the knowledge of the defendant, children were in the habit of resorting to it for amusement or otherwise. Schmidt v. Kansas City Distilling Co. 90 Mo. 284, 59 Am. Rep. 16, 1 S. W. 865, 2 S. W. 417.

In Putney v. Keith, 98 Ill. App. 285, it was held that the daughter of the owner of a house was not liable for the death of a guest's two-year-old child, who, while at play, fell into a dish of hot water placed on the floor of the kitchen by the former while in the discharge of her household duties. Waterman, Justice, in delivering the majority opinion, said that it was not necessarily negligent to have about the house things that attracted the attention of children, and by which they might be injured. If such things were the ordinary utensils and appliances made use of by prudent people, and they were kept and used in such manner as they ordinarily were by prudent people, such keeping and use was not negligence in respect to adults or infants. Dibell, J., in a dissenting opinion, however, said that a dish a well-considered opinion, reviews the cases and examines the doctrine upon the reason of the thing. After stating the doctrine and the basis upon which it is placed, he says: "It is obvious that the principle on which the rule rests, if sound, must be applicable more widely than merely to railroad companies and the turntables maintained by them. It would require a similar rule to be applied to all owners and occupiers of land in respect to any structure, machinery, or implement maintained by them thereon, which possesses a like attractiveness and furnishes a like temptation to young children. He who erects a tower capable of being climbed, and maintains thereon a windmill to pump water to his buildings, . . . he who maintains a pond in which boys may swim in summer, or on which they may skate in winter; would seem to be amenable to this rule of duty. . . . In all of them the doctrine of the turntable cases, if correct, would charge the landowner or occupier with the duty of taking ordinary care to preserve young children thus tempted on his land from harm. The fact that the doctrine extends to such a variety of cases, and to cases in respect to which the idea of such a duty is novel and startling, raises a strong suspicion of the correctness of the doctrine, and leads us to question it." The illustration given by the learned chief justice shows that he has had experience with towers constructed to support windmills, with ladders leading to the tank, and with boys. He further says that the only rational ground upon which the doctrine can be founded is that having a thing attractive to children on his land is an implied invitation to children to come upon his premises and play upon them, in, around, and upon such thing. After showing conclusively that the liability cannot rest upon an implied invitation, he says: "A turntable, however attractive, could not be deemed to have been erected for the use which the child makes of it. This objection is not obviated by an appeal to the doctrine that children of tender years are not held to the same degree of prudence and care as adults; . . .

tender years, who take a stick of it and explode it, causing the death of one of the children and permanent injury to the other, the company is liable under the doctrine of the turntable cases. Mattson v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 95 Minn. 477, 70 L.R.A. 503, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, 104 N. W. 443, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 498. The court said that there was nothing so attractive to young boys as articles of an explosive nature, and the greater the volume of sound that might be produced therefrom the greater the attraction. As compared with an ordinary turntable, dynamite was vastly more attractive and for more dangerous. Young children were incapable of comprehending the dangers in handling or exploding the same, and their natural instincts urged them into experiments with it whenever it came within their reach. In view of these considerations, the rule of law imposed upon him who possessed such dangerous articles should be more exacting than in the case of him who maintained a turntable.

One who stores dynamite in a factory in such a manner that it can be easily discovered by children who are accustomed to play there is guilty of negligence which will render him liable for injuries to a boy by one of the sticks of the explosive which is taken from the box and set off by a companion under the supposition that it is a firecracker. Nelson v. McLellan, 31 Wash. 208, 60 L.R.A. 793, 96 Am. St. Rep. 902, 71 Pac. 747.

In Travell v. Bannerman, 71 App. Div. 439, 75 N. Y. Supp. 866, the court said that a lump of caked gunpowder in which pieces of brass were embedded fell within the description of a dangerous and enticing machine. In the case at bar, some companions of the plaintiff found the gunpowder in a rubbish heap on a vacant lot belonging to the defendant, an ammunition manufacturer, who brought it to the highway where plaintiff was. They proceeded to extract pieces of brass which it contained, and, in doing so, one of the boys pounded the lump with a rock, and an explosion resulted in which the plaintiff was hurt. It was held to be a question for the jury whether proper care had been exercised in dumping the material on the premises. Goodrich, P. J., dissenting. This case was reversed in 174 N. Y. 47, 66 N. E. 583, but on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to show that it was the defendant who had put the material there.

But in Ball v. Middlesborough Town & Lands Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 114, 68 S. W. 6, it was held that the owner of a house formerly used as a storage place for dynamite, who did not know that explosive caps had been left in the building, was not liable for injury to a six-year-old boy who climbed into the house through a broken window covering 6 feet above the ground, and exploded a cap which he found on the floor, where it had been thrown by workmen.

And a railroad company was held not liable for injury to an eight-year-old boy who took a signal torpedo from a railroad track, where it had been rightfully placed for the purpose of being exploded by an approaching train, carried it to his home, and set it off, since no greater safeguards could have been adopted. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hart, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1123, 70 S. W. 830.

And a railroad company was held not liable for injury to a twelve-year-old boy trespasser who took an explosive fog signal from a hand car, and then proceeded to pound it with a rock, since the taking was not innocent, and there was an absence of invitation or inducement. McShane v. Toronto, H. & B. R. Co. 31 Ont. Rep. 185.

for it is not a question of the child's negligence, but a question of the duty of the railroad company towards the child. If that duty is conceived to arise from the relation created by implied invitation, it must appear that the child is justified in believing that the turntable was designed for the use he makes of it, which is, of course, absurd." The supreme court of New Hampshire in Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396, 9 Atl. 790, expressly rejects the doctrine, saying: "We are not prepared to adopt the doctrine of Stout's Case, and cases following it, that the owner of machinery or other property attractive to children is liable for injuries happening to children wrongfully interfering with it on his own premises. The owner is not an insurer of the safety of infant trespassers." In Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283, the same conclusion is reached after a careful examination of the authorities by Lathrop, J. In Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A.

R. Co.* 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, the complaint alleged that "the defendant knew also that many children were in the habit of going upon the turntable to play." The latest discussion of the subject is to be found in Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 862, by Buchanan, J. After a careful examination of the decided cases, the learned justice rejects the doctrine of the "turntable cases," conceding that "there is a remarkable conflict of authority upon the subject." We have noticed this line of cases, not for the purpose of closing the question, as applied

In Hughes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 71 N. H. 279, 93 Am. St. Rep. 518, 51 Atl. 1070, it was conceded that, under the New Hampshire authorities, a railroad company could not be held to be in fault for not keeping its right of way free from unexploded signal torpedoes which might render the place dangerous to children. An unsuccessful attempt was made in that case to impose liability on the defendant for injury to a child by exploding a torpedo found on the track, on the theory that the injury was intentionally or wantonly inflicted.

In Afflick v. Bates, 21 R. I. 281, 79 Am. St. Rep. 801, 43 Atl. 539, it was said not to be negligence on the part of a city to leave a tool chest open and unguarded, so that access to it could be had by mischievous boys, and the explosive caps kept in it removed, but the point was really not decided, for it was held that, assuming such conduct to have been negligent, the city was not liable, because it was not the proximate cause of injury to the plaintiff, who was struck by falling particles of a cap exploded by another boy.

3. Lumber, building material, etc.

A railroad company is not liable for injury to a child while playing on a pile of railroad ties in the company's yards, open on the side of the railway track, and out of which children were always ordered when found, since it is under no obligation so to pile the ties as to prevent injury to a child climbing upon them. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Edwards, 90 Tex. 65, 32 L.R.A. 825, 36 S. W. 430.

In Kramer v. Southern R. Co. 127 N. C. 330, 52 L.R.A. 359, 37 S. E. 408, an action brought to recover damages for the death of a nine-year-old boy while at play on a pile of cross-ties in a public street, on the 19 L.R.A.(N.S.)

theory that the defendant's negligence grew out of the obstruction of a public street, the court said that if the cross-ties had been piled upon the defendant's own premises instead of in the street, and the defendant had had no actual knowledge that children were in the habit of playing on the ties, the law should have imposed no duty upon the defendant to look out for their safety by having the ties piled with a view to that end. The principle announced in the turntable cases would not apply if the ties had been carelessly piled on the defendant's premises. Those cases were exceptions to the general doctrine, and went to the very limit of the law. The mere attractiveness of premises to children would not bring a case within that exceptional doctrine.

An owner of lumber piled on private property is not liable for injury to a six-year-old boy, caused by a portion of the timber falling on him while at play on or about it. Powers v. Owego Bridge Co. 97 App. Div. 477, 89 N. Y. Supp. 1030.

But the owner of an unsafe pile of lumber from which a heavy piece of timber fell and killed a child of tender years was held liable for its death, where the lumber was piled within 40 feet of a public street, across a passageway which the public had been accustomed to use, and upon an open, unfenced lot that children had for years been in the habit of resorting to by license of the owner, and without objection or warning by him, and to which they could, before the timber was placed there, go with safety. Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193.

And a railroad company was held liable for maintaining within 2 feet of its track a wood pile attractive to children to its knowledge, so that a five-year-old boy, while at play thereon, was shaken off by the jar-to turntables, in this court, but to ascertain the basic principle upon which it was originally founded, and the basis of the criticism made of it by other courts. If liability arises in this particular class of cases, it must be because of some principle of the common law applicable to other cases governed by the same reason. Courts, guided by the principles of the common law, will not arbitrarily select one special object, like a turntable, and fix liability for injuries to children upon it, and refuse to carry the principle to its logical result in other cases. The court in Stout's Case failed to state the principle upon which it held the defendant liable, but was content to rely largely upon "the well-known case of Lynch v. Nurdin." As has been pointed out by several courts, in that case the horse and cart were left in the street unhitched. This was negligence per se. Lord Denman rested his opinion upon the ground that the defendant should have foreseen that children would be attracted to the horse and cart, etc. There was no suggestion that leaving it unhitched was an implied invitation to drive it away. On the contrary, it was conceded that the children were trespassers. It is manifest that, if the liability rests upon the theory that a turntable or other dangerous machinery, or ponds, excavations, structures, etc., on one's own premises, attractive to children, constitutes an implied invitation to them to enter and play with or upon them, the children are not trespassers or mere licensees, but come upon the premises with all of the rights on their part and duties on the part of the owner of the premises attaching to that relation. Again, if this be the principle, it is impossible to put any limit upon it, other than to include such things as either the child, the court, or the jury may regard as attractive or alluring. "The viciousness of the reasoning which fixes liability upon the landowner because the child is attracted lies in the assumption that what operates as a temptation to a person of immature mind is, in effect, an invitation. Such an assumption is not warranted." Gummere, J., in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v.

ring of the ground by a passing train, causing him to fall under the wheels and be injured. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Matson, 68 Kan. 815, 75 Pac. 503.

The owner of a building is not guilty of negligence in leaving a large stone leaning against the side thereof, over an opening on the sidewalk, on the theory that the place is attractive to children, although a thirteen-year-old boy of not sufficient capacity to understand his danger pulls the stone over, so that it falls and crushes his ankle, where the special findings show that the stone did not interfere with the use of the sidewalk, and that an ordinarily prudent person would not have anticipated that the stone would injure anyone in the exercise of due care, and not only that such children were not in the habit of playing or congregating at the place of the accident, but that there was nothing attractive to children there, and that an ordinarily prudent person would not have considered the stone to be dangerous or unsafe in the position which it occupied. Falkenberg v. Stout, 75 Kan. 172, 88 Pac. 874.

No liability arises for injury to a seven-year-old boy, caused by the fall of curb stones upon which he is playing tag, piled partly in a highway and partly on private premises. Kane v. Erie R. Co. 110 App. Div. 7, 96 N. Y. Supp. 810.

But in Schmidt v. Cook, 12 Misc. 449, 33 N. Y. Supp. 624, the owner of premises was held bound to know that a flat stone, 33 inches long, 25 inches broad, and 3 inches thick, leaning almost perpendicularly against a wooden fence and stone wall in a yard where tenants' children are supposed to play, will naturally tempt children to play upon and about it, and, by reason thereof, become dangerous to life and limb; and hence owes to children playing in the yard a duty of protection against harm. For former appeal of same case, see 4 Misc. 85, 23 N. Y. Supp. 799, reversing 1 Misc. 227, 20 N. Y. Supp. 889.

And the owner of an open lot, close to a highway, in a thickly populated part of a city, was held liable for the killing of a child by the toppling over upon him of a narrow section of cement pipe of large diameter, which was an attractive thing for children to roll about, to the knowledge of the owner, who was aware that children resorted to that place for that purpose. Kopplekom v. Colorado Cement Pipe Co. 16 Colo. App. 274, 54 L.R.A. 284, 64 Pac. 1047. The court said that "if an owner sees fit to keep on his premises something that is an attraction and allurements to the natural instincts of childhood, the law, it is well settled, imposes upon him the corresponding duty to take reasonable precautions to prevent the intrusion of children, or to protect from personal injury such as may be attracted thereby."

4. Dangerous machinery and appliances.

(a) In general.

The owners of grounds may be liable for injuries to trespassing children where, on account of the peculiar nature and exposed position of the dangerous defect or object, the owner should reasonably have anticipated such injury; and so, where the declaration alleged that a river drawbridge, located in a populous district of a city, was very attractive and enticing to children, and dangerous for them to be about while being opened and closed, and that it therefore became the duty of the defendant, while moving and turning the bridge, to keep a

Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L.R.A. 831. 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 682. The difference between a temptation to commit a trespass and an invitation to come upon one's premises is pointed out by Mr. Justice Holmes in Holbrook v. Aldrich, 168 Mass. 16, 36 L.R.A. 493, 60 Am. St. Rep. 364, 46 N. E. 115. These cases are cited with approval by Buchanan, J., in Walker's Case, supra. The present case illustrates the fallacy of the theory of implied invitation. Would it ever occur to any reasonable mind that constructing the building with large windows and doors, placing in it the engines, dynamos, and other machinery, and keeping them constantly in motion, for the purpose of discharging its corporate functions and duties, however attractive to small boys, was an invitation to them to make the premises a playground? To adopt the suggestion carries us too far afield for the practical affairs of life, and violates manifest truth. Judge Buchanan thus clearly and forcibly illustrates the fallacy of it: "No landowner supposes for a moment that, by growing fruit trees near the highway, or where boys are accustomed to play, however much they may be tempted to climb the trees and take his fruit, he is extending to them an invitation to do so, or that they would be any the less trespassers if they did go into his orchard because of the temptation. No one believes that a landowner, as a matter of fact, whether a railroad company or a private individual, who makes changes on his own land in the course of a beneficial user, which changes are reasonable and lawful, but which are attractive to children, and may expose them to danger if they should yield to the attraction, is by that act alone inviting them upon his premises. This doctrine of constructive invitation is not sustained . . . by the English cases . . . and has been utterly rejected by the highest courts" of a number of states.

It must be conceded that the liability for injuries to children sustained by reason of dangerous conditions on one's premises is recognized and enforced in cases in which no such liability accrues to adults. This we reasonable lookout and watch over its approaches, and to use reasonable precautions to prevent children from approaching, and from being thereby injured, it was held that the question should be left to the jury whether the swinging bridge was a dangerous structure, in which the defendant should reasonably have anticipated that a child would catch its foot while attempting to jump upon it, and whether the servants of the defendant in charge of the bridge used ordinary and reasonable care and precautions to prevent the happening of the injury. Coppner v. Pennsylvania Co. 12 Ill. App. 600.

The owner of unprotected revolving cogwheels, located in an open space, 20 feet from a street, is liable for injury to a three-year-old child by the machinery, and the fact that the child was a trespasser does not matter. Whirley v. Whiteman, 1 Head, 610. The court said that, in playing about the cogwheels, the child was but indulging the natural instincts of a child.

One whose servant starts dangerous machinery operated by horse power, and then leaves the building in which it is located without anyone in charge except boys of tender years, who go there to ride, is liable for the death of one of them, who, while trying to get off of the driver's box upon which he is mounted, is caught in the machinery and crushed. Gunderson v. Northwestern Elevator Co. 47 Minn. 161, 49 N. W. 694.

But in Smith v. Hayes, 29 Ont. Rep. 283, it was held that one who left a horse-power machine in a lot alongside of his warehouse, the lot being uninclosed on one side, and the machine being 30 feet distant from the highway, was not liable, even under the turntable doctrine, for injury to a five-year-old child who, in the absence of the driver, was hurt by it, where there was nothing to show that the machine was so situated as to attract or allure children to it, and there was no evidence that young children were in the habit of resorting for amusement to the lot.

In McAllister v. Seattle Brewing & Malt- ing Co. 44 Wash. 179, 87 Pac. 68, it was held that, under the rule adopted in Washington,—that where dangerous machinery and dangerous substances of a character likely to excite the curiosity of children, and allure them into danger, had been left unguarded in exposed places close to the highways or playgrounds of children, even though on premises of the owner, and children had been attracted to them, and had met with injury, the owner or person leaving the dangerous machinery or substance was liable for an injury,—the questions whether a sheave or pulley wheel placed in the center of a car track, and used in connection with a wire cable for moving cars for the use of a brewery, belonged to that class of dangerous machinery, whether it was of such an attractive or alluring character as to draw children to it, and whether it was placed and operated without guards, so close to a public highway that it must have been foreseen that it would attract and injure children of tender years, were held to be for the jury.

In Hydraulic Works v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332, a heavy platform so built that it could be raised or lowered across a private cartway in the heart of a city, close to a public highway, access to the premises being frequently left open, was held to be a dangerous trap when it was raised and unfastened and made to lean against a building at such an angle that a slight jar or pull would cause it to fall, and the owner of the premises was therefore held liable for the death of a six-think sound in principle and humane in policy. We have no disposition to deny it, or to place unreasonable restrictions upon it. We think that the law is sustained upon the theory that the infant who enters upon premises, having no legal right to do so, either by permission, invitation, or license, or relation to the premises or its owner, is as essentially a trespasser as an adult; but if, to gratify a childish curiosity, or in obedience to a childish propensity, excited by the character of the structure or other conditions, he goes thereon, and is injured by the failure of the owner to properly guard or cover the dangerous conditions which he has created, he is liable for such injuries, provided the facts are such as to impose the duty of anticipation or provision; that is, whether, under all of the circumstances, he should have contemplated that children would be attracted or allured to go upon his premises, and sustain injury. The principle is well stated in 21 Am. &

Eng. Enc. Law, p. 473, and was cited with approval in McGhee's Case, 147 N. C. 142, 60 S. E. 912. "A party's liability to trespassers depends on the former's contemplation of the likelihood of their presence on the premises, and the probability of injuries from contact with conditions existing thereon." Immediately following this language, the editor says: "The doctrine that the owner of premises may be liable in negligence to trespassers whose presence on the premises was either known, or might reasonably have been anticipated, is well applied in the rule of numerous cases that one who maintains dangerous implements or appliances on uninclosed premises, of a nature likely to attract children in play, or permits dangerous conditions [to exist] thereon, is liable to a child who is so injured, though a trespasser at the time when the injuries are received; and, with stronger reason, where the presence of a child trespasser is actually known to a party, or where such presence would year-old boy who, with others, strayed into the passageway through a gate that had been left open, and was playing there when the platform fell upon him. The decision rests on the ground that the owner of the premises might reasonably have apprehended such an accident. In this case the trial court, in response to the request to charge, stated that a child could not be treated as a trespasser or wrongdoer.

In Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, it was said that the last-mentioned case was authority only for its own facts; that what the court meant to decide in that case was that a person who maintained such a dangerous trap, close to a public highway, in the heart of a large city, might be liable to a person injured thereby although such person were a child of six years of age, trespassing upon the premises; and that the case was not authority for the proposition that a child could not be treated as a trespasser or wrongdoer, or for the proposition that the owner of premises in the neighborhood of a populous city, which were bounded by a public highway, must so use them as to protect those who strayed upon them and were accidentally injured. The court said that, in the Orr Case, there was a recklessness that might be said to partake of the nature of wantonness, and that it was only upon this principle that the judgment could be logically sustained.

In Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 353, 28 N. E. 283, Hydraulic Works v. Orr, supra, was said to rest upon the doctrine that an owner of land has no right to use his land near a highway in such a manner as to make it a public nuisance.

The Pennsylvania courts have been considerably bothered by the decision in Hydraulic Works v. Orr, supra, and they have attempted to explain and distinguish it; 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but in Duffy v. Sable Iron Works, 210 Pa. 326, 59 Atl. 1100, Mitchell, Ch. J., in a dissenting opinion, said that the reason why the case had become like a shuttlecock in battledore was not far to seek. The case was a departure from settled principles, was wrongly decided, and had never commanded the general approval of professional opinion either at the bar or on the bench.

A good cause of action for injury to a child was held stated in a declaration which alleged that the defendant operated an unguarded planing mill, situated in an open lot where children were allowed, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, to congregate and play, the place being adjacent to certain streets and highways in the midst of a thickly settled and populous district of a city, and supplied with dangerous machinery, including revolving interlocking cogwheels of such a character as to be attractive to children, and to appeal to their childish curiosity, to the defendant's knowledge, and which alleged that a nine-year-old boy, drawn to such dangerous machinery by childish curiosity, was injured thereby while exercising due care and caution for his own safety. Jensen v. Wetherell, 79 Ill. App. 33.

In Dublin Cotton Oil Co. v. Jarrard (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 531, a girl caught her foot in open conveying machinery in a cotton-seed mill and was hurt. It was urged that if she was there merely with the consent and knowledge of the defendant, the only duty owed to her was to refrain from doing acts knowingly the consequences of which would be injurious to her; and that if she was there not upon express or implied invitation, nor by permission or consent, then she was an intruder, and could recover nothing for injuries not wilfully and knowingly inflicted. But the court said that while this proposition might be urged against an adult with experience and judgment, it was

have been known, had reasonable care been exercised. . . . But where, under the circumstances, the presence of children on the premises was not reasonably to have been anticipated there is, of course, no duty as to such persons to have the premises safe. And, likewise, where, though children might have been expected to come upon the property, no injuries to them should reasonably have been contemplated under the circumstances, there is no negligence, and consequently no liability." Cases are cited which sustain these propositions. We think this the correct principle upon which the liability should rest. As said in Kramer's Case, 127 N. C. 330, 52 L.R.A. 359, 37 S. E. 468: "Mere attractiveness of premises will not bring a case within the exceptional doctrine." To allege simply that the machinery, including dynamos, engines, etc., in an attractive building, in the populous portion of a city, "is calculated to attract and allure boys and others to see the machinery," does not bring the case within the exception to the general principle. There is no suggestion that any boys had been "attracted or allured," nor is it even averred that the plaintiff was on the premises to see the machinery. On the contrary, the map shows that the location of the well into which he fell was on the side of the alleyway opposite the machinery. It is not easy to see how, at that place, the plaintiff could have seen the machinery. Again, there could be no possible danger in looking at the machinery. The "attractive building" had large windows and doors through which "those machines may be seen from the street" and other points. The case is in some respects similar to Schmidt v. Kansas City Distilling Co. 90 Mo. 284, 59 Am. Rep. 16, 1 S. W. 868, 2 S. W. 417, in which a child was scalded by falling into a pit or well into which pipes carrying hot water emptied. The court, after stating the general principle, says: "The evidence in this not the law governing our duties to little children, who, like the bees and the butterflies, wandered everywhere and into every place left open, as their childish instincts and impulses led them. They were not trespassers or intruders within the meaning of the law until they were old enough and intelligent enough to know and appreciate the right of the proprietor to exclude them from his premises by a simple command. They understood that they were required to keep out only when they could not get in. They paused not to read the signs of warning, or to inquire if they were welcome. Their little hearts told them they were welcome everywhere, and they must be protected from danger they know not of.

But in Brown v. Rockwell City Canning Co. 132 Iowa, 631, 110 N. W. 12, it was held that the owner of conveying machinery could not be held liable, under the doctrine of the turntable cases, for injury to an eleven-year-old boy, caused by the catching of his arm in one of the wheels of the machine, where the machinery was in an inclosed building into which it might reasonably be supposed that no one would come without proper caution.

A corporation maintaining over a body of water a revolving shaft with a coupling containing a projecting set screw, the shaft being supported by a timber framework which, together with the machinery and surroundings, is attractive to children, who are in the habit of resorting thereto for the purpose of amusement, men and boys being accustomed to climb about on the timbers for the purpose of fishing, to the knowledge of the company, was held liable for the death of a fourteen-year-old boy who, in climbing upon the structure, was caught by the set screw and wound around the shaft. Biggs v. Consolidated Barb-Wire Co. 60 Kan. 223, 44 L.R.A. 655, 56 Pac. 4. To the same effect 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fact is Biggs v. Consolidated Barb-Wire Co. 62 Kan. 492, 63 Pac. 740.

Whether, in any given case, there has been negligence on the part of the owner of property in maintaining dangerous machinery upon it, is a question of fact, dependent upon the situation of the property, and the attendant circumstances; because upon such facts will depend the degree of care necessary to guard others against injury therefrom. Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 866.

In the following cases under this subdivision of the note, the attempt to extend the turntable doctrine was unsuccessful.

A landowner is not liable, even under the doctrine of the turntable cases, for injuries to a trespassing child, caused by catching his leg in cable car machinery on its premises. Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Min. & Mfg. Co. 50 W. Va. 457, 55 L.R.A. 911, 88 Am. St. Rep. 884, 40 S. E. 410.

No obligation rests upon the owner to guard gin house machinery against the approach of infant trespassers, so as to render him liable for injury to an eight-year-old child who catches his hand in it. North Texas Constr. Co. v. Bostick, 98 Tex. 239, 83 S. W. 12.

No liability arises for the death of a six-year-old boy, who for the express purpose of riding, and in disregard of the warning of an older companion, gets upon a large ball attached to the end of a chain on a hoisting apparatus while the ball is in motion, and is carried up to the third story of a building, from which point he falls to the ground, and is killed, since the danger was obvious. Rodgers v. Lees, 140 Pa. 475, 12 L.R.A. 216, 23 Am. St. Rep. 250, 21 Atl. 399.

Failure of the owner of a factory forcibly to eject an eight-year-old boy whom he cannot make understand a command to leave the premises, and who is too young to appreciate his danger, is not negligence upon are open. Fences have been removed. Probably in a large majority of them at times conditions exist—woodpiles, coal bins, flower pits, barrels for receiving sewage, and many others—which are dangerous to persons passing over them at night. To impose upon the owners the burden of prevision, in the absence of any suggestion that, by acquiescence or otherwise, they had given a license to trespassers, would imperil the property of innocent persons. We have discussed the case at more than usual length because of its importance to the public, and because the questions presented have not heretofore been decided by this court.

This decision will be certified to the Superior Court of Vance, to the end that further proceedings may be had in accordance with the course and practice of the court.

Error.

Co. 28 Tex. Civ. App. 374, 67 S. W. 530. The court said that it believed it would be unwise to extend the turntable doctrine to cases of this character. It would seriously retard the material progress and cripple the business interests of the country if persons owning and operating public utilities which, from their very nature, required the use of structures placed in proximity to public highways, should be forbidden to use or maintain any structure or appliance of a kind calculated to attract and allure children to attempt their use as playthings, and which, when so used, became dangerous.

Electric light wires 18 feet above the ground, on poles which are stayed by guy wires stretched to the ground, by means of which an eleven-year-old boy is easily enabled to climb until his head come in contact with the wire, and he receives a shock which kills him, are not so attractive and inviting to children, within the doctrine of the turntable cases, as to render the company liable for the death of the child. Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 909, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 111 S. W. 712.

In Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Boeloven, 53 Kan. 279, 36 Pac. 322, it was held that a railroad company maintaining, near a small settlement, a stock yard sufficiently fenced and protected by an outside gate, would not be liable for the death of a five-year-old boy who was killed by the falling of a defective inside gate upon which he was swinging, if, without the knowledge of the company, he reached the place by climbing over the outside gate. But the court said that if, with the consent or knowledge of the company, children frequently climbed over the outside gate or inclosure of the stock yards, and played or swung on the inside gate, which was in a defective and dangerous condition, under certain circumstances, such negligence might be established as would create a liability for any injury resulting therefrom. 19 L.R.A. sulting to such children from a gate knowingly left in a dangerous condition.

A city is not liable for injury to a ten-year-old boy who climbs upon a gate on open land purchased for park purposes, and whose added weight breaks its lower bars, causing it to fall and hurt him. Guilmarin v. Philadelphia, 201 Pa. 518, 51 Atl. 312. The court said, however, that if an object was in itself dangerous, or might become dangerous if a child chanced to set it in motion while playing with it, or by running against it, there was a duty on the city to take such precaution as was reasonable, under the circumstances, to prevent injury by it.

In Ann Arbor R. Co. v. Kinz, 68 Ohio St. 210, 67 N. E. 479, the court said, obiter: "We think the better and more reasonable proposition is, that the owner of property owes no general duty to keep it in condition which will insure the safety of persons who go upon it without invitation or license; yet, if he keeps upon his premises dangerous machinery or other things likely to attract children, and does not guard them to prevent injuries to them, he is liable for injuries resulting from his neglect to provide such guards."

(b) Standing railroad cars.

Railroad cars and similar machines are not dangerous within the rule in the turntable cases. Barney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 126 Mo. 372, 26 L.R.A. 847, 28 S. W. 1069.

A railroad company need not guard cars standing by themselves on the track so as to keep children from getting upon them or from being run over while playing about them. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 47 Ill. 265.

The fact that a child is of such tender years as to be incapable of exercising care for its safety does not affect the question of the degree of care imposed on the servinfant who comes upon its premises without invitation, and who is injured there while playing, without its knowledge, with a turntable. The doctrine of the turntable cases is disapproved.

Reservoir — drowning of child.

3. A waterworks company is not liable for the death of drowning of an infant who comes upon its land without invitation, and there falls into a reservoir or basin of water while playing about it, without the knowledge of the company.

ants of a railroad company to avoid injury to it in starting a train in the absence of knowledge that the child is in danger of being run over; and, aside from the duty to give warning before starting by sounding a bell or whistle, no other duty is required to avoid injury to a three-year-old child, although it is attracted to the train by curiosity. East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Jenks, 54 Ill. App. 91.

A railroad company is not liable for the death of a boy less than five years of age, who climbs upon a flat car on a side track near a station in a small village, and loosens the brakes, and who, when the car starts on a down grade, jumps off in front of it and is run over. Central Branch Union P. R. Co. v. Henigh, 23 Kan. 347, 33 Am. Rep. 167. The court said the cars were not dangerous machines left exposed near a populous city, nor were they of so alluring a character as to entice boys to play upon them; for, when unfastened, they would move only a few feet and then stop; nor were they dangerous, even when moved, to ordinary boys. No one would have anticipated that a boy less than five years old would have gone to the cars unaccompanied by any older person, and have climbed upon one of them, and unloosened the brake, so as to set the car in motion.

That a railroad corporation left a car standing on one of several side tracks adjoining a public street, and knew that one of the doors of the car was insecurely fastened, and was liable, upon a slight touch, to fall to the ground, and that the company knew that the car was an enticing, attractive, and inviting object to children, and that children had been accustomed to play about such cars as might happen to be placed upon any of such side tracks, was held not to render it liable for injury to a boy upwards of eleven years of age, who was traveling upon the street in the vicinity of the track upon which the car was a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent drowning of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

Statement by Summers, J.:

In the village of Kent, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company has a railroad yard in the outskirts of the village. The right of way at that point is uninclosed and is 140 feet in width, the tracks are located in a cut 10 or 12 feet in depth, and the land on both sides is that much higher than the right of way. There are four tracks, and between the center track is a 60-foot turntable. About 800 feet east and the same distance west from the turntable the right of way is crossed by public streets. The turntable was not locked, but was fastened by an iron brake shoe, weighing not less than 10 pounds, that was laid in a slot, and that could be lifted out, and the turntable standing, and saw the car with its open door, and was "thereby enticed and invited to look into said car, and thereupon did undertake to look into said car, exercising therein as much care as could reasonably be expected of a child of his years and capacity," and who, in attempting to look into the car, "carefully" touched the door which fell upon and injured him. McEachern v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 515, 23 N. E. 231. The decision rests upon the ground that the boy was a trespasser, not invited or enticed to the place by the company, which owed him no duty to have the car safe.

The fact that an open box car standing on a levee is an attractive place for a ten-year-old boy who wants to see a boat race on the river imposes no duty upon the company to prevent injury to him, beyond that which rests upon it in the case of an ordinary trespasser. Curley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 98 Mo. 13, 10 S. W. 593.

The turntable doctrine is inapplicable to long trains of cars standing on a railroad track for the purpose of being loaded, since they are not inherently dangerous. Rushen-berg v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 109 Mo. 112, 19 S. W. 216. The court said that the operation of railroad trains would certainly be rendered impracticable if it should be declared to be the law that, before a freight train could be moved or its cars backed up against one another, an inspection must first be made of every car so see if, by any possibility, any trespasser was in a situation to be injured.

A brakeless, unblocked flat car, not of itself an object dangerous to children when left standing on the company's tracks in a highway, does not, by being so light that children can move it, become, under the doctrine of the turntable cases, a dangerous object in being moved along the track, so as to render the company liable for injury to a seven-year-old child who is run over then could be revolved. Just before the 4th of July, in the year 1904, two boys, one aged thirteen and the other ten, while on their way to a car repairer's shanty, located on the railroad's right of way, to get a piece of iron to make "something" for the Fourth of July, met the plaintiff's infant, a boy between five and six years of age, who wished to go with them; and although not invited to do so, he yielded to his childish instincts and followed them down one of the streets to the right of way and along the tracks, past the turntable, to the repair man's shanty. The repair man was not at the shanty; but the boys found what they thought would answer their purpose, and started to return to the village, over the same course they had covered in going to the shanty. When they reached the place where the turntable was, they stopped to play with it. One of the older boys removed the fastening and revolved the turntable, and the little boy, who was sitting upon the turntable with his left leg hanging down over one end, was caught between the end of the table and the head block, and lost his leg. It appears from the testimony of quite a number of boys that they had at different times played with the turntable, and also that they were driven away from the turntable whenever they were seen by any of the employees of the railroad company while so engaged. And it seems to have been generally known by the boys that they were not at liberty to play with the turntable. The only evidence tending to prove knowledge on the part of the railroad company, if it does so tend, that boys were playing with the turntable, is the testimony of the boys that they did play with it; that they had been driven away by employees of the company; and the testimony of the yard clerk, at one time in the employ of the company, that he had on several occasions stopped boys from playing with the turntable, and that on one occasion he had reported the fact to the station agent. In the petition it is averred that the turntable was located in the village, and at a place that was uninclosed and easily accessible to children, and that it was peculiarly attractive to children, and calculated to entice them to play with it; and that, when set in motion, which could easily while at play upon it. Kaumeier v. City Electric R. Co. 116 Mich. 306, 40 L.R.A. 385, 72 Am. St. Rep. 525, 74 N. W. 481.

In Iamurri v. Saginaw City Gas Co. 148 Mich. 27, 111 N. W. 884, Ostrander, J., said of the last-mentioned case, that the court could not have reached the conclusion it did except upon the theory that, under the circumstances of the case, no duty to take care for the playing, trespassing children existed. The rule to be deduced from the decisions seemed to be that if personal property, mischievous only when set in operation, was left at rest in the highway, and became mischievous and did damage because set in motion by a meddler, to whom the owner owed no duty of care, the owner was not liable to such meddler for any resulting injury, although he was an infant, and although the owner knew that infants had, and were again likely to, set the object in motion. It seemed clear that if the wind or some force other than that of the injured meddler had set the car in motion, and if an infant too young to be negligent, or an adult without negligence, had been hurt, the question of defendant's negligence would have been sent to the jury. McAlvay, Ch. J., said that plaintiff was denied the right to recover in the Kaumeier Case, not because she was a trespasser, but because there was no evidence of defendant's negligence.

Leaving an unlocked and unguarded hand car at the side of one of the tracks of a railroad, a mile from a thickly-settled part of a city, a quarter of a mile from the nearest house, and letting it remain there over Sunday, is not negligence which will render the company liable for the death of 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) an eleven-year-old boy who is attracted to the car, and who, with other boys who have put it back on the tracks, gets on the same, and, after putting it in motion, falls off and is killed, since the car is not so dangerous a thing of itself that the company is required to guard or lock it. Robinson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 7 Utah, 493, 13 L.R.A. 765, 27 Pac. 689.

But in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Popp, 96 Ky. 103, 27 S. W. 992, a railroad company was held liable for injury to a five-year-old boy whose leg was caught between a passenger car platform and a bumper at the end of the track at a station while the car was being coupled to another, where the tracks upon which the car was standing when the child went upon the platform were close to the station platform, on uninclosed premises, so that children might go there when tempted by curiosity, or go upon the cars for ice water. It was held that it was the duty of the company in such a case to know of the danger to children, and to be in a position at the proper time to protect them from injury when moving its trains and cars, especially where it was improper to couple cars at the place where the child was injured.

And where tramway cars, known to employees of the railroad company to be attractive to children, are released and sent without brakes on a down grade, and a seven-year-old boy is injured thereby, it was held to be a question for the jury whether the company's servants exercised due care in releasing the cars after the boy, who had purposely gone upon the premises, had been ordered away, without ascertaining how near he was to the track, or wheth-

be done even by children, was a source of latent danger to them, and that it was left unguarded, unfastened, and unlocked, although, at slight expense and trouble, it could have been made fast while not in use; that the railroad company knew that the children were wont to play with the turntable, and that it knew, or ought to have known, of the danger to them. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, and again at the close of all of the evidence, the defendant requested the court to direct a verdict in its favor. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $6,000, which, on error, was affirmed by the circuit court.

In the second case, briefly stated, the facts are: On Sherbondy hill, in the city of Akron, the defendant company maintained a reservoir about 15 feet in depth. The banks on the inside were precipitous, and the water about 8 feet in depth. When constructed, about twenty-five years ago, it was located on a tract of about 10 acres, outside of the corporate limits of the city; but, by the extension of the corporate limits in the year 1900, about one half of it was comprised within the limits of the city.

er the enticing cars would again draw him into danger. Ott v. Johnson, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 491, 86 S. W. 649.

(c) Moving cars and vehicles.

Moving railroad cars are not dangerous machines in the sense that the term is used in the turntable cases. Steele v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 4 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 350.

The doctrine of the turntable cases is inapplicable to the mere act of allowing children to get upon cars fitted up and used for the conveyance of all classes of persons, old and young, experienced and inexperienced. Denison & S. R. Co. v. Carter, 98 Tex. 196, 107 Am. St. Rep. 626, 82 S. W. 782.

In Catlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 57 Ark. 465, 38 Am. St. Rep. 254, 21 S. W. 1062, the court refused to extend the turntable doctrine so as to make a railroad company liable for an injury to a thirteen-year-old boy who slipped under the wheels of a slowly-moving train while stealing a ride. The contention was that the train was unguarded, dangerous machinery.

The attractive nuisance doctrine will not be extended so as to cover a moving car on the track of a railroad company, and to render the company liable for an injury to a ten-year-old boy who, while attempting to get upon the ladder of a freight car, catches his foot under the wheels. Underwood v. Western & A. R. Co. 105 Ga. 50, 31 S. E. 123. The court said that nothing was more alluring to a child than a passing vehicle, whether it were a buggy, carriage, dump cart, wagon, or railway train; and that, if railroads were to be liable because boys attempted to swing upon passing

This 10-acre tract was not converted into a park, but it was covered with trees and bushes, and, excepting the reservoir, was left very much in its natural state. The basin was about 250 feet from the nearest public road. From this public road the company had constructed a rough road or driveway to and around the reservoir for its own use. It also had inclosed the basin with a picket fence about 3 feet high. The evidence tends to prove that people, including children, resorted to these premises for the view from the hill, or for their own pleasure, as is not unusual on unimproved tracts of land so near a city. Late in May, in the year 1903, plaintiff's decedent, Calibel Georgia Bush, a child nine years of age, together with her sister, aged eleven, and another girl, aged about twelve, were permitted by their parents to take their luncheon and go to the woods in the vicinity of these premises to picnic. After arriving at the woods, and having spent several hours there in strolling about, they discovered the reservoir. Two pickets were off of the fence, leaving an opening $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches in width. Through this opening they crawled, and trains without the knowledge of the employees in charge thereof, then the owners of the other vehicles named would be equally liable if a boy, without the knowledge of the person in charge, were injured while attempting to swing upon the rear axle or other part of such vehicle.

In Wilson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 66 Kan. 183, 71 Pac. 282, the court refused to extend the turntable doctrine to the case of a slowly-moving freight train, by which a twelve-year-old boy was injured while catching a ride. The court said that while the doctrine was recognized in Kansas, it had no disposition so to extend it as to include railway trains. They passed and repassed through every community with such frequency, and the peril of jumping upon and from moving trains was so well understood, and the task of keeping boys from stealing rides and hopping upon cars and trains slowly moving through towns or railway yards was so impracticable and burdensome, as to make the rule invoked inapplicable.

A contractor who is grading a street, and who, in the course of the work, uses cars for transporting dirt, is not bound to provide a watchman whose special business it is to prevent children from boarding the moving cars under the temptation to ride. Emerson v. Peteler, 35 Minn. 481, 59 Am. Rep. 337, 29 N. W. 311.

Even if the turntable doctrine were applicable to railroad cars when at a standstill, it could not apply to cars in motion, fully equipped with the requisite number of hands, so as to render the company liable for injury to a boy, received while catching a ride. Barney v. Hannibal & St. J. R.

stood and sat upon the bank for a few minutes, when the youngest fell into the reservoir and was drowned. It appears that a few weeks before this, the gate in the picket fence was down, and a little boy, a son of one of the defendant's employees fell into the reservoir, and that this accident had been brought to the notice of the company, and that, prior to the accident in the present case, the gate had been nailed up. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $1,100, on the ground of the defendant's negligence, and the circuit court reversed for error in overruling the motion of the defendant to direct a verdict at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, and entered a judgment dismissing the petition.

A railway company which has provided a driver for two cars coupled together is not required to furnish a second man to prevent children from getting on the platforms. Bishop v. Union R. Co. 14 R. I. 319, 51 Am. Rep. 386.

A railroad company is not liable to a five-year-old trespasser hurt by a moving car in the company's switch yards, on the theory that the yard and the switching of cars are dangerous and attractive agencies or instruments which allure and attract young children to the yard and about the cars, and that, because of such allurements, children have frequently been attracted to the yard, and that therefore the employees of the company are required to anticipate their presence, and so to manage and operate the cars as not to injure them. Smalley v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. (Utah) 98 Pac. 311.

In O'Connor v. Illinois C. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 339, 10 So. 678, it was held that a railroad company was not liable for injury to a child of tender years, received while riding on a coal-dump car on inclosed premises, the plaintiff having got in through a hole in a fence which the company had attempted to keep in repair, but which had been repeatedly broken by trespassers, who had been warned again and again against the danger and driven away.

In Hebard v. Mabie, 98 Ill. App. 543, it was held that the question whether the steps on the rear end of a bus were attractive to children was not material in an action brought to recover for the death of a five-year-old child who was killed by jumping therefrom after being ordered off by the driver. The court said that it was not the duty of the driver of a bus or other vehicle, moving along a public street or highway, to keep a lookout behind so as to know whether children or adults were riding on the rear end of the bus or other vehicle. On the contrary, the duty of such driver was to look ahead, so as to avoid collisions with other vehicles or persons.

5. Dangerous places.

(a) In general.

In Kayser v. Lindell, 73 Minn. 123, 75 N. W. 1038, it was held that the turntable doctrine would not be extended so as to render the owner of premises liable for injury to a tenant's three-year-old child, received in falling from a retaining wall on the land. The court said that while the owner of premises might owe more duty to a child than to an adult coming upon his premises by implied invitation, yet he was not bound to guard every stairway, cellarway, retaining wall, shed, tree, and open window on his premises, so that a child could not climb to a precipitous place and fall off.

In Chambers v. Milner Coal & R. Co. 143 Ala. 255, 39 So. 170, a nine-year-old child was burned to death by powder stored in a magazine on private property. A charge that "the defendant had the right to store his powder in the magazine, and keep it there, and there was no absolute duty rest-

Messrs. Musser, Kohler, & Mottinger and Grant & Steber for plaintiff in error Swarts.

Messrs. Allen, Waters, & Andress for defendant in error Akron Waterworks Company.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The railroad company is not answerable in damages for the loss of the little boy's leg, unless his injury was caused by the neglect by the railroad company of some duty it owed to the boy; and the waterworks company is not answerable in damages for the death of the little girl, unless she lost her life because the employees of the company neglected to observe some duty that it owed to her. Whether any and what duty rested upon the defendant is a question of law; whether the defendant performed or observed that duty, or neglected to do so, and plaintiff in consequence was injured, is a question of fact. The duty of the owner or occupier of land to persons coming upon it depends somewhat upon whether they are there by his invitation or permission. To invited persons it is his duty to exercise reasonable care for their safety. To licensees it is his duty to give notice of hidden dangers or traps. While trespassers, that is, persons entering without permission, assume the risk of injury from the condition of the premises, and the duty of the occupier to them is only to be careful not to injure them by bringing force to bear upon them. The only exception to his nonliability to persons entering without his permission was where he made a change in the condition of his land, adjacent to a public highway, so as to endanger the safety of travelers who might, without fault on ing on it to keep it locked or guarded from access by children or others, unless the situation and surroundings would reasonably indicate to an ordinarily prudent person in charge of such magazine that it might be tampered with and ignited, so as to cause injury to children or others. The duty of the defendant in this regard depends entirely on the surrounding circumstances which may be in evidence, and of this the jury are the judges,"—was held not to be too favorable to the defendant, where it appeared that the magazine was built of brick and stone, and was located in a woods, not in a populous community, and from 50 to 75 yards from the highway, and within 6 feet of a path seldom traveled, the powder being damaged, and it appearing that when set on fire it did not explode, but burned slowly, the child's clothing catching fire because he was standing in the door.

A bridge company is not liable for the death of a seven-year-old boy who, while walking upon an iron gas pipe, located at some distance above the floor of the carriage way of the bridge, loses his balance and falls through an opening in the structure, since the company is not bound to maintain the bridge in such a manner as to prevent the possibility of an accident to a child. Oil City & P. Bridge Co. v. Jackson, 114 Pa. 321, 6 Atl. 128.

No liability arises for the death of a seven-year-old boy who, while at play in a building in process of erection, gets upon a window sill, and, in attempting to pull himself up, takes hold of a loose stone over the window, which falls and kills him, no inducement or invitation, implied or otherwise, being held out to him. Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 295, 47 Am. St. Rep. 668, 28 S. W. 891. The court said that it was not shown in the case that the defendants knew of the dangerous condition of the stone, or that children were in the habit of resorting to the building for play; nor was there anything about the construction unusual or unique, which would be attractive to children.

No liability arises for injury to a child trespasser stepping through a hole in the floor of a power house on private property at a distance of 20 yards from the highway. Curtis v. Tenino Stone Quarries, 37 Wash. 355, 79 Pac. 955. The court said it was not unmindful of the humane rule of law that forbade a property owner to leave unguarded dangerous machinery and dangerous places which might be of such a character as to attract young children, or to allure them into dangers, but the rule was not of general application, and could not be extended to cases such as the one at bar. There was nothing alluring or attractive about these premises or machinery, nothing to invite children thither, and nothing dangerous about the place and machinery when not in use. To hold, as a general and universal rule of law, that the owners of mills and factories must so construct and maintain their premises as to be reasonably safe for trespassers, infants or adults, regardless of how they might gain admission, would be destructive of all industry and all property rights.

So the law stood until the decision in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, decided in 1874. In that case a little boy, about six years of age, lost his foot while playing with a turntable on the uninclosed lands of the railroad company, in company with two other boys, and a judgment for $7,500 was sustained. This case was tried before Dillon, Circuit Judge, and Dundy, District Judge. The circuit judge charged the jury as follows: "This action rests, and rests alone, upon the alleged negligence of the defendant; and this negligence consists, as alleged, in not keeping the turntable guarded or locked. Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonably prudent man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do; or doing something which a prudent or reasonable man would not do, under all the circumstances surrounding the particular transaction under judicial investigation. If the turntable, in the manner it was constructed and left, was not dangerous in its nature, then of course the defendants would not be guilty of any negligence in not locking or guarding it. But, even if it was dangerous in its nature in some situations, you are further to consider whether, situated as it was on the defendant's property, in a small town, and distant or somewhat remote from habitations, the defendants are guilty of negligence in not anticipating or foreseeing, if left unlocked or unguarded, that injuries to the children of the place would be likely to or would probably ensue. The machine in question is part of the defendant's road, and was lawfully constructed where it was. If the railroad company did not know, and had no good reason to suppose, that children would resort to the turntable to play, or did not know, or had no good reason to suppose, that, if they resorted there, they would be likely to get injured thereby, then you cannot find a verdict against them. But, if the defendant did know, or had good reason to believe, under the circumstances of the case, the children of the place would resort to the turntable to play, and that, if they did, they would or might be injured, then, if they took no

Keeping a yard in which children are accustomed to play accessible to them, and piling a number of railroad ties in such a manner that they fall upon an eight-year-old trespasser playing upon them, will not render the company liable for resulting injury to the child, since the place is not peculiarly alluring, nor the ties obviously dangerous. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Edwards, 90 Tex. 65, 32 L.R.A. 825, 36 S. W. 430, reversing (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 815.

The owner of a lumber yard should not be held to the duty of reasonable care in the piling of the lumber, so as to prevent any danger that can likely come to children who may reasonably be expected to frequent such locality without any conscious purpose of mischief or any unlawful act. Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467.

One who maintains an open lumber yard adjacent to a street is not liable for the death of a trespassing boy, caused by the falling of the lumber upon him while at play, although the place is attractive to children, to the knowledge of the defendant. Kelly v. Benas (Mo.) 116 S. W. 557. The court said that "if the old channel of the law was to be quite changed by the application of the new doctrine automatically and without discrimination, if sentimental considerations (however elevated and tender) are to usurp the place of cold and calm reason as the foundation for rules of law, then the flood gate now damming back liability will be raised, letting in strange and deep waters for the landowner to struggle with. Not only will he be liable for boys drowned while swimming in his stock pond (the idea of swimming being alluring to a boy), for those who fall into uncovered wells, cisterns, and cellars (the notion of playing on the brink of such being a boyish one), for children who are suffocated while playing in piles of sand accumulated for building purposes, or in sliding down stacks of straw unscientifically piled and exposed, but he may be mulcted in damages for injuries to his neighbors' children, who, romping in his haymow, without his invitation, break their bones by sliding down his hay chute, or those who, playing in his rock quarry, are hurt. Shall he fence against adventurous, trespassing boys? Almost as well suggest 'that he build a wall against birds.' If he is held to liability for injury to the children of Jones because of the way he piles his lumber, by the same token, as to Brown, liability would be fastened on him for the way he piles his stones, his bricks, his corn in pens, his hayricks, and his cord wood on his private grounds; in fact, as has been pointedly said, every landowner will be liable for injuries to his neighbor's children under the new doctrine except the neighbor himself. We cannot well write the law that way."

In Siddall v. Jansen, 168 Ill. 43, 39 L.R.A. 112, 48 N. E. 191, reversing 67 Ill. App. 102, where a five-year-old boy was playing around a store in which his father was employed, and where, in the temporary absence of the parent, the child was attracted to an elevator shaft, the door of which was unfastened, and was severely bruised and mangled by the descending cage, the court, in holding that the question whether the child was a trespasser was for the jury, approved the language of the court in Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484, infra: "Although a child of tender years who meets with an injury upon the premises of a private owner means to keep the children away, and no means to prevent accidents, they would be guilty of negligence, and would be answerable for damages caused to children by such negligence." [2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504.]

This charge, in the Supreme Court, was held to be a correct statement of the law. In many of the states the courts have followed the lead of the Supreme Court of the United States, and a multitude of cases has arisen, seeking to make the owners of property liable for injuries to children from accidents happening upon their premises, on the ground that the owner was negligent in not anticipating that children would be likely to be attracted to the place and to be injured. The multitude of circumstances under which the owner of property would be liable for injuries to children, and the very serious burden which was, in consequence, being placed on the owners of property, were very probably not foreseen in the Stout Case. But the cases became so numerous as to occasion very careful examination of the principles laid down in that case. In many jurisdictions the correctness of the conclusion there reached is denied, and in some of the states where that decision was followed the courts have repudiated the doctrine, in others they have limited it, and in still others they have declined to follow the doctrine in any case excepting a turntable case. To even enumerate the cases in which the so-called turntable doctrine has been applied or denied would require so much space as to preclude its attempt.

The following are turntable cases in which the doctrine is applied: United States: Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra. Minnesota: Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393; O'Malley v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 43 Minn. 289, 45 N. W. 440. Nebraska: Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Bailey, 11 Neb. 332, 9 N. W. 50. Missouri: Koons v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 65 Mo. 592; Nagel v. Missouri P. R. Co. 75 Mo. 653, 42 Am. Rep. 418. Kansas: Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686, 31 Am. Rep. 203; Union P. R. Co. v. Dunden, 37 Kan. 1, 14 Pac. 501. Iowa: Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 410, 57 L.R.A. 561, 90 N. W. 95. California: Barrett v. Southern P. Co. 91 Cal. 296, 25 may be a technical trespasser, yet the owner may be liable if the things causing the injury have been left exposed and unguarded, and are of such a character as to be an attraction to the child, appealing to his childish curiosity and instincts."

And in Mullaney v. Spence, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 319, it was held that the fact that a four-year-old child who approached the open door of an elevator, close to the sidewalk of a street, and was crushed by the descending car, was technically a trespasser, would not stand in the way of recovery for the injury.

(b) Ponds, reservoirs, waterways, etc.,

In Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484, affirming 53 Ill. App. 189, a pond or pit was located in a populous city on a plot of ground bounded on two sides by public streets and on the third side by a public alley with an opening of some 40 feet in a fence at the street on one side, and an opening of equal dimensions in a fence at the alley, with a causeway running from one opening to the other diagonally across the premises, inviting approach, and actually being used for the passage of men and teams. Logs and timbers floated about in the pond, and boys had for some time been in the habit of playing upon them in the water. The city authorities had been notified of its attractiveness to children and of its dangerous character, but had suffered the pond to remain undrained and the fence around it to be broken down in some places, and to be actually removed in others. In an action brought to recover for the death of a boy who was drowned in this pond, the doctrine of the turntable cases was held applicable, the court saying that the love of motion which attracted a child to play upon a revolving turntable would also attract him to experiment with a floating plank or log which he found within his easy reach in a pond.

A water company is liable for the drowning of an eleven-year-old boy in a reservoir to which children are attracted for fishing and other sports, although the place is fenced so as to render access difficult, where the company, through its agent, has knowledge that the barrier is ineffective, and permits children to trespass on the ground unrebuked. Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, 50 Pac. 450. The court said that, knowing that the fence was insufficient as a barrier or a warning of danger, it was the duty of the company to have expelled the intruders, or to have adopted other measures to avoid the accident.

In Kansas City v. Siese, 71 Kan. 283, 80 Pac. 626, a city was held liable on the authority of the last-mentioned case for the drowning of a twelve-year-old boy in a pond in which he was bathing, although it was urged that the boy was of sufficient maturity to know the danger into which he ventured, and that he had been advised of that danger, and warned to shun it. Cunningham, J., dissenting, said that if, in the future, the principles announced in the Price Case, supra, were followed, the owner of an apple tree from which a venturesome boy might fall and sustain injury in his effort to reach a big red apple attractively displayed on its branches would be adjudged guilty of maintaining an attractive nui-

Am. St. Rep. 186, 27 Pac. 666. Washington: Ilwaco R. & Nav. Co. v. Hedrick, 1 Wash. 446, 22 Am. St. Rep. 169, 25 Pac. 335. Tennessee: Bates v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 90 Tenn. 36, 25 Am. St. Rep. 665, 15 S. W. 1069. But a railway company is not required to fasten the turntable any more securely than necessary to keep it securely in place. Illinois: St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Bell, 81 Ill. 76, 25 Am. Rep. 269. Reversed judgment on the sole ground that the company was not negligent, in view of the isolated position of the turntable. South Carolina: Bridger v. Asheville & S. R. Co. 25 S. C. 24. Georgia: Ferguson v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 75 Ga. 637. Texas: Evansich v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 57 Tex. 126, 44 Am. Rep. 586; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McWhirter, 77 Tex. 356, 19 Am. St. Rep. 755, 14 S. W. 26; Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Measles, 81 Tex. 474, 17 S. W. 124. To these should be added Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. St. Rep. 619. This was not a turntable case, but a case in which a boy was injured in a slack pit of the railroad company. However, the doctrine of the turntable cases was re-examined and approved.

In the following cases, in which the insance, and answerable therefor in damages; or one who, for the purpose of affording water for his stock or to run his mill, should maintain a pond, would be guilty to the same extent. To claim cases like the one at bar were governed by principles of the turntable cases was, to his mind, against reason and the weight of authority.

The owner of an unprotected reservoir in an open field near residences and public highways where children resort to play is liable for the death of a boy less than ten years of age, who, while at play, falls into the water and is drowned. Franks v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. 78 S. C. 10, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 468, 58 S. E. 960.

The owner of premises is liable under the attractive nuisance doctrine for the drowning of a two-year-old child who, while its mother is visiting a tenant on the premises, is permitted to play in the yard, and, while so engaged, lifts the cover of an unguarded cistern to satisfy its childish curiosity, and falls into the water. Donk Bros. Coal & Coke Co. v. Leavitt, 109 Ill. App. 385.

In Tucker v. Draper, 62 Neb. 66, 54 L.R.A. 321, 86 N. W. 917, the court said: "If I know that there is an open well upon my premises, and know that children of such tender years as to have no notion of their danger are continually playing around it, and I can obviate the danger with very little trouble to myself, and without injuring the premises or interfering with my own free use thereof, I owe an active duty to those children, and if I neglect that duty, and they fall into the well and are killed, 19 L.R.A. juries were received at a turntable, the doctrine of the turntable cases is denied: New Hampshire: Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396, 9 Atl. 790. Massachusetts: Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283. New York: Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1068. Virginia: Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 862.

In the following cases, where the injuries were not sustained at a turntable, the doctrine of the turntable cases is denied: New Jersey: Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 497. Michigan: Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463; 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644. Rhode Island: Paolino v. McKendall, 24 R. I. 432, 60 L.R.A. 133, 96 Am. St. Rep. 736, 53 Atl. 268. West Virginia: Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 43 L.R.A. 148, it is through my negligence; I cannot urge their negligence as a defense, even though I have never invited or encouraged them expressly or impliedly to go upon the premises." This duty rests upon the ground that the danger to be anticipated from an open well outweighs the slight expense and inconvenience that would be caused in making it safe.

The language in the last-mentioned case was said, in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Krayenbuhl, 65 Neb. 889, 59 L.R.A. 920, 91 N. W. 880, to amount to a reaffirmance of the turntable cases, and to suggest the true principal upon which cases of this character rest, that is, that where the owner of dangerous premises knows, or has good reason to believe, that children so young as to be ignorant of the danger will resort to such premises, he is bound to take such precautions to keep them off, or to protect them from injuries likely to result from the dangerous condition of the premises while there, as a man of ordinary care and prudence, under like circumstances, would take. At first sight it would seem that the principle thus stated is too broad, and that its application would impose unreasonable burdens on owners, and intolerable restrictions on the use and enjoyment of property. It must be kept in mind that it requires nothing of the owner that a man of ordinary care and prudence would not do, of his own volition, under like circumstances. Such a man would not willingly take up unreasonable burdens, nor vex himself with intolerable restrictions.

In the following cases, in which children were injured, but not while playing with a turntable, liability is denied in courts that have adopted the turntable doctrine in cases where the injuries were received at a turntable: Minnesota: Emerson v. Peteler, 35 Minn. 481, 59 Am. Rep. 337, 29 N. W. 311; Twist v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 39 Minn. 164, 12 Am. St. Rep. 626, 39 N. W. 402; Haesley v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 233, 24 Am. The principles involved have been carefully considered in so many cases that it would be fruitless as well as presumptuous to undertake to add anything to the discussion.

In the recent case, Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. supra, where the court denied liability for injuries to a little girl between four and five years of age, who had been injured while playing upon some iron girders that

In the majority of cases, however, the attempt to extend the attractive nuisance doctrine to dangers of the class discussed under this subdivision of the note has been unsuccessful.

A pond is not to be treated as an attractive danger within the meaning of the turntable cases. Smith v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. 82 Mo. App. 9.

In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 349, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 113, 598, the court refused to follow the doctrine of the turntable cases so as to hold a lot owner liable for the drowning of a boy in a pond formed upon the land by surface waters, due to the exercise by the city in which the property was located of a power and authority which the owner could not legally resist. The court said that a body of water either standing, as in ponds and lakes, or running, as in rivers and creeks, or ebbing and flowing, as on the shores of seas and bays, is a natural object, incident to all countries which are not deserts. Such a body of water may be found in or close to nearly every city or town in the land; the danger of drowning in it is an apparent, open danger, the knowledge of which is common to all; and there is no just view consistent with the recognized rights of property owners which would compel one owning land upon which such water or part of it stood or flowed to fill it up or surround it by an impenetrable wall.

The owner of a lot upon which a pond formed by surface waters is located is not liable, on the theory that it is an attractive 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nuisance, for the drowning of a ten-year-old boy who falls into the water from a plank upon which he is attempting to float, where the water was caused to stand on the lot by an act of the city in stopping up a drain, and the owner did nothing to render the pond attractive, and did not even know of its existence. Cooper v. Overton, 102 Tenn. 222, 45 L.R.A. 591, 73 Am. St. Rep. 871, 52 S. W. 183.

The owner of an artificial pond is not liable for the drowning of a ten-year-old boy in it while at play, although it is an attractive place to children. Sullivan v. Huidekoper, 27 App. D. C. 154, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 196. The court refused to extend the turntable doctrine to such a case, saying that one might as well dam the Nile with bulrushes as to keep boys brought up with the freedom allowed American boys away from ponds, pools, and other bodies of water.

A pond is not so constructed with reference to its depth, location, and attractive character as to impose upon the owner the duty of so guarding it that children of tender years may not be attracted and allured to it, to their harm, where it is situate more than an eighth of a mile outside the limits of a city, remote from any street or highway on which a child has a right to travel, and its allurements and attractions, whatever they may be, are present only to those who deliberately and designedly seek them out, and where a child, to reach the pond, must go a mile and a half from its home, and walk more than a third of a mile over a network of railway fell upon her while playing upon them in the street, where they had been placed by an abutting property owner, for use in the construction of a building, the English cases that are cited as supporting the decision in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra, are reviewed. And in Ryan v. Towar, supra, many of the cases, both English and American, are examined, and the doctrine of the turntable cases is expressly disapproved. In that case the defendant owned a small pump house, located upon ground owned by a railroad company. In the house was a small, overshot water wheel. The plaintiff, a girl about twelve or thirteen years of age, was in the habit of passing this pump house on the way to school with her brothers and sisters; going across lots through the field, because it was nearer. For some time previous to the time of the accident a hole existed in the stone wall of the house inclosing the wheel, through which children went to play on the wheel. On the day in question, the brothers of plaintiff, on the way from school, crawled through this hole, and, mounting the wheel, were able by their weight to turn the wheel part way round and back. A younger sister, aged eight years, got caught between the wheel and the wheel pit. The plaintiff heard her screams, and went through the hole to her succor, and aided in rescuing her, and was herself injured. In the opinion, Hooker, J., after reviewing a number of turntable cases, says: "Here we have the doctrine of the turntable cases carried to its natural and logical result. We have only to add that every man who leaves a wheelbarrow, or a lawn mower, or a spade upon his lawn; a rake, with its sharp teeth pointing upward, upon the ground or leaning against a fence; a bed of mortar prepared for use in his new house; a wagon in his barnyard, upon which children may climb, and from which they may fall; or who turns in his lot a kicking horse, or a cow with calf,—does so at the risk of having the question of his negligence left to a sympathetic jury. How far does the rule go? Must his barn door, and the usual apertures through which the accumulations of the stables are thrown, be kept locked and fastened, lest twelve-year-old boys get in and be hurt by the animals, or by climbing into the haymow and falling from beams? May a man keep a ladder, or a grindstone, or a scythe, or a plough, or a reaper, without danger of being called upon to reward trespassing children, whose parents owe and may be presumed to perform the duty of restraint? Does the new rule go tracks. Hanna v. Iowa C. R. Co. 129 Ill. App. 134. The court said that a boy who deliberately braved such dangers for the sake of a swim in the pond would hardly be deterred from that pleasure by any ordinary fence or gate. In this case the pond was reasonably protected from intrusion by fences and by a high embankment on one side. It was provided with a heavy gate, but it appeared that the gate was not kept shut except when cattle were within the inclosure.

A city is not liable for the death of a seven-year-old boy who, in pursuit of a bird, wades beyond his depth, and is drowned in water which fills an excavated gravel pit, the pond thus formed being used for fishing and bathing purposes, since it is not the duty of the city to provide against such a contingency. Schauf v. Paducah, 106 Ky. 228, 90 Am. St. Rep. 220, 50 S. W. 42.

The owner of land on which there is an unfenced excavation filled with water, in a populous part of a city, is not liable for the drowning therein of a four-year-old trespassing child, since a landowner is not bound to fence or otherwise guard an open excavation or pond, natural or artificial, on his land, so as to prevent injury to children coming thereon without right or invitation, express or implied, although they are induced to do so by the alluring attractiveness of the place. Stendal v. Boyd, 73 Minn. 53, 42 L.R.A. 288, 72 Am. St. Rep. 597, 75 N. W. 735.

The owner of property is not required to fence an excavation filled with water so as 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to prevent an eight-year-old boy from falling into it and being drowned. Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 422, 3 Am. St. Rep. 557, 6 S. W. 74.

Having an unfenced and unguarded pond on land within a city, the pond being dangerous and attractive to children, who are accustomed to bathe in it, to the knowledge of the owner, will not render him liable for the drowning of a nine-year-old boy who goes there to bathe. Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 651, 33 L.R.A. 755, 56 Am. St. Rep. 548, 36 S. W. 659.

No liability arises against the owner of land upon which a pond covered with ice is located, by reason of the fact that children skating upon it break through and are drowned, where there is nothing to show that they were there by permission or invitation. Arnold v. St. Louis, 152 Mo. 173, 48 L.R.A. 291, 75 Am. St. Rep. 447, 53 S. W. 900.

In Richards v. Connell, supra, it appeared that the defendants, who were lot owners, negligently permitted surface water to accumulate on the land until it formed a dangerous pond; that they neglected to fence the lots, or to erect barriers of any kind to prevent children lawfully in the vicinity from falling into the pond; that the lots were situated in the vicinity of one of the public schools of the city; that the pond was in a public and much frequented place, and attractive to children of tender age, many of whom were accustomed to play about on the pond; and that a ten-year-old boy, yielding to his natural impulses, used a section of a still further, and make it necessary for a man to fence his gravel pit or quarry? And, if so, will an ordinary fence do, in view of the known propensity and ability of boys to climb fences? Can a man nowadays safely own a small lake or fish pond? And must he guard ravines and precipices upon his land? Such is the evolution of the law, less than thirty years after the decision of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, when, with due deference, we think some of the courts left the solid ground of the rule that trespassers cannot recover for injuries received, and due merely to negligence of the persons trespassed upon." Of the case of Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 51 Am. Rep. 154, 19 N. W. 257, in which the opinion is by Judge Cooley, and which is quoted from at some length in Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619, as approving the turntable doctrine, he says: "Clearly this does not adopt the rule of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout." And in conclusion he says: "That a landowner is under no obligation to use care to protect a trespasser is a broad, and, until recently, undisputed rule, without exception; liability for injuries sustained by such being limited to cases of intentional or wanton injuries. The rule, with this limitation, is sustained to-day by the great weight of authority. It is contended by some law writers, and has been held in some cases, that an exception exists in favor of children of tender years. The varying reasons given should lead us to doubt the solidity of the foundations upon which these cases rest, especially when none of the reasons are of recognized authority. The law has never before denied the liability of children for trespass because of tender years. On the contrary, it was intimated in Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239, that a four-year-old boy was a trespasser, under the circumstances of that case; and there are numerous cases cited in this opinion where liability is denied upon that and no other ground. The assertion that the weight of authority supports the plaintiff's contention in this case seems to us incorrect. It may be true that, in cases involving turntables, a majority of the cases, which are necessarily few, have followed the case of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra; but there should be a legal principle underlying the rule laid down in that case, and that principle has been assiduously sought for by some of the courts, without success, as we have seen. Others have asserted different reasons for following it. One gives us to understand that a child is wooden sidewalk floating thereon as a raft, and fell into the pond, and was drowned. It was held that the owner was not required to fence the vacant lot, or otherwise secure the safety of strangers, old or young, who might go upon the premises, not by invitation, express or implied, but for the purpose of amusement, or from motives of curiosity.

A city is not liable for the death of a seven-year-old boy who is drowned within its limits in a pond on private property, not on or in dangerous proximity to a public highway, although the city permits the water to accumulate and remain there, and the boy is drawn to the pond by its attractiveness to children. Omaha v. Bowman, 52 Neb. 293, 40 L.R.A. 531, 66 Am. St. Rep. 506, 72 N. W. 316.

But, upon an amended petition, it being made to appear that the water of the pond extended to and over the sidewalk of a portion of the street, and that the deceased entered the pond from the street, it was held that a case was made against the city, on the authority of Omaha v. Richards, 49 Neb. 244, 68 N. W. 528, rehearing in 50 Neb. 804, 70 N. W. 363, in which the city was held liable under similar circumstances, on the ground that it was the duty of a municipal corporation to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for the use of the public. Bowman v. Omaha, 59 Neb. 84, 80 N. W. 259.

The owner of a vacant, unfenced city lot upon which children are in the habit of playing is not liable for the death of a six-year-old child who, while sailing a toy boat in a cesspool on the premises, not adjoining a highway, falls into the water and is drowned. Greene v. Linton, 7 Misc. 272, 27 N. Y. Supp. 891.

It is not the duty of the owner of a lot in a thickly-settled part of a city to fence or guard a dangerous hole or excavation, which he does not appear to have made or to have caused to be made on the premises, and which fills with water, even to prevent children from having access thereto; and he is therefore not liable for the death of a nine-year-old boy who, while playing about the pond, falls in and is drowned. Klix v. Nieman, 68 Wis. 276, 60 Am. Rep. 854, 32 N. W. 223.

In Peninsular Trust Co. v. Grand Rapids, 131 Mich. 571, 92 N. W. 38, it was held that a city was not liable under the attractive nuisance doctrine for the death of a child who crawled through a hole in a fence about a reservoir, and who, in attempting to wade in the water, was drowned.

The duty of a city to use reasonable care to guard an attractive reservoir near a public park, so as to prevent the drowning of an eleven-year-old boy, is discharged when it surrounds the place with a woven-wire fence 4 feet and a half high, that children cannot climb over without taking off their shoes, and when it provides watchmen who, before the accident, warn the boy to keep outside of the fence. Carey v. Kansas City, 187 Mo. 715, 70 L.R.A. 69, 36 S. W. 438.

licensed to go wherever he can find that which attracts him. A Texas court has held that children of tender years cannot be trespassers; while other authorities are content to rest their approbation of and adherence to the alleged rule upon the inhumanity of the doctrine that a landowner must not be held responsible for injuries suffered by trespassing children, when, by ordinary thoughtfulness and care, he could have anticipated and prevented it; and the generic term 'attractive nuisances' is applied to the great variety of things which may naturally be expected to allure young children upon private premises. The term 'attractive nuisance,' as applied, is a new one in the books, and the plausible application of the well-known principle that one must so occupy his own as not to do harm to the rights of others should not be construed to so restrict the use of private lands as to make it necessary to guard and protect trespassers. A man's home has always been considered his castle,—a domain where, secure from intrusion, he might lawfully do as he would, so long as he did not interfere with the legal rights of others. It has been his duty to guard those licensed to enter, but beyond that he has not been required to go. In our anxiety to prevent personal injuries, we should not go so far as to over turn private rights."

In Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144. 45 Am. Rep. 365. Paxson, J., says that the principle upon which it is sought to fasten liability on property owners would, if carried to its logical conclusion, "charge the duty of the protection of children upon every member of the community except their parents." In a very able article on the liability of landowners to children entering without permission, by Judge Jeremiah Smith, in 11 Harvard Law Review, 349-372. he says: "If those who brought the child into the world are unable, by reason of poverty, to provide him a playground, this may afford an argument for the passage of a statute imposing that duty upon the municipality; in which case each landowner would have to contribute his proportion of the expense. But this is quite another thing from assessing upon a single unfortunate landowner the entire damage arising from the want of such a playground."

In some of the cases it is said that Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, has been overruled or at least disapproved; but in Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, supra, Mr. Justice Harlan doubts the correctness of this statement, and refers to an English case in which it

That a place where a city had formerly maintained a reservoir was, at the time a child fell into the water and was drowned, an unguarded excavation, pit and trap near a public street, and close to the residences of a large number of persons, including that of the plaintiff, and that the water therein and the work of filling in the excavation, which had been going on for some time, was calculated to, and did, allure to it young children, and that the city had knowledge of these facts, was held, in Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577, not to establish the city's liability for the death of the child, the court saying that the work of filling it was not carried on for the purpose of attracting boys there, and giving them sport and pleasure, but for the improvement and beneficial use of the city's land. The fact that children went to the reservoir pit from curiosity or for pleasure, without objection by the defendants, was held not to be an invitation or a license to go there. The child, said the court, was not upon the land by invitation, nor under circumstances which made it the duty of the city to protect him; but was there to gratify his curiosity or for mere pleasure. The city owed him no special duty. It was not a case of setting a trap for children, nor one of wantonly or knowingly leading them into danger, and this one to destruction. It was the ordinary case of a landowner managing, within the boundaries of his own land, his own property, in his own way, for his own use and benefit; and though, in so doing this, he might find occasion to dig excavations, construct reservoirs, provide fish ponds, plant and cultivate fruit trees, erect and maintain useful structures, instruments, and machinery, all of which were alluring and attractive and dangerous to children, yet it could not be claimed that he must constantly guard these things against the approach of persons coming without license or invitation, and attracted by mere curiosity or pleasure, or suffer in damages for any injury they might receive.

A city is not liable for the drowning of a trespassing child in a reservoir, since a landowner is under no duty to a mere trespasser to keep his premises safe; and the fact that the trespasser is a child raises no duty where none otherwise exists. Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 267. 43 L.R.A. 148. 31 S. E. 993.

In Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, it was held that the owner was not liable for the drowning of a trespassing child who fell into an unguarded cistern on property not immediately adjoining a highway. The court said that there is some danger, in dealing with such questions, of confounding legal obligations with those sentiments which are independent of law, and rest merely on grounds of feelings or moral considerations. We feel usually more indignation at wrongs done to children than at wrongs done to others. But the law has not usually given them civil remedies on any such basis. Nor does it usually if ever, impose any duties on strangers towards them resting entirely on the fact that they are children. Those who have any special dealings with them, as has been approved, and we may add that since then it has been followed in Harrold v. Watney [1898] 2 Q. B. 320. and in McDowall v. Great Western R. Co. [1902] 1 K. B. 618. However, we do not consider the case of Lynch v. Nurdin as authority for the decision in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout. In Lynch v. Nurdin the defendant left his horse and cart unattended in a public street. The plaintiff, a child seven years of age, got upon the cart in play, and another child led the horse on, and the plaintiff was thereby thrown down and hurt. The plaintiff recovered. It is to be observed that the horse and cart were left in the street. It was the duty of defendant to use care. The child was rightfully in the street, and the fact that he meddled with the cart was not contributory negligence in one of his age, and it is not properly a case of trespass. In the turntable cases there is neither invitation nor permission, and to ground them on cases like Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277, where dogs were lured to their death by tainted meat, or like Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628, where a spring gun was set to shoot trespassers, is to lose sight of the difference between negligence and intentional wrongdoing. The distinction is pointed out in Ponting v. Noakes [1894] 2 Q. B. 281.

parents, teachers, and employers, incur obligations appropriate to their relations, and differing from those incurred towards others in proportion to the necessity of care and protection to the risk of injury. But those who have no such relation with them are not liable for negligence in carrying on their own business beyond what would be their liability to others as well as children who are equally free from blame. But the court also said that it would express no opinion concerning cases where the nature of the business is such as to present peculiar attractions to children beyond other kinds of occupation. This case was decided in the same year that the turntable doctrine was announced.

In Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, it was held that the owner of an abandoned brickyard was not liable for the death of a boy nearly eight years of age, who was fishing in an old, open well on the premises, and who fell into the water, and was drowned. The court said that to compel the owners of such property either to inclose it or to fill up their ponds and level the surface so that trespassers might not be injured would be oppressive. The law does not require any such principle to be enforced, even where the trespassers are children. The court added: "It is part of a boy's nature to trespass, especially where there is tempting fruit; yet I never heard that it was the duty of the owner of a fruit tree to cut it down because a boy trespasser may possibly fall from its branches. Yet the principle contended for by the plaintiff would bring us to where the defendant was held not liable for the death of plaintiff's horse, due to the latter's eating from a yew tree that was wholly on defendant's land.

In Buch v. Amory Mfg. Co. 69 N. H. 257, 76 Am. St. Rep. 163, 44 Atl. 809, where a boy, eight years of age, unable to speak or understand English, was injured by machinery, in a very able opinion Carpenter, Ch. J., says: "Actionable negligence is the neglect of a legal duty. The defendants are not liable unless they owe to the plaintiff a legal duty which they neglected to perform. With purely moral obligations the law does not deal. For example, the priest and Levite who passed by on the other side were not, it is supposed, liable at law for the continued suffering of the man who fell among thieves, which they might and morally ought to have prevented or relieved. Suppose A., standing close by a railroad, sees a two-year-old babe on the track, and a car approaching. He can easily rescue the child with entire safety to himself, and the instincts of humanity require him to do so. If he does not, he may, perhaps, justly be styled a ruthless savage and a moral monster; but he is not liable in damages for the child's injury, or indictable under the statute for its death. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap.

this absurdity if carried to its logical conclusion. Moreover, it would charge the duty of the protection of children upon every member of the community except their parents."

The owner of land containing an open cistern is not required to guard or fence it so as to prevent the drowning of a seven-year-old trespasser therein, although the premises are used, to the knowledge of the owner, as a playground and common. Breckenridge v. Bennett, 7 Kulp, 95.

In Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 63, 38 L.R.A. 573, 66 Am. St. Rep. 859, 41 S. W. 63, affirming (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 861, in holding a railroad company not liable for the death of a child less than three years old, who was drowned in a pit of water near a path designed for the use of persons going to and from a railroad station platform on business, it was said that the common law imposes no duty upon the owner to use care to keep his property in such condition that trespassers may not be injured, even if they are children of tender years.

No liability arises for the drowning of a five-year-old child in a permanent canal or mill trench in the neighborhood of inhabited dwellings, on the theory that the place was attractive to children, to the knowledge of the owner of the property, who failed to fence or guard it, where there is nothing to show that it is usual to guard banks of either natural or artificial streams under the circumstances, or that the defendant undertook to maintain a guard, and failed to keep it in proper order. McCabe v.

278, § 8. 'In dealing with cases which involve injuries to children, courts . . . have sometimes strangely confounded legal obligation with sentiments that are independent of law.' Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, 9 N. E. 155. 'It is important to bear in mind, in actions for injuries to children, a very simple and fundamental fact, which, in this class of cases, is sometimes strangely lost sight of, viz., that no action arises without a breach of duty.' 2 Thomp. Neg. 1183, note 3. 'No action will lie against a spiteful man who, seeing another running into danger, merely omits to warn him. To bring the case within the category of actionable negligence, some wrongful act must be shown, or a breach of some positive duty; otherwise, a man who allows strangers to roam over his property would be held answerable for not protecting them against any danger they might encounter whilst using the license.' Gautret v. Egerton, L. R. 2 C. P. 371, 375. 'What duties do the owners owe to a trespasser upon their premises? They may eject him, using such force, and such only, as is necessary for the purpose. They are bound to abstain from any other or further intentional or negligent acts of personal violence,—bound to inflict upon him by means of their own active intervention no injury which, by due care, they can avoid. They are not bound to warn him against hidden or secret dangers arising from the condition of the premises (Redigan v. Boston & M. R. Co. 155 Mass. 44, 47, 48, 14 L.R.A. 276, 31 Am. St. Rep 520, 28 N. E. 1133), or to protect him against any injury that may arise from his own acts or those of other persons. In short, if they do nothing, let him entirely alone, in no manner interfere with him, he can have no cause of action against them for any injury that he may receive. On the contrary, he is liable to them for any damage that he, by his unlawful meddling, may cause them or their property. What greater or other legal obligation was cast on these defendants by the circumstance that the plaintiff was (as is assumed) an irresponsible infant? If landowners are not bound to warn an adult trespasser of hidden dangers,—dangers which he, by ordinary care, cannot discover, and therefore cannot avoid,—on what ground can it be claimed that they must warn an infant of open and visible dangers which he is unable to appreciate? No legal distinction is perceived between the duties of the owners in one case and the other. The situation of the adult in front of secret dangers which, by no de-

American Woolen Co. 124 Fed. 283, affirmed in 65 C. C. A. 59, 132 Fed. 1006. The court thought that the canal was an object of such a character that, both from the reason of the thing and the customs of the community, the defendant was entitled to assume that the plaintiff's natural guardians would protect him from any dangers connected with it, as they easily could and ought to have done.

The owner of a vacant lot upon which there is an unfenced stream of water is not liable for the drowning of a trespassing six-year-old girl who, in attempting to cross the stream on a log, falls into the water. Marnock v. Simpson, 10 Del. Co. Rep. 119.

One who places boards across a canal for the use of his workmen is not liable for the death of a four-and-one-half-year-old child who wanders from her home with a companion of her own age, and, in attempting to cross the canal on this temporary bridge, falls in and is drowned, there being nothing dangerous in the bridge itself, and nothing to suggest the possibility of such an accident. Blum v. Weatherford & C. Bros. 121 La. 298, 46 So. 317.

In Indianapolis Water Co. v. Harold (Ind.) 83 N. E. 993, it was held that a water company was not liable for the drowning of a nine-year-old boy who, while attempting to cross a canal by means of a log used as a footbridge, fell into the water, where it appeared that he was not lured to the place from the highway, and where there was no proof that the log was attractive to children, and where the log was shown to have been in legitimate use as a movable bridge, and to have been a proper appliance for keeping the canal in repair.

The turntable doctrine will not be extended and applied to an open, unprotected flume, built upon high trestles, on private premises, so as to render the owner thereof liable for the death of a three-year-old child attracted thereto by a running stream of water which it carries, who falls into the open flume, and is carried through it, and hurled by the force of the water upon rocks below. Salladay v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. (Ariz.) 100 Pac. 441.

(c) Railroad tracks and structures.

In Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 53 Conn. 472, 4 Atl. 106, it was held that the tender age of children trespassing on a railroad track would not raise a duty toward them when none otherwise existed.

Where a four-year-old boy was run over by railroad cars while using the track as a playground, having reached the place of the accident by a footpath in which he had no rights, it was held that the company was not liable although it had been notified that the place was dangerous for children, and had been requested to put a fence across the track. It was held that there was no inducement or implied invitation held out to the child. Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 377, 30 Am. Rep. 686.

No duty rests upon a railroad company to fence its right of way, even against the intrusion of an infant trespasser. Casista gree of care, he can discover, and that of the infant, incapable of comprehending danger, is, in a legal aspect, exactly the same. There is no apparent reason for holding that any greater or other duty rests upon the owners in one case than in the other. There is a wide difference,—a broad gulf,—both in reason and in law, between causing and preventing an injury; between doing, by negligence or otherwise, a wrong to one's neighbor, and preventing him from injuring himself; between protecting him against injury by another, and guarding him from injury that may accrue to him from the condition of the premises which he has unlawfully invaded. The duty to do no wrong is a legal duty. The duty to protect against wrong is, generally speaking, and excepting certain intimate relations in the nature of a trust, a moral obligation only, not recognized or enforced by law. Is a spectator liable if he sees an intelligent man or an unintelligent infant running into danger, and does not warn or forcibly restrain him? What difference does it make whether the danger is on another's land, or upon his own, in case the man or infant is not there by his express or implied invitation? If A. sees an eight-year-old boy beginning to climb into his garden over a wall stuck with spikes, and does not warn him or drive him off, is he liable in damages if the boy meets with injury from the spikes? Degg v. Midland R. Co. 1 Hurlst. & N. 773, 777. I see my neighbor's two-year-old babe in dangerous proximity to the machinery of his windmill in his yard, and easily might, but do not, rescue him. I am not liable in damages to the child for his injuries, nor, if the child is killed, punishable for manslaughter by the common law or under the statute (Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 278, § 8), because the child and I are strangers, and I am under no legal duty to protect him. Now, suppose I see the same child trespassing in my own yard, and meddling in like manner with the dangerous machinery of my own windmill. What additional obligation is cast upon me by reason of the child's trespass? The mere fact that the child is unable to take care of himself does not impose on me the legal duty of protecting him in the one case more than in the other. Upon what principle of law can an infant, by coming unlawfully upon my premises, impose upon me the legal duty of a guardian? None has been suggested, and we know of none."

The real reason for implying invitation, or declaring a turntable to be a lure, is to escape the imputation of making the law,

v. Boston & M. R. Co. 69 N. H. 649, 45 Atl. 712.

The doctrine of the turntable cases does not apply to a child trespasser on a railroad track, not allured or attracted to the right of way by unprotected machinery or other dangerous instrumentalities. Ellington v. Great Northern R. Co. 96 Minn. 176, 104 N. W. 827.

A railroad company is not required to fence its right of way so as to prevent a four-year-old child which crosses the track from getting upon the premises of a stranger, where it is hurt by falling into a trench. Morrissey v. Providence & W. R. Co. 15 R. I. 271, 3 Atl. 10.

No obligation rests upon a railroad company to guard a depot with active vigilance so as to prevent a child less than three years of age from going alone on the platform, without the knowledge of the company's servants, and so as to protect it from injury by moving a train against which it leans, the child having strayed from its home and gone upon the platform without invitation, out of childish curiosity, and for the purpose of amusement. Ling v. Great Northern R. Co. 165 Fed. 813.

A railroad company is not liable for injury to a boy between five and six years of age, who takes a position close to the edge of a station platform, and is struck by a slight projection from the side of a passing freight car, and knocked under the wheels, since the company owes him no duty to protect him from an accident from such a cause. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Schwindling, 101 Pa. 258, 47 Am. Rep. 706. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where an eight-year-old boy went under an elevated railroad structure in process of erection, and was hurt by a piece of iron falling upon him, and it appeared that he was not attracted to the place of danger by the structure, or by any work that was being carried on and that he was not invited there expressly or by implication, it was held that the company could not be held liable under the doctrine of the turntable cases. Northwestern Elev. R. Co. v. O'Malley, 107 Ill. App. 599.

A railroad company is not liable for injury to a ten-year-old boy who climbs upon an elevated railway structure in search of a ball, and who, while there, stumbles against a live wire, where there is no evidence tending to show that boys of tender years, or others, have been in the habit of climbing upon such a structure, and it appears that the wire is not exposed, unguarded, or easy of access from the street, and that there is nothing on the surface of the roadbed or top of the structure attractive or alluring to childish instincts, and where it appears that the company had no reason to anticipate that children or others would endeavor to resort to it at that place. McAllister v. Jung, 112 Ill. App. 138. The court said that the difference between the case at bar and the turntable cases, where the place of danger was open, easy of access, frequented by children, and in itself attractive, was so wide that it could discover no ground of comparison and no basis for the application of the doctrine of those cases.

The fact that a railroad bridge abutment is constructed with stone steps, which to the rather than declaring it. Railroad companies do lock their switches, because, unlocked, they endanger the property of the company and the lives of its passengers; but, assuming that there is no reason why a switch should be kept locked for safety when not in use, and a turntable should be left unlocked when not in use, endangering the lives of little children, excepting that in the one case there is a pecuniary liability and in the other not, that does not vest the courts with the legislative function to impose the duty upon railroad companies. It is much better that the duty should be prescribed by the legislature rather than be declared by the courts, for then it may be known in advance of liability, and the courts will be saved the expense and difficulty of explaining to disappointed litigants, in cases based upon a different state of facts, but logically requiring the same result, why they are mistaken. Thus, in Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, the cases are cited in which it is held that a railroad company does not owe to children the duty to see that they do not jump upon its cars, or to keep its cars in good repair, or the doors shut, or to guard them so that children cannot be injured by loosening the brakes, or not to leave a hand car near the track, or to keep a lookout for them when trespassing. To which may be added Dicken v. Liverpool Salt & Coal Co. 41 W. Va. 511, 23 S. E. 582, in which, a recovery was denied for the injury of a little child, crippled by a car while on a tramroad of a salt company; Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577, where a child of four years was drowned in a reservoir that had once been used by the city, but had been abandoned, the fence removed, though a portion of it yet had water in it, and there was a field nearby where ball playing and other games went on and children were accustomed to play, the child, while passing along a path at the reservoir, fell into it; Grindley v. McKechnie, 163 Mass. 494, 40 N. E. 764, where a child went through an opening in a fence, along a path, and fell into a sewer owned by the city; Gay v. Essex Electric Street R. Co. 159 Mass. 238, 21 L.R.A. 448, 38 Am. St. Rep. 415, 34 N. E. 186, where liability was denied to a boy ten years old, who went on a car unlawfully standing in a street, and was injured by a recoiling brake, not properly fastened; Talty v. Atlantic, 92 Iowa. 135, 60 N. W. 516, where a child was injured while digging sand, a bank caving in upon knowledge of the company, are attractive to children, does not show an invitation, express or implied, for children to make use of them as a stairway, in the absence of evidence to show that this is not the usual and ordinary method of construction; and the company is therefore not liable for the death of a four-year-old boy who falls from the steps and is killed. Williamson v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 40 Tex. Civ. App. 18, 88 S. W. 279.

A railroad company is not liable for injury to a seven-year-old girl who falls through an open culvert across a ditch forming part of a switch track, where the culvert is not put in a place frequented by children as a playground, or in their customary path across the ditch, and where there is nothing in the structure itself to tempt children to it or to entice them to use it. Fredericks v. Illinois C. R. Co. 46 La. Ann. 1180, 15 So. 413.

It is not negligence on the part of a railroad company to fail so to guard its stock pens as to prevent the entrance of a seven-year-old boy who is injured by a gang plank which is struck by a car, and driven against his foot while he is standing in a cattle chute. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cunningham, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 65, 26 S. W. 474.

But in Dwyer v. Missouri P. R. Co. 12 Mo. App. 597, it was held that evidence that a railroad company erected, on unclosed ground near its track, a low trestle, to which children habitually resorted to play, and placed irons upon it in such a manner as to be upset by a child's weight, and that a child threw off one of these irons, and was killed by its fall, tends to show culpable negligence on the part of the company.

And it was held that an invitation to children of tender years to visit railroad yards may be implied where it has created a situation that is alluring and attractive to them. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Brown, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 503, 33 S. W. 147.

d) Excavations.

That an excavation upon private land is attractive to children does not require the owner so to guard it as to prevent injury to children coming upon it without his invitation, express or implied. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Beavers, 113 Ga. 398, 54 L.R.A. 314, 39 S. E. 82.

The owner of land is under no duty to protect an infant trespasser who comes from the street across the land of another, from the possible danger of falling into a quarry on the land of a stranger. Magner v. Frankford Baptist Church, 174 Pa. 84, 34 Atl. 456.

In Mackey v. Vicksburg, 64 Miss. 777, 2 So. 178, in holding that the question whether a city digging dirt from a hill, and depositing it in the rear of a lot, by means of which a child of tender years was enabled to escape from the lot, and go upon a precipitous and dangerous path along the hill to a point from which it fell and was hurt, had done what was reasonably calculated to entice the child, following its instincts of curiosity or love of liberty, to escape from him; Ratte v. Dawson, 50 Minn. 450, 52 N. W. 965, where a child of three years, playing in a pit in an unguarded vacant lot, was killed by the caving of the bank; and in this case children were attracted by the bank, and were accustomed to play there; Barney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 126 Mo. 372, 26 L.R.A. 847, 28 S. W. 1069, where children went to play in an unfenced railroad yard, and one of them, six years of age, was injured in jumping on a train; Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467, where defendant owned a lumber yard in a populous part of the city, frequented by children, and a child was injured by the falling of a pile of lumber not in a safe condition; Clark v. Richmond, 83 Va. 355, 5 Am. St. Rep. 281, 5 S. E. 369, where a child six years of age walked on a wall along the street and fell into a pit; Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Co. 50 W. Va. 457, 55 L.R.A. 911, 88 Am. St. Rep. 884, 40 S. E. 410, where a boy seven years of age trespassed upon the property of a coal company, and was injured by a pulley and cable used by the company to haul cars from its mines to the tippie; Habina v. Twin City General Electric Co. 150 Mich. 41, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1226, 113 N. W. 586, where a little girl nine years of age, while crossing the uninclosed lands of the defendant, fell into a ditch filled with hot water.

But it is said that the case of Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11, 4 Am. St. Rep. 507, 12 N. E. 451, applies the doctrine of the turntable cases, and that ever since, for twenty years, the decision in that case has been considered by the profession as committing this court to that doctrine. If true, that would not make the doctrine a rule of property, but would entitle the case only to the same consideration that is given any other considered judgment of the court. The decision in that case did not require the application of the doctrine of the turntable cases, but rests upon long-settled principles of law. There, some boys, walking along the tracks of a railroad, found an unexploded torpedo, and, when trying to open it, in ignorance of its dangerous character, it exploded and seriously injured one of their number. The case was disposed of on a demurrer to the petition. The boys were held to be licensees, and, being licensees, it was the duty of the company to warn them of the hidden peril, or to use care that they were not injured thereby. In the opinion (31) Williams, J., says: "Hence, where a railroad company has, for a long time, permitted the public, including the yard, and enter upon the dangerous path, was one of fact for the jury, the court said that if the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable foresight, could have anticipated the probability of the child's action, it should have guarded against the danger by removing the earth or obstructing the pathway. If it failed so to do, it failed in a duty which rested upon it, and was not relieved from responsibility even though the child was a trespasser in going upon the premises.

The owner of an unoccupied residence lot upon which excavations have been made to obtain building sand is not liable for the death of a three-year-old child who is taken into the lot for recreation by an older sister, and is knocked down by falling earth from an overhanging embankment, although the premises are open and unfenced, and the excavations are unprotected; since the owner owes them no duty to fence or guard his premises, and there is nothing in the nature of the excavations which can be said to be especially inviting or attractive to children, or calculated to entrap them into danger, within the rule established in the turntable cases. Ratte v. Dawson, 50 Minn. 450, 52 N. W. 965.

In Talty v. Atlantic, 92 Iowa, 135, 60 N. W. 516, several boys, ranging from seven to ten years of age, went to dig in a shallow sandpit with a sloping approach from the line of a street which was not a public thoroughfare, there being no sidewalks upon it, and the traveled way being upon a wagon track upon the side opposite the pit, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

some distance from it. They undermined the bank until it fell and killed all but one of them. The court said that the rule applicable to the city in determining whether its officers were negligent is: "Was the situation of the sandpit, in such close proximity to the street, the condition of the pit as to its extent, and all the surroundings, such as to require the authorities of the city, in the exercise of reasonable judgment, to anticipate that children might be allured to the pit from the street, and, with shovels and spades, excavate holes in the bank to such an extent as to endanger their lives? If there is warrant in the evidence to authorize such a finding, the city is liable." In this case, after a verdict of $100 was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, he moved for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was too small, the motion being granted. The court held that the motion should have been overruled and judgment entered on the verdict.

Hawley v. Atlantic, 92 Iowa, 174, 60 N. W. 519, was a case arising out of the same facts. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant moved for judgment on the special findings. The court, in Talty v. Atlantic, supra, reiterated the rule of liability above stated; but, as there was no evidence in the record, the court assumed that the necessary facts were established to warrant the verdict, and affirmed the judgment.

No duty rests upon the owner to keep a sandpit in a safe condition for a trespassing child under seven years of age.

children, to travel and pass habitually over its road, at a given point, without objection or hindrance, it should, in the operation of its trains and management of its road, so long as it acquiesces in such use, be held to anticipate the continuance thereof, and is bound to exercise care accordingly, having due regard to such probable use, and proportioned to the probable danger to persons so using its road; and it is negligence for the servants of such company to knowingly interpose any new danger without reasonable precaution against injury therefrom." In the present case, unlike Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co., the facts do not make a case, if not of implied invitation, at least one in which the defendant may be said to be estopped to deny permission. Assuming, then, but not deciding, that the plaintiff was a licensee, the turntable was not a hidden peril or trap, as those terms are understood in law. The turntable was not visible from the streets, and the boys were not by it attracted or lured onto the railroad company's property, and the company legally is no more responsible for the injuries received by the boy in meddling with the turntable than it would have been had they been sustained by him in meddling with any other of its appliances.

Newdoll v. Young, 80 Hun, 364, 30 N. Y. Supp. 84.

One who digs a sandpit in his own land is bound to prosecute the work in such a manner as not to endanger children who may be attracted to it, or else he must maintain a fence or other safeguard to keep them out of the lot. Fink v. Missouri Fur-nace Co. 10 Mo. App. 61.

The owner of land upon which a trench is dug which fills with water, and upon which pieces of board, shavings, and other material float so as to conceal the danger, is not liable for the drowning of a five-year-old trespassing child who falls into the trench, although the excavation is only 25 feet from a much-traveled thoroughfare in a large city, and access to it is not cut off by any sufficient fence or other obstacle, and warning of its danger is not given in any way. Grindley v. McKechnie, 163 Mass. 494, 40 N. E. 764.

In Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 217, 65 Pac. 379, liability for injury to a seven-year-old girl who falls into an open cellar on a vacant lot does not arise merely because of the attractiveness of the place to the child and the failure of the owner to guard it; nor does the turntable doctrine apply, where it appears that the child was aware of the danger, and was pushed into the excavation.

But in Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah. 222, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 619, 93 Pac. 570, the doctrine of the turntable cases was held to apply to an unguarded conduit, attractive and dangerous to a schoolboy eight years of age, where the danger is such as easily

In the case of Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. it was not necessary to a determination of the questions presented to determine whether the boy was on the railroad company's property by implied invitation, or by license. It may be, as intimated in the opinion, that the conduct of the company estopped it to deny liability, or to assert that the boy was a trespasser; but it was not necessary to go further, for, in either case, it was the duty of the company not to interpose a trap or pitfall, or a new danger, without notice or the exercise of due care. Upon this ground the judgment in that case may be vindicated; but we are not satisfied that what is there said upon the subject of invitation and license can be.

In Sturgis v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 72 Mich. 619, 40 N. W. 914, Campbell, J., says: "It is impracticable to keep off trespassers from an open track, and all who go upon it do so at their own risk of such dangers as are incident directly to such use." And in Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, a case in which a boy was drowned in an uncovered cistern on private premises, he says: "Cases are quite numerous in which the same questions have arisen which arise in this case; and we have found none which hold that an accident from negligence on to be foreseen and prevented. It was held in this case that the court could not say, as a matter of law, that city officials should not foresee that boys might go into an unguarded conduit for a distance of over 600 feet, nearly 400 feet of which was totally dark, in order to play, and that they might fall into the water coming into the conduit at that point, and be drowned, so as to render it error to refuse to direct a verdict in favor of the city in an action to hold it liable for the death of a boy so drowned.

b. Attractions in highway.

Following the lead of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, the courts have been much more inclined to impose liability for dangerous machinery, etc., left unprotected in the highway, than they have where the dangerous attractions are on private premises, where the child has no right to go. Technically, however, the child, where he goes upon a dangerous machine in the street, is as much a trespasser as when he goes upon a turntable on private grounds. The temptation, however, is more open to him, and the owner of the dangerous agency cannot help knowing that children will be attracted thereby, and that they are liable to injury if it is left unprotected.

In Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1068, Peckham, J., said there was a great difference in the facts between the case of Lynch v. Nurdin, supra, and a private premises can be made the ground of damages unless the party injured has been induced to come by personal invitation, or by employment which brings him there, or by resorting there as to a place of business or of general resort held out as open to customers or others whose lawful occasions may lead them to visit there. We have found no support for any rule which would protect those who go where they are not invited, but merely with express or tacit permission, from curiosity or motives of private convenience, in no way connected with business or other relations with the occupant." And in Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L.R.A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, 87 N. W. 644, it is expressly ruled that "an invitation or a license to cross the premises of another cannot be predicated on the mere fact that no steps have been taken to interfere with such practice;" and that "there is no difference between children and adults as to the circumstances that will warrant the inference of an invitation or a license to enter upon another's premises."

In Turess v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 314, 40 Atl. 614, Magie, Ch. J., says: "Invitation which creates such a relation may be express, as when the owner or occupier of land, by words, invites another to come on it or make use of it or something thereon; or it may be implied, as when such owner or occupier, by acts or conduct, leads another to believe that the land or something thereon was intended to be used as he uses them, and that such use is not only acquiesced in by the owner or occupier, but is in accordance with the intention or design for which the way or place or thing was adapted and prepared or allowed to be used. This definition, originally given in Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, was approved and adopted by our court of errors. Phillips v. Burlington Library Co. 55 N. J. L. 307, 27 Atl. 478. It will be observed that, in the case of an implied invitation, the relation is imposed upon the owner or occupier of land only when he has done something which justifies one who enters upon the land and makes use of it or something upon it in believing that he intended such use to be made; and he who makes such use can claim the relation only when he is justified by the acts or conduct of the owner or occupier in believing that such use was intended. And entry and use by such invitation are thus distinguished from entry and use by mere permission."

turntable case. Whether leaving a horse and cart in a public street, unattended and loose, subject to natural observation and interference from children passing along the street, was or was not negligence, might be held a proper question for the jury; while, in the case of a defendant engaged upon his own land in doing simply that which it was necessary to do in order that he might carry on his business properly, and who failed to exercise the highest vigilance in order to protect from possible harm children who might stray upon his land for no other purpose than recreation, there was an absence of any fact upon which a jury ought to be permitted to find negligence. The defendant in the one case was not upon his own land, nor was he engaged in the proper transaction of his business thereon; but, on the contrary, he was in a public street, and had improperly left his horse and cart therein unattended, where others, and among them children, had the same right to be that he had. In the case at bar, the turntable was on the defendant's own land; it was a proper and appropriate machine for the carrying on of its business; it was properly made and was properly used by the defendant.

In Conrad v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1129, 61 S. E. 44, the court said it did not perceive the supposed analogy between such a case as Lynch v. Nurdin, supra, and one in which a man erected or left a structure, machine, or other thing on his own land, upon which strangers could not rightfully come. That liability was predicated on the doing of a negligent act in a public highway, not on the premises of the defendant, was clearly shown by Lord Denman's opinion. Neither Lynch v. Nurdin nor any other English cases the court had found applied this principle to lawful and unmalicious acts done by a man on his own premises. Nor in most states in which the turntable cases were regarded as law was the principle applied to persons other than railroad companies; nor to them in respect to structures or machines other than turntables. What possible ground was there for such distinction and discrimination?

In Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 410, 57 L.R.A. 561, 90 N. W. 95, the court, referring to cases like the two last mentioned, said that some critics had sought to weaken the force of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, and to distinguish it from a line of cases repudiating the attractive nuisance doctrine by saying that, in the former, the child was in the public street, and therefore the rule as to trespassers did not apply to it. The suggestion was fallacious and misleading. The cart was also on the public street. It was rightfully there; and the child, when he climbed into it without leave, was as much a trespasser in the eye of the law as it was possible that a child of his years could be,—as much, indeed, as if he had wandered across the boundary line of the defendant's land. The defendant was held liable not because the plaintiff was not a trespasser, nor because the horse and cart were not rightfully upon

And in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L.R.A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 682, in the court of errors and appeals, Gummere, J., says: "The viciousness of the reasoning which fixes liability upon the landowner because the child is attracted lies in the assumption that what operates as a temptation to a person of immature mind is, in effect, an invitation. Such an assumption is not warranted. As was said by Mr. Justice Holmes, in Holbrook v. Aldrich, 168 Mass. 16, 36 L.R.A. 493, 60 Am. St. Rep. 364, 46 N. E. 115, 'temptation is not always invitation. As the common law is understood by the most competent authorities, it does not excuse a trespass because there is a temptation to commit it, or hold property owners bound to contemplate the infraction of property rights because the temptation to untrained minds to infringe there may might have been foreseen.'"

Swarts v. Akron Waterworks Co.: This case owes its existence to the doctrine of the turntable cases, and might be disposed of without further consideration, upon the ruling in the preceding case; but, since it is illustrative of the consequences of adopting the turntable doctrine, it may excuse an extension of this already too lengthy opinion. Counsel for plaintiff say: "A great deal the street, but because he knew, or, as a reasonable man, ought to have known, that, in thus leaving his property exposed, he was offering a dangerous temptation to the thoughtlessness of childhood, and used no care to prevent injury therefrom.

In Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, 9 N. E. 155, it was said that there is a distinction between a case in which an excavation is made or something calculated to amuse and attract children is done or left at a place where a child has a right to be, and one in which the same thing is done or left at a place where, in order to reach the point of danger, the child becomes an intruder upon the premises of another. Consequently, where a five-year-old child was drowned in an excavation preparatory to building a bridge across a shallow stream, the excavation being at a place where the child had a right to be, it was held that the city was liable.

In Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484, it was pointed out that what the court said in the last-mentioned case about excavations upon private property was obiter.

In Iamurri v. Saginaw City Gas Co. 148 Mich. 27, 111 N. W. 884, a gas company's drip-tank wagon, having an uncovered vent-hole, was left in a public street, and the plaintiff, a boy five and one-half years old and a companion between six and seven years of age, climbed upon it. They were driven off once by an employee of the defendant, but climbed back again as soon as was said in the argument below, and doubtless will be said here, in regard to the so-called 'turntable cases.' The insistence that the doctrine of that so-called class of cases shall not be extended has at last reached the point of demanding that a real turntable shall be shown in any case as the best and only evidence that the principle is to be applied. We are contending, not for a name, but for a principle. We cannot produce at the bar a turntable; but, if the evidence in this record tends to show that the defendant maintained an 'attractive danger,' a corresponding obligation arose to reasonably safeguard it against the consequences to be apprehended from it to children who might be attracted by and to it. The doctrine thus allowed and recognized by this court as applicable in a proper case we expect will be adhered to in any case falling within the principle, whether the instrument of danger be a turntable or a reservoir of water." And again: "It must be confessed here that the case from which the above quotation is made is a 'turntable' case, and that we are unable to make profit of a turntable in open court; nor can we produce a torpedo to make our position square with Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co.; but our controversy is careless of names, he went away. While the boys were on the wagon, it exploded; the explosion being alleged to have been caused by the dropping of a lighted match into the venthole by plaintiff's companion. A judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed by a divided court. McAlvay, Ch. J., in his opinion in favor of affirmance, distinguished between a trespasser on land and one upon a drip tank left in a public highway, and quoted with approval the following language from Wharton on Negligence, 2d ed. § 112: "It is negligence to leave such an instrument on a place of public access, where persons are expected to be constantly passing and repassing, and where such persons are not required to be on their guard, . . . but it is not negligence to leave such an instrument in a private inclosure, which, from its very privacy, excludes the public, and puts on their guard all who enter."

Hooker, J., however, said the consequences to the child would have been the same had this wagon stood across the walk upon private ground. It would have been just as attractive, and he would have been just as much, and no more, a trespasser upon the wagon. An attempt to discriminate between rights of a trespasser when the wagon was in the highway and when it was on private ground resulted in nothing more than a distinction without a difference. Continuing, he said: "We are of the opinion that it cannot be denied that these boys were trespassers when they climbed on this wagon as an adult would have been; and that the one who applied the match, at least, is lia-and deals with principles alone. The particular principle for which we are quarrelling—and we venture to restate it at the risk of being thought tedious, rather than leave any room for doubt as to where we stand—is this: 'Where the owner of dangerous premises knows or should know that children so young as to be ignorant of the danger will resort to such premises, he is bound to take all reasonable precautions to keep them from the premises, or to protect them from the dangerous condition of the premises;' and this equally whether the danger lurks in a machine or invites approach to a body of water; and that the question of whether the duty thus cast upon the owner has been discharged is one of fact in this case."

In the very able article in 11 Harvard Law Review, 349, 434, Judge Jeremiah Smith reviews all of the cases, and reaches the conclusion that the doctrine of the turntable cases is not sound. He regards the opinion in Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, as the ablest in support of that doctrine, and it may be, therefore, interesting to note, that in the subsequent case, Stendal v. Boyd, 72 Minn. 53, 42 L.R.A. 288, 72 Am. St. Rep. 597, 75 N. W. 735, that court, by its chief justice, in a case where liability is denied for the drowning of a little boy in a dangerous excavation filled with water on a city lot, says: "The doctrine of the turntable cases is an exception to the rule of nonliability of a landowner for accidents from visible causes to trespassers on his premises. If the exception is to be extended to this case, then the rule of nonliability as to trespassers must be abrogated as to children, and every owner of property must, at his peril, make his premises child-proof. If the owner must guard an artificial pond on his premises, so as to prevent injury to children who may be attracted to it, he must, on the same principle, guard a natural pond; and, if the latter, why not a brook or creek, for all water is equally alluring to children? If he must fence in his stone quarry after it fills with water, so that children cannot reach it,—a well-nigh impossible task,—why should he not be required to do it before, for a stone quarry, with its steep and irregular sides, might well be an attractive and dangerous place to children? It would seem that there is no middle ground, and that the doctrine of the turntable cases ought to be limited to cases of attractive and dangerous machinery." And in conclusion he says: "Upon the undisputed facts ble for any damage he may have done to the gas company. It seems incongruous that he should, at the same time, have a cause of action for damages against the gas company for not preventing his trespass."

A manufacturing company piling blocks of granite and slate close to the sidewalk on ground between its factory and the street, in a thickly-populated community, is required to make the place reasonably safe, not only for adults using the highway, but for children, recognizing their childish instincts and the probability that they may be attracted to enter upon the premises, so as to prevent a stone from falling on a child who touches it in play; the question whether the company has exercised such care being for the jury. Rachmel v. Clark, 205 Pa. 314, 82 L.R.A. 959, 54 Atl. 1027.

One who piles beer barrels in a street in such a manner that he should anticipate that children will climb upon them, and in such a manner as to be dangerous to them while so climbing, is liable for injury to a five-year-old boy, caused by the falling of the barrels while he is at play upon them. Kreiner v. Straubmiller, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 609. The court said that it is a well-established rule that those controlling property on or immediately adjacent to a public highway must have regard to the reckless and thoughtless taste and traits of childhood. The owners of the premises are required in such cases to anticipate that children may use the highway, and, in so doing, be exposed to any unsafe object placed thereon. They are bound to know that young children are likely to be at play on the streets, and to make use of the objects attractive for their exploits and games; and thus responsibility has been held to attach in some cases where the offensive object was wholly upon the property of the defendant, and where the children were trespassers.

In O'Leary v. Michigan State Teleph. Co. 146 Mich. 243, 109 N. W. 434, the question whether a telegraph company, the servants of which were engaged in stringing a cable, was negligent in not leaving a pulley block guarded, so as to prevent a seven-year-old child from catching his hand in it, was held properly submitted to the jury. The court pointed out the fact that the child, when hurt, was in the highway, where he had a right to be, and said that there was reasonable ground for distinction between a case in which something was left in the highway which could only injure a child by his meddling with it, and putting it into operation in the absence of the owner or person having it in charge, and a case like the one at bar, in which the owner was present, operating the apparatus, and having actual notice that the children were attracted by the tackle, and would play with it unless prevented. Hooker, J., dissented.

A person who leaves exposed in a public street an unsecured and unguarded iron roller is liable for the death of a five-year-old boy who escapes from the residence of his parents, gets upon the roller, starts the mules, and is thrown under the machine, and mortally injured. Westerfield v. Levis Bros. 43 La. Ann. 63, 9 So. 52.

in this case, we hold that the plaintiff cannot recover, for the reason and upon the ground that a landowner is not bound to fence or otherwise guard an open excavation or pond, natural or artificial, on his land, so as to prevent injury to children coming thereon without right or invitation, express or implied, although they are induced so to do by the alluring attractiveness of such excavation or pond." In Erickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 82 Minn. 60, 51 L.R.A. 645, 83 Am. St. Rep. 410, 84 N. W. 462, liability was denied in a case where a child four years of age was attracted by a fire on the unfenced right of way of the railway company near the public streets, and, while playing about the fire, was burned so that she died. Start. Ch. J., in that case, says: "The manifest trend, however, of all the decisions of this court, is to limit its application to attractive and dangerous machinery, and to other similar cases where the danger is latent. We are not prepared to say that cases may not arise outside of this classification to which the doctrine ought to be extended; but we do hold that, as a general rule, the doctrine of the turntable cases must be limited to cases of attractive and dangerous machinery, and to other similar cases where the danger is latent.

A contractor grading a street, who leaves in the highway an unguarded scraper, attractive and dangerous to children, is guilty of negligence rendering him liable for injury to a five-year-old girl, received while playing upon the machine. Kelley v. Parker-Washington Co. 107 Mo. App. 490, 81 S. W. 631.

One who piles lumber in a public street without proper consent, so as to constitute a public nuisance, is liable for injury to a nine-year-old trespassing child upon whom a portion of it falls, although the evidence fails to make apparent the cause of its falling, where the evidence also fails to show that the injured child was instrumental in causing the lumber to fall. Smith v. Davis, 22 App. D. C. 315. The court said that the lumber was piled on public ground, where the public had a right to be, and that it was tempting to children to play on it, or, it might be, to sit on it; and that if, by indulging their natural impulses, they were on the timber, and it fell from some jar or disturbance received, it would be difficult to show that there was any such negligence on their part as would defeat a recovery for an injury received by one of them.

In Spengler v. Williams, 67 Miss. 1, 6 So. 613, the plaintiff recovered a verdict for the death of her child, who was killed while at play by the falling of an unsafe pile of lumber in a public street, the recovery being allowed on the theory that the lumber so maintained was an attractive nuisance. There was an averment in the declaration that the defendant knew that the piling of

This rule may not be strictly logical, but it is a necessary one, unless landowners are to be made insurers of the safety of children when trespassing upon their premises." In Mattson v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 95 Minn. 477, 70 L.R.A. 503, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, 104 N. W. 443, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 498, the doctrine was extended to a case in which the defendant had left exposed and unguarded on its premises a large quantity of dynamite, which was found by the plaintiff's children, and in an explosion of which one of them was killed and the other permanently injured. In Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 641, 33 L.R.A. 755, 56 Am. St. Rep. 543, 36 S. W. 659, liability is denied for the death by drowning of a boy nine years of age in a pond which was created by excavations in quarrying rock. Liability is also denied in Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 422, 3 Am. St. Rep. 557, 6 S. W. 74, where a boy eight years of age was drowned in a pond on a lot in the city of St. Louis. In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, 47 Pac. 113, 598, liability is denied for the drowning of a boy eleven years of age, in a pond on a city lot. In Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, liability is denied in the case of the drowning of an infant the lumber in the street was well calculated to attract and entice children of tender age to play around it. It was urged that the verdict should be set aside, on the ground that there was no evidence to show that the defendant knew that the piling of lumber in the street would attract children, or that it was calculated to entice them to play around it; but the court held that such fact did not belong to that class of things to be alleged in pleading, or, if alleged, to be proved specifically.

One who piles lumber in a street in an inhabited part of a city by placing one piece over another, in tiers, instead of piling it so that the tiers will rest against and support one another there being a strong probability that children will be playing about it at all hours of the day, is guilty of reckless, culpable negligence which will render him liable for the death of a six-year-old child who, while trying to climb upon the lumber, is killed by the falling of a portion of the pile. Earl v. Crouch, 40 N. Y. S. R. 847, 16 N. Y. Supp. 770, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 613, 30 N. E. 864.

The fact that a girl of tender years, while traveling in the street, turns aside for a moment to play upon lumber so piled in the highway as to constitute a nuisance, thereby becomes a trespasser, does not relieve the owner of the lumber from liability for injury to her, caused by the falling of a portion of it. Busse v. Rogers, 120 Wis. 443, 64 L.R.A. 183, 98 N. W. 219. The court said that "the child who lags unwilling on the way to school, and chases a bright-child in a pond on land in the vicinity of a public school. In Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, where a child fell into an uncovered cistern, and was drowned, liability was denied. In Klix v. Nieman, 68 Wis. 271, 60 Am. Rep. 854, 32 N. W. 223, liability is denied in a case where a child nine years of age was drowned in an unfenced pond on a lot in the city of Milwaukee. In Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, liability was denied in a case where a child eight years of age fell into an abandoned and unguarded cistern or well. And in Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 43 L.R.A. 148, 31 S. E. 993, liability was denied in a case where a child less than five years of age was drowned in a reservoir maintained by the city to furnish water for public use. In the opinion, Brannon, Ch. J., says: "There can be no negligence charged upon a person unless he rests under a duty to the person complaining of damage at his hands; for, if there is no duty violated, though there may be grave damage befalling the complaining party, he has no ground of action. It is a case denominated in law as damnum absque injuria,—damage done, but without violation of a right in the injured party,—a misfortune unaccompanied by a breach of duty by the party inflicting the injury. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 8. The reservoir and the land containing it were the private property of the city, used not as a park or place of public resort or common, but only for reservoir purposes. The child was a trespasser, if you can say a child can be a trespasser. It was a trespasser in legal sense; that is, it was on this property without right. The city was not bound to watch it. It could not be liable to it only for wilful or wanton injury."

In this court, in Ann Arbor R. Co. v. Kinz, 68 Ohio St. 210, 67 N. E. 479, the company owned an unfenced common in the city of Toledo. The plaintiff, a boy eleven years of age, was attracted to the common by a game of ball, and, while there, engaged with some other boys in playing about a bank, 10 feet in height, he was injured by the falling of the bank, and it was held that the railroad company was not liable. In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Liidtkke, 69 Ohio St. 384, 69 N. E. 653, liability was denied where a boy, six years of age, strayed onto the right of way of the railroad company in the city of Sandusky, and was injured by a passing train, by which he was attracted, and when trying to touch a passing car. It was held that the company was not liable. In Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Aller, 64 winged butterfly, or plays a game of marbles, or climbs a tempting pile of timber in the highway to play seesaw for a moment, does not thereby become an outlaw, and, when injured by another's negligence, he cannot be turned aside with the curt remark that he has ceased to travel, and become a trespasser, and hence can complain of no one's conduct. His natural habits and instincts must be in some way and degree recognized."

One who stacks lumber in a public street is liable for injury to a six-year-old boy who falls therefrom, although it may not have been negligently piled, since its unguarded situation makes it an attractive and accessible object of danger to very young children. Harper v. Kopp, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 2342, 73 S. W. 1127.

In Lynch v. Knoop, 118 La. 611, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480, 118 Am. St. Rep. 391, 43 So. 252, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 807, it was held that the owner of a lumber pile in a public landing place was not liable for the death of an eight-year-old girl, caused by the fall of lumber upon her, due to the fact that other children had gone upon the lumber and displaced pieces of it, since the owner had no reason to suspect that children would do that, and for the reason that the lumber pile was not such an object as to attract children or excite their curiosity.

In Ricketts v. Markdale, 31 Ont. Rep. 610, a municipal corporation was held liable for the death of a child less than seven years of age, who was killed while at play on a pile of lumber at the side of a street, near to and partly on the sidewalk, the accident being caused by one of the pieces swaying around and crushing him. Ferguson, J., said that the timbers offered an invitation and were an allurements to children for the purposes of play. The recovery was based upon the corporation's negligence in failing to keep the street safe, it being held that the child had the right to play in the highway; but no point is made as to his being a trespasser on the lumber.

A railroad company which stacks building material in a street in so negligent a manner that a beam falls upon an eleven-year-old boy while attempting to get down from the top of the pile, upon which he had climbed, is liable for the resulting injury. Louisville R. Co. v. Esselman, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 333, 93 S. W. 50.

Judgment should not be granted on answers to interrogatories, notwithstanding a general verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action against a city and an independent contractor, brought to recover damages for injuries to a six-year-old boy who went to play in a sand pile in a street in which a sewer was being constructed, and fell into an open manhole, although the answers show that the construction company had exclusive possession of the street at the manhole, for the purpose of building the sewer, and that it frequently warned boys away from playing in the sand pile near the open manhole, and that the injured boy knew that the manhole was uncovered, where other answers show that the boy, at the time of the accident, did not have intelligence enough to Ohio St. 183, 60 N. E. 205, footmen, with the knowledge of the company, used its station platform and tracks as a route to the village, and the plaintiff, intending so to use the platform and tracks, set out for the village about a half mile distant, but he did not, as was the custom, leave the platform before reaching the end of it, and walk along the track, but continued along the platform, and, in the dark, stepped off the end of it and was injured. It was held that he was not invited by the company to use its premises, but that its use was merely permissive, and that he assumed the risk. In Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Bingham, 29 Ohio St. 364, 23 Am. Rep. 751, it is held: "A railroad company is not liable for an injury to a person resulting from its failure to exercise ordinary skill and care in the erection or maintenance of its station house, where, at the time of receiving the injury, such person was at such station house by mere permission and sufferance, and not for the purpose of transacting any business with the company or its agents, or on any business connected with the operation of the road."

We may very appropriately conclude in the words of Allen, J., in Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577: "The excavation for a reservoir was not made and filled with water for a trap, but for a lawful use by the defendants on their own land. . . . The averment of license and invitation to the child to go there is one of argument by inference from the facts stated, and the facts positively averred do not warrant and support the inference. The fact that children went to the reservoir pit from curiosity or for pleasure, without objection of the defendants, was not an invitation nor a license to go there. The child was not upon the land by invitation, nor under circumstances which made know the danger of the manhole, and it is not shown that he was ever warned of the danger by anyone, and it further appears that the manhole had been completed for four weeks, and was within 4 feet of the sand pile, which was 7 feet high, and that the manhole had been left continuously for two weeks uncovered, to the knowledge of both the city and the company, and to their knowledge that the sand pile was attractive to children of the neighborhood, and that they were attracted to it for the purpose of play, and that there were no guards or barricades about the manhole, or on the street or sidewalk. South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 54 L.R.A. 396, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 60 N. E. 271.

One who is moving attractive machinery in a public highway discharges his duty to children of tender age who are at play about it by repeatedly driving them away; and is not liable under such circumstances for injury to a seven-year-old boy, received while he is suddenly attempting to pass between part of the machinery. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Burns, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 412, 86 S. W. 65.

A stone wagon with bed below the axles is not so attractive and dangerous to children as to require the owner to take special precaution to avoid injury to those who attempt to ride upon it. Foster-Herbert Cut Stone Co. v. Pugh, 115 Tenn. 688, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 804, 112 Am. St. Rep. 881, 91 S. W. 199.

It is the duty of a street car company to use reasonable care to prevent children from going upon its cars, to which they are attracted when the cars are left exposed in a public street. Denver City Tramway Co. v. Nicholas, 35 Colo. 462, 84 Pac. 813.

In Jonasch v. Standard Gaslight Co. 24 Jones & S. 447, 4 N. Y. Supp. 542, affirmed in 117 N. Y. 641, 22 N. E. 1131, the questions whether a derrick in a street was left unguarded and unfastened, and was a dangerous machine, likely to cause injury to children when unguarded and unfastened, and, if it was both unguarded and dangerous, whether that, as a matter of fact, constituted negligence, were held rightfully left to the jury.

The turntable doctrine does not apply to a case in which a nine-year-old boy is run over by a street railway trailer car, left in the street, and set in motion on a down grade by the loosening of the brakes by the plaintiff and his companions, where the danger is open to observation, and can be comprehended by a boy of plaintiff's age with average intelligence, and where the car is equipped with brakes of the ordinary kind, properly set. George v. Los Angeles R. Co. 126 Cal. 357, 46 L.R.A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184, 58 Pac. 819.

In Jewson v. Gatti, 2 Times L. R. 441, while a young girl was leaning against a guard rail in a cellar way, watching men at work painting in the cellar, the rail gave way, and she fell into the cellar, and was hurt. This was held to be a case for the jury. Lord Esher said that, in addition to the fact that the area was left unprotected, without due regard to the safety of the public while painting was going on in the cellar, that the defendant must have known that this would attract children, and that children would naturally lean against the bar while looking into the cellar. That was almost an invitation, certainly an inducement, to the children to lean against the bar while looking down into the cellar.

In Cincinnati & H. Spring Co. v. Brown, 32 Ind. App. 58, 69 N. E. 197, in holding that the question of defendant's negligence was for the jury where the owner of premises adjoining a highway maintained a broken-down barbed-wire fence against which a twelve-year-old girl ran while at play, and was hurt, the court said that, in determining what the duty of the owner was, the fact that he knew of the use of the locality it the duty of the defendants to protect him. He was there to gratify his curiosity, or for mere pleasure, and the defendants owed him no special duty. It was not a case of setting a trap for the children, nor one of wantonly and knowingly leading them into danger and this one to destruction. It was the ordinary case of a landowner managing, within the boundaries of his own land, his own property, in his own way, for his own use and benefit; and though, in doing this, he might find occasion to . . . construct reservoirs, provide fish ponds, plant and cultivate fruit trees, erect and maintain useful structures, instruments, and machinery, all of which are alluring, attractive, and dangerous to children, yet it could not be claimed that he must constantly guard these things against the approach of persons coming without license or invitation, . . . or suffer in damages for any injury they might receive. The rule that the owner of land may manage it in his own way for his own benefit, and owes no duty to those who come upon it for no business purpose, but without license, express or implied, is too well established to need further comment, or to warrant a departure from it."

In the case of Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Harvey the judgments of the Circuit Court and of the Court of Common Pleas are reversed, and the petition is dismissed; and in the case of Swarts v. Akron Water-Works Co. the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

as a playground by the children of the neighborhood, and the fact that the remnants of the wire fence served no purpose of use or ornament, but, by reason of the sharp bars upon the wire, were dangerous to anyone coming forcibly in contact therewith without knowing of their presence, were to be considered by the triors for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion as to the reasonableness or prudence of making such a use of the premises, it being a well-recognized doctrine that persons are required to use greater care in dealing with children of tender years than with older persons, who have reached the age of discretion, and that greater care is required to avoid injury to them even when they are trespassers.

In the following cases recovery has been denied, where the dangerous attraction was in the highway. No liability arises for injury caused by the falling of a cake of ice upon a four-year-old child trespassing on an ice wagon step, although the child would not have been hurt if the boards at the end of the wagon had been higher. Conlon v. Bailey, 58 Ill. App. 261.

In Malmberg v. Bartos, 83 Ill. App. 481, the proprietor of a store, while unloading ice, left his chopping ax on the sidewalk while he carried in the ice. The plaintiff, a child seven years old, and another girl, the proprietor's son, four years old, and another boy, several years older, were standing near by. The plaintiff attempted to pick up a piece of ice, and was ordered not to by the four-year-old boy, who told her to go away or he would "fix her." Upon her refusal to leave, the elder of the two boys seized and held her finger while the proprietor's son picked up the ax and chopped it off. It was held that the father could not be held liable on the theory that it was negligent to leave the ax on the sidewalk where children were playing near by. The court said it was scarcely necessary to say that while an ax might be a dangerous instrument in the hands of a child, it did not necessarily follow that the defendant was guilty of negligence, or, if he was, that his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

That insecurely-piled iron girders are attractive to children, who use them as a place for play, or as a resting place after play, imposes no duty upon the owner of the premises, or the contractor who piles them there, so to arrange them as to render them safe for the use of the children. Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 497. Fort, J., dissented.

A winch used in raising fragments of stone from a trench during the construction of a sewer does not, when left unprotected in the street, become a nuisance to children playing with it, so as to render the contractor liable for a resulting injury, since the machine is not in itself dangerous, and does not, in itself, constitute an unlawful obstruction to the highway, and is not of such a character that a jury may find that, merely because it is so left in the highway, it is dangerous and a temptation or enticement to children of tender years, and that the natural and probable result of their playing with it will be an injury to them. Fitzgerald v. Rodgers, 58 App. Div. 298, 68 N. Y. Supp. 946.

No liability arises for injury to an eight-year-old boy, caused by the falling of an ornamental urn on top of an iron street post which he climbs in order to get a better view of a parade. Keegan v. Luzerne County, 8 Kulp. 160.

A city is not liable for injury to a six-year-old boy who goes upon a wall at the side of a street, and, while walking or standing thereon, falls into an area on the other side. Clark v. Richmond, 83 Va. 355, 5 Am. St. Rep. 281, 5 S. E. 369. It was urged in this case that it was negligence in the corporation thus to leave exposed, without barriers, a place so enticing and alluring to

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

HENRY E. THOMPSON, by Next Friend, v.BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COM-PANY, Appt.

(218 Pa. 444, 67 Atl. 768.)

Negligence — turntables — trespassing children — liability.

A railroad company owes no duty to a trespassing child to lock or guard its turntables, although such machines are calculated to allure children to them for amusement.

children, but the court said that the obligation of municipal corporations to erect barriers around areas adjoining or extending into its sidewalks or highways grew out of the duty which rested upon them to maintain their streets and sidewalks in safe condition for those who might rightfully use them, whether they were grown persons or children; but this duty could not be held to extend to the protection of children against every sudden freak that might possess them.

Nor is a properly-constructed surface-water drain so inviting to a nine-year-old child as to render the city liable for his drowning while playing in the drain during or just after a very heavy rain. Rome v. Cheney, 114 Ga. 194, 55 L.R.A. 221, 39 S. E. 933.

In Jefferson v. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. 116 Ala. 300, 38 L.R.A. 459, 67 Am. St. Rep. 116, 22 So. 546, it was said that a railroad company operating cars in a public street could not be held liable for an injury to a five-year-old boy trespasser on the cars, on the theory that the movement of the cars in the street was attractive to children, and would naturally cause them to desire to get upon them, and that the cars were highly dangerous to children old enough to get upon them, but too young to appreciate the danger, and that the company failed properly to tend or guard such cars while they were being so operated.

No such extraordinary duty is imposed on a city to protect travelers from a peculiarly dangerous precipice or embankment at the side of a street as that of maintaining a barrier so high and so close that children cannot find ways or means to surmount it. Lineburg v. St. Paul, 71 Minn. 245, 73 N. W. 723.

The liability of a city is coextensive with its duty respecting the ordinary use of the highway, but it cannot be extended beyond that limit to a case in which a child has been attracted by machinery employed in the construction of a public sewer, and thereby induced to climb upon or over the barriers or guards into the excavation, so as to render it liable for a resulting injury, that part of the street being closed against travel, and guarded against accident to persons in the

c. Unattractive thing in attractive place.

A distinction may be made between a case in which the dangerous thing is in itself attractive, and one in which it is not of itself attractive, but is located in an attractive place. If the attractive nuisance doctrine is based upon sound reasons, it would seem that it ought to apply as well to the second class of cases as to the first, but the courts have not always so held. In several of the cases where this point might have been raised, no mention was made of it.

In Seymour v. Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. 224 Ill. 579, 79 N. E. 950, the court said that the attractive nuisance cases were divided in two classes: First, where the injury resulted from some dangerous element, a part of or inseparably connected with the alluring thing or device,—as in the turntable cases. Second, where the attractive device or thing was so located or situated that, in yielding to its allurements, the child, without such intervention of another element as broke the relation of cause and effect, was brought directly in contact with a danger from some independent source, which occasioned the injury.

The fact that cross steps on a bridge pier could be used as ladders, and the fact that pigeons were in the habit of rearing their young on the beams and around the top of the bridge, rendering the bridge a place attractive to small boys, will not render an electric power company liable for injury to a boy who, in climbing the bridge, comes in contact with a live wire, 30 feet above the ground, and is thereby hurt, since the things that constitute the attraction were features connected with the river, the bridge, and the pigeons, which were matters for the existence of which the company is not responsible, and the accident is not one which the company should have anticipated. Graves v. Washington Water Power Co. 44 Wash. 675, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 452, 87 Pac. 956.

An electric light company is liable, under the attractive nuisance doctrine, for maintaining defectively-insulated wires outside the course of the traveled way, on a viaduct in a city street, and separated therefrom by a balustrade over which small boys are in the habit of climbing and going close to the wires, where a ten-year-old boy climbs over the railing, and comes in contact with a wire, and is killed. Consolidated Electric-light & P. Co. v. Healy, 65 Kan. 798, 70 Pac. 884. The court said that while the company did not maintain the bridge and the railing constituting the attractive climbing place for boys, and it might be that its wires were not attractive appliances, still it maintained the wires in such immediate proximity to that which was attractive as to constitute them an integral part of the whole. It put its wires within the attractive environment. It identified itself in that way with the attractive place.

It is not negligence for a lessee to maintain an unguarded pile of hot ashes and cinders on land near a pond which is attractive to and is frequently visited by children of the neighborhood, so as to render him liable for injury to a four-year-old boy who is burned while running through the ashes to reach boys fishing in the pond, where the lessee neither creates nor maintains the pond. Smith v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. 82 Mo. App. 9.

A railroad company which leases part of its grounds for a circus is not liable under the turntable doctrine for the death of a boy about twelve years of age, who makes a short cut over the company's switch yards to reach the show grounds, and is run over by one of the company's trains, since there is nothing dangerous in the show itself, and the boy's injuries are not occasioned by anything in or about it. Clark v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Wash. 139, 59 L.R.A. 508, 69 Pac. 636.

But it was held that an electric light company is liable for any injury received by a ten-year-old boy who climbs a small tree with low-hanging branches in a highway, and comes in contact with an uninsulated live wire, since the company is bound to take notice of the habit of small boys of climbing such trees, and to anticipate such an accident. Temple v. McComb City Electric Light & P. Co. 89 Miss. 1, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 449, 119 Am. St. Rep. 698, 42 So. 874, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 924.

d. Degree of care.

In jurisdictions in which the attractive nuisance doctrine is adopted, the duty imposed upon the landowner is that of using reasonable care to avoid injury to children. Whether he has done so depends, of course, upon the circumstances of each case.

Nothing more than ordinary or reasonable care is required of persons who have placed upon their own premises such dangerous machinery as turntables,—attractive, alluring, and open to children strictly non sui juris. Haesley v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 233, 24 Am. St. Rep. 224, 48 N. W. 1023.

A railroad company owes no duty of leaving cars that are dangerous, alluring, and attractive to children at the foot of an incline instead of on it, so that, when the brakes are unfastened, propulsion by gravitation will be impossible; and, if it leaves them on the descending grade, it sufficiently performs its duty when it causes the brakes to be set so securely that it requires the united efforts of two boys, aged eleven and fifteen years, to loosen them. Ibid.

So, if the negligence charged is failure to fence dangerous premises, evidence as to the impracticability of fencing them is admissible. Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 422, 3 Am. St. Rep. 557, 6 S. W. 74.

Whether a railroad company exercised ordinary care in keeping a temporary turntable fastening fixture fastened while the permanent one was being repaired, so as to prevent children from playing with the turntable, and being injured thereby, was held to be for the jury, in Berg v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 95 Minn. 404, 104 N. W. 293, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 375.

yard at night through an open gateway, and while standing near the turntable, with which some children were at the time playing, was struck by a projecting bar which they used in turning it, and was thrown into the pit and caught between the wall and the turntable.

The principles that fix the relation between a landowner and a person entering on the land without permission were fully considered in Gillis v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 59 Pa. 129, 98 Am. Dec. 317, a case in which the plaintiff was injured by the breaking down of a station platform on which he was standing, from mere curiosity, to witness the approach of a train. It was there held that the permissive use of the platform by persons not having business with the company imposed on it no liability for defects in construction, and that a person using the private property of another by permission or sufferance, takes upon himself the risks incident to it. It was said in the opinion by Sharswood, J.: "It will appear on an examination of the interesting and elaborate discussion in the English courts of the question whether an action could be supported by such a trespasser for personal harm occasioned by a spring gun, mantrap, or dogs-pike, set on the grounds of the defendant, in which it was determined that, where there was no proper warning given, such an action well lies; that it rested mainly on the ground that a man cannot lawfully do indirectly that which it is unlawful for him to do directly. He cannot shoot or maim or set a ferocious dog upon a mere trespasser. He shall not there place a concealed machine where it will be likely to do the same thing, or let such a dog loose in his grounds without warning. Deane v. Clayton, 7 Taunt. 489; Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 304; Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628. It is, however, equally well settled that the owner of property is not liable to a trespasser, or to one who is on it by mere permission or sufferance, for negligence of himself or servants, or for that which would be a [public] nuisance if it were in a public street or common where all persons had a legal right to be without question as to their purpose or business." In Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684, a contractor, who was in exclusive possession of land for the purpose of carrying out his contract, had caused an excavation to be made, and had left it unguarded at night. A person crossing the land fell into the excavation and was killed. In the opinion denying the right to recover, it was said: "The law fully recognizes the right of him who, having the dominion of the soil, without malice does a lawful act on his own premises, and leaves the consequences of an act thereby happening where they belong,—up- 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) on him who has wandered out of his way, though he may have been guilty of no negligence in the ordinary acceptance of the term." In Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, a child under eight years of age was drowned in an abandoned well, 80 feet from a city highway, in an uninclosed lot which was a place of resort in hot weather. The instruction to the jury that "the true principle which must be applied to a case of this kind is this: The owner of premises in the neighborhood of a populous city, and opening on a public highway, must so use them as to protect those who stray upon them,"—was expressly disapproved, and the judgment for the plaintiff was reversed. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Schwindling, 101 Pa. 258, 47 Am. Rep. 706, a boy under six years of age went, for his own amusement, on the platform of a railroad station to observe an approaching train, and was struck by an iron step which was bent and projected a few inches from the car. A judgment for the plaintiff was reversed on the ground that the company owed him no duty of protection under the circumstances. This principle has been applied in a variety of cases of trespass by children. In Rodgers v. Lees, 140 Pa. 475, 12 L.R.A. 216, 23 Am. St. Rep. 250, 21 Atl. 399, it was applied in a case where a child took hold of a chain which was a part of a hoisting apparatus and was over a sidewalk outside of the building line; in Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 99 Pa. 301, 44 Am. Rep. 106, where a boy was walking along the tracks of a railroad on the outer ends of the sleepers, and was injured by a passing train; in Oil City & P. Bridge Co. v. Jackson, 114 Pa. 321, 6 Atl. 128, where a boy, in crossing a bridge, walked on a gas pipe, 5 inches in diameter, and fell through an opening in the floor. Of Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332, relied on by the plaintiffs, it has often been said that it is authority for its own facts; and, as far as it appears to sanction the doctrine that a child cannot be treated as a trespasser, it has been expressly overruled. See Gillespie v. McGowan and Rodgers v. Lees, supra. In the first of these cases it was said: "In Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, there was a recklessness that may be said to partake of the nature of wantonness; and it is only upon this principle that judgment can be logically sustained." In Duffy v. Sable Iron Works, 210 Pa. 326, 59 Atl. 1100, an open vat, into which hot tar and grease were run, had been placed in an open space so near the line of the street that a child might unconsciously walk into it. In Rachmel v. Clark, 205 Pa. 314, 62 L.R.A. 959, 54 Atl. 1027, the defendants had used for storage the sidewalk of a street in connection with an open paved space in front of their building, separated from the street only by an imaginary line. The negligence was in placing on a public way, where all persons had a right to be, a slab of slate in such a position that the touch of a child's hand would cause it to fall.

The fact that the person injured was a child makes no difference, unless there was negligence. The plaintiff's youth relieves him of the charge of contributory negligence, but it does not give rise to an imputation of negligence on the part of the defendant. He was where he had no right to be, on the property of the defendant, which it was using in a lawful manner for a lawful purpose in the conduct of its business. It owed him the duty not to injure him intentionally, but it was under no duty actively to take care of him, either by keeping him out of the yard, or by protecting him, after he had entered it, from his own acts or the acts of others who, like him, had entered without permission. There was no negligence unless there was breach of duty. There was no breach of a duty owing an adult. An owner of land is not liable for its condition to an adult who enters without permission. Unless a different standard of duty is to be established as to a child, there was no liability in this case.

Whether an owner of land who makes changes on it in the course of its beneficial use, which tend to attract children, and to expose them to danger, is under a duty to take special precautions for their safety, is a question on which there is a conflict of authority. That such a duty exists has been asserted in some jurisdictions and denied in others. The earlier cases on the subject followed Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, but the tendency of the later decision is decidedly against the imposition of such a duty. Some of the courts that adopted the ruling in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout have since repudiated it, and others have followed it with hesitation, or have limited its application to a particular class of improvements. The establishment of such a duty would create a restraint which, in some cases, would amount to a prohibition, upon a mode of beneficial use of land, for the protection of intruders and intermeddlers. It is difficult to see any ground upon which such a duty can be placed. An owner is not liable for leaving his land in its natural shape. Why should he be held liable for placing structures upon it which are harmless in themselves and are necessary for the lawful use he wishes to make of it? It cannot be said that he invites or allures children, because no such intention in fact exists; nor that he sets a trap for the innocent and unwary. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The law does not impose a duty upon the landowner to take special precautions for a class of persons,—a doctrine which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would, as was said in Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, "charge the duty of the protection of children upon every member of the community except their parents." In Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L.R.A. 831, 68 Am. St. Rep. 727, 40 Atl. 682, it was said by Gummere, J.: "The viciousness of the reasoning which fixes liability upon the landowner because the child is attracted lies in the assumption that what operates as a temptation to a person of immature mind is, in effect, an invitation. Such an assumption is not warranted." If the standard of duty contended for is set up, it will be an exception to the general rule, and a wide and dangerous extension of the liability governing the ownership of property. Where it would logically end it is difficult to determine. As was suggested in Gillespie v. McGowan, supra, it might make it "the duty of the owner of a fruit tree to cut it down because a boy trespasser may possibly fall from its branches." In the opinion in Turess v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 314, 40 Atl. 614, it was said by Magie, Ch. J.: "It is obvious that the principle on which the rule rests, if sound, must be applicable more widely than merely to railroad companies and the turntables maintained by them. It would require a similar rule to be applied to all owners and occupiers of land in respect to any structure, machinery, or implement maintained by them thereon, which possesses a like attractiveness and furnishes a like temptation to young children. He who erects a tower capable of being climbed, and maintains thereon a windmill to pump water to his buildings; he who leaves his mowing machine or dangerous agricultural implements in his field after his day's work; he who maintains a pond in which boys may swim in summer or on which they may skate in winter—would seem to be amenable to this rule of duty." The doctrine of the so-called turntable cases has been disapproved in Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1068; Walker v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co. (Pannill v. Potomac, F. & P. R. Co.) 105 Va. 226, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 80, 115 Am. St. Rep. 871, 53 S. E. 113, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 862; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, supra; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L.R.A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283; Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 10 Am. St. Rep. 396, 9 Atl. 790; Paolino v. McKendall, 24 R. I. 432, 60 L.R.A. 133, 96 Am. St. Rep. 736, 53 Atl. 268; Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463,

Mestrezat, J., dissenting:

Few, if any, more important cases have been considered and determined than the one now presented for the decision of this court. Especially is the doctrine announced far-reaching and important to the multitude of people who live in the congested districts of the cities of the commonwealth. It takes from them a protection which has heretofore been accorded in all jurisdiction where the life of a child is of greater importance than any commercial interest. It completely destroys the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, which for centuries has protected the weak against the strong, the homes of the humblest against the encroachments of the highest. It gives to an individual or a corporation the right to erect upon his premises in the most densely populated part of the city of Philadelphia any machine or structure whatever which he deems necessary for carrying on his business, although such machine or structure may be so placed as to menace the life of every child in the neighborhood. It establishes a principle, as I conceive, unsupported by reason, unsustained by the best judicial thought of this country, and one so appalling that sooner or later, if enforced by this court, must result in legislative action. It cannot be that the people of this commonwealth will submit to a doctrine that declares that a child whose tender years deprive him of protection becomes a trespasser and without the pale of the law when he is attracted to the premises of another by an object, erected thereon by the owner, which appeals to the childish instinct, and by which he is injured or killed. The question involved in this case is not a new one either here or in many other jurisdictions. It is attempted in the opinion to show that the principle announced by the majority of the court is the law in many jurisdictions, including our own, and that the contrary doctrine is a sweeping innovation on the settled common-law rule that a landowner is not liable for the condition of his premises to one who enters without permission. I do not agree with either of these conclusions. On the contrary, while the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

right of the child to be protected under the circumstances of this case has been attacked, yet with deference I submit that the weight of judicial decisions and of text-book authority is overwhelmingly against the doctrine announced in the majority opinion.

A half century ago, this court, in the case of Rauch v. Lloyd, 31 Pa. 358, 72 Am. Dec. 747, approved the principle announced in the leading English case of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, and refused to follow the contrary doctrine adopted in New York and one or two other states. Mr. Justice Woodward, speaking for the court, said (page 370 of 31 Pa.): "But that the same rule should not be applied to a child of tender years was so successfully demonstrated by Lord Denman in Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 30, and by Chief Justice Redfield in Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 224, 54 Am. Dec. 67, that I shall content myself with referring to their reasonings. Nor am I unmindful of the counter current of authorities in New York but the preponderance of both reason and authority will be found favorable to the two adjudications first named. That every case is to be determined by its own circumstances, and that children are to be held responsible only for the discretion of children seem self-evident propositions. A blind man is not bound to see, a deaf man to hear, nor a lunatic to reason; and yet they have a right to redress for injuries inflicted by the negligence of others. Children of tender age are not responsible to the law, either criminally or civilly, and that for want of discretion." It was there held that, where a child of tender years attempted to pass under a train of railroad cars, negligently left standing on the crossing of a public street, and by which he was injured, the owners of the cars were liable; but, under similar circumstances, they would not have been liable if an adult had been injured. In Gillis v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 59 Pa. 129, 98 Am. Dec. 317, relied on to sustain the position of the majority of the court in the present case, Mr. Justice Sharswood, delivering the opinion, declared the doctrine of Lynch v. Nurdin still to be the law, saying (page 142 of 59 Pa.): "No reference is made in the opinion [he referred to] to Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, a decision much controverted, but one which has stood its ground."

In Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332, a child six years old, while at play, strayed from the street, through an open gate, into an alley, and was killed by a falling platform 24 feet from the street, which was raised and lowered in receiving and shipping goods. At the entrance to the alley, where it abutted on the street, was a gate which was posted "Private" and

"No admittance." The gate was frequently open, although the employees of the factory which adjoined the alley were instructed to keep it shut. The father and mother of the child brought an action to recover damages for his death, on the ground that the defendant was guilty of negligence in respect to the condition or character of the platform, and in not keeping the gate fronting on the street closed. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs, which were sustained by this court. It was there held, in the language of the syllabus, that while it is true, in general, that where no duty is owed no liability arises, this rule varies with circumstances; and where, therefore, an owner has reason to apprehend danger from the peculiar situation of his property and its openness to accident, the question of duty then becomes one for a jury, to be determined upon all its facts of the probability of danger and the grossness of the act of imputed negligence. Chief Justice Agnew delivered the opinion, and in part said (page 336): "Now, can it be righteously said that the owner of such a dangerous trap, held by no fastening, so liable to drop, so near a public thoroughfare, so often open and exposed to the entries of persons on business, by accident, or from curiosity, owes no duty to those who will be probably there? The common feeling of mankind, as well as the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, must say this cannot be true,—that this spot is not so private and secluded as that a man may keep dangerous pits or deadfalls there without a breach of duty to society. On the contrary, the mind, impelled by the instincts of the heart, sees at once that in such a place, and under these circumstances, he had good reason to expect that one day or other someone, probably a thoughtless boy in the buoyancy of play, would be led there, and injury would follow,—especially, too, when prompted by knowledge that a fastening was needed. Perhaps the best monitor in such a case is the conscience of one who feels, in his dreadful recollection, the crushing sense that he had left such an engine of ill to take the life of an innocent child." Mr. Justice Paxson disagreed with the views expressed in the opinion of the chief justice, and noted his dissent on the record.

Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr has been followed and approved by this court in all the cases on the subject, if we except some dicta used in the opinions, in one or two cases. In Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684, Mr. Justice Woodward, delivering the opinion, and speaking of Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, says (page 80 of 86 Pa.): "No cause was ever more justly decided. It was the case suggested by Baron Martin in 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire R. & R. D. Co. 4 Hurlst & N. 67, of a dangerous appliance adjoining a public way. The children were trespassers, certainly, but then they were children; and the defendants were bound to have regard for the reckless and thoughtless traits of childhood. . . . Even a trespasser may have redress for negligent injuries inflicted upon him. . . . Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr rested on principles and precedents that sustained it amply, but which have no application here." Schilling v. Abernethy, 112 Pa. 437, 56 Am. Rep. 320, 3 Atl. 792, quotes from and follows Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. Mr. Justice Gordon, delivering the opinion, said (page 442 of 112 Pa.): "We there held [Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr] that circumstances may beget duties which, under ordinary circumstances, cannot be implied, and that, when such circumstances are shown to exist, the question arising therefrom is not for the court, but for the jury. . . . Whether, then, the owner of these premises [in the case being decided], under the circumstances made apparent by the evidence, was or was not justified in maintaining such a deadfall as this bowing wall along the side of this passageway, was surely a question for the jury, and one that could not lawfully have been withdrawn from the consideration of that body." In Biddle v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 112 Pa. 551, 4 Atl. 485, Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr is quoted with approval in the opinion, which concludes as follows (page 554 of 112 Pa.): "It is very true . . . extra precautions are not required in anticipation of the intrusions of trespassers, even though they be children; but, when they do so intrude, and are known to be in an improper place, they must not be so wholly neglected as to endanger their lives or limbs. Any other doctrine would so illy accord with Christian civilization as to render its maintenance impossible."

In Arnold v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 115 Pa. 135, 2 Am. St. Rep. 542, 8 Atl. 213, Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, the first of the turntable cases, is cited with approval, and the principle there decided is stated in the following quotation (page 140 of 115 Pa.): "Whilst a railway company is not bound to the same degree of care in regard to mere strangers who are unlawfully upon its premises that it owes to a passenger, it is nevertheless not exempt from responsibility to such strangers for injuries arising from its negligence or from its tortious acts." The opinion of this court then continues: "This same doctrine has been approved by our own authorities, inter alia, in the cases of Pennsylvania Co.

v. Toomey, 91 Pa. 256; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lewis, 79 Pa. 33; Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375, 84 Am. Dec. 457; and Biddle v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. supra." In Corbin v. Philadelphia, 195 Pa. 461, 49 L.R.A. 715, 78 Am. St. Rep. 825, 45 Atl. 1070, decided in 1900, Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr is cited with approval, and Mr. Justice Brown, speaking for the court, quotes two thirds of the opinion in that case, including the strong and emphatic language used by Mr. Justice Agnew. In Rachmel v. Clark, 205 Pa. 314, 62 L.R.A. 959, 54 Atl. 1027, decided in 1903, Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr was cited with approval, and Chief Justice Agnew's opinion was quoted in part as follows (page 319 of 205 Pa.): "Duties arise out of circumstances. Hence, where the owner has reason to apprehend danger, owing to the peculiar situation of his property and its openness to accident, the rule will vary. The question then becomes one for a jury, to be determined upon all its facts, of the probability of danger and the grossness of the act of imputed negligence."

Duffy v. Sable Iron Works, 210 Pa. 326, 59 Atl. 1100, was decided by this court about two and one-half years ago, and is the last expression of opinion by this court on the subject. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Thompson, who cites with approval and quotes from Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. In his opinion, alluding to some of the attacks made upon Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, he says (page 331 of 210 Pa.): "It is difficult to understand why this case has become like a shuttlecock in battle-dore, to be pitched up and down. The boy in that case was six years old, and while playing in the street strolled into the alley, when the gates were open, and while there the platform fell upon him. The facts were submitted to the jury, and the verdict was in favor of the plaintiff below." Justice Thompson then quotes that part of the opinion in Schilling v. Abernathy, supra, which approves Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr.

It will therefore be observed that from 1877, the year in which Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr was decided, until 1904, the principle announced in that case has been recognized and approved time and again by this court. It is claimed, however, in the majority opinion in the case at bar, that certain decisions of this court have practically overruled Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. We will briefly refer to these cases. The first case is Gramlich v. Wurst, from which we have already made a quotation which shows that it sustains Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, is cited in the majority opinion as sustaining its position. There the nearest paved highway ran 300 feet from the place of the accident, and the nearest road was about 80 feet. There were houses about 300 feet off, but the built-up part of the city was nearly one-half mile distant. The facts, therefore, are not similar to those in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. or to those in the case at bar. It is important, in considering the Gillespie Case, to note the fact that the opinion was written by Mr. Justice Paxson, who had dissented in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. It will be observed throughout his opinion that he reflects upon this latter case by the use of certain dicta which should have had no place in the decision. This was the first opportunity the learned justice had after dissenting in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr to get his views in a majority opinion. In Duffy v. Sable Iron Works, supra, referring to a dictum of Justice Paxson in the Gillespie Case, Justice Thompson, speaking for this court, says (page 331 of 210 Pa.): "A dictum occurs in Gillespie v. McGowan, supra, that Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, supra, was in direct conflict with Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684; but an examination of that case will show that the deductions leading to such dictum are not warranted, and that the case rested upon well-defined and settled principles."

In Rodgers v. Lees, 140 Pa. 475, 12 L.R.A. 216, 23 Am. St. Rep. 250, 21 Atl. 399, Mr. Justice Green wrote the opinion, and Mr. Justice Clark dissented. The majority opinion in that case distinguishes Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr. It is true that, in his opinion, Mr. Justice Green quotes some dicta from the opinion in Gillespie v. McGowan, which reflects upon Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr; but it should be noted that the dicta are the words of Mr. Justice Paxson, who had dissented in the Hydraulic Works Case, and also that they were obiter and not necessary to the decision of the Rodgers Case. It will therefore be observed that the cases upon which the majority opinion relies to overthrow the doctrine announced in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr cannot be regarded as sustaining the position, in view of the numerous cases which distinctly recognize and sustain the principle of that decision.

This is a turntable case, and the principles announced in those cases have been recognized and followed not only by the Supreme Court of the United States, in which they originated, but by the courts of the great majority of the states of the Union, as well as by those of England. It is true that New York, New Hampshire, and possibly one or two other states reject the doctrine of the turntable cases. But this does not justify the majority of this court in overruling our own cases, which specifically repudiate the New York doctrine and are in harmony with the adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the courts of the great majority of the several states of the Union. The earliest turntable case was Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, decided in 1874. That was the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was there held: "While it is the general rule, in regard to an adult, that, to entitle him to recover damages for an injury resulting from the fault or negligence of another, he must himself have been free from fault, such is not the rule in regard to an infant of tender years. The care and caution required of a child is according to his maturity and capacity only, and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case." It was also held: "While a railway company is not bound to the same degree of care in regard to mere strangers who are even unlawfully upon its premises that it owes to passengers conveyed by it, it is not exempt from responsibility to such strangers for injuries arising from its negligence or from its tortious acts." In that case a judgment was sustained in favor of a child six years of age who was injured while playing with other children on a turntable located in an open space, about 80 rods from the company's depot in a village of about 150 persons. The Stout Case was followed in the Supreme Court of the United States by Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619, decided in 1894, announcing and approving the same doctrine, although not a turntable case. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered an exhaustive opinion, in which he reviews all the cases upon the subject, and concludes with an affirmation of the doctrine announced in the Stout Case. He notes the fact that Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, is cited with approval in nearly all of the cases. He says that it has been claimed that Lynch v. Nurdin was overruled in England; but he quotes from the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in Clark v. Chambers (1878) L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 327, showing the contrary. He also quotes from the Lord Chief Justice's opinion as follows (page 279 of 152 U. S.): "It appears to us that a man who leaves in a public place along which persons, and, amongst them, children, have to pass, a dangerous machine which may be fatal to anyone who touches it, without any precaution against mischief, is not only guilty of negligence, but of negligence of a very reprehensible character, and not the less so because the imprudent and unauthorized act of another may be necessary to realize the mischief to which the unlawful act or negligence of the defendant has given occasion." The learned justice then says (page 279 of 152 U. S.): "We adhere to the principles announced in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, supra. Applied to the case now before us, they require us to hold that the defendant was guilty of negligence in leaving unguarded the slack pile made by it in the vicinity of its depot building. . . . It knew that children were in the habit of frequenting that locality and playing around the shaft house in the immediate vicinity of the slack pit. The slightest regard for the safety of these children would have suggested that they were in danger from being so near the pit, beneath the surface of which was concealed [except when snow, wind, or rain prevailed] a mass of burning coals into which a child might accidentally fall and be burned to death. Under all the circumstances, the railroad company ought not to be heard to say that the plaintiff, a mere lad, moved by curiosity to see the mine, in the vicinity of the slack pit, was a trespasser, to whom it owed no duty, or for whose protection it was under no obligation to make provision. . . . What difference in reason, we may observe in this case, is there between an express license to the children of this village to visit the defendant's coal mine, in the vicinity of its slack pile, and an implied license, resulting from the habit of the defendant to permit them, without objection or warning, to do so at will, for purposes of curiosity or pleasure?"

The majority opinion in the present case says that the turntable cases have been disapproved in New York and in a few of the other states. This is true, but this court, on the other hand, affirmed Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, the original turntable case, by a unanimous judgment in Arnold v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 115 Pa. 135, 2 Am. St. Rep. 542, 8 Atl. 213, and in that case it is said that the doctrine of the turntable cases was approved in Pennsylvania Co. v. Toomey, 91 Pa. 256; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Lewis, 79 Pa. 33; Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332; Philadelphia & R. Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. 375. 84 Am. Dec. 457; and Biddle v. Hestonville. M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 112 Pa. 551, 4 Atl. 485. Shall we now eliminate the principle from our own jurisprudence, overrule all our own cases, and follow the cases of three or four other states which we have expressly repudiated, and which, as seen in 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 73, have been condemned in England and are directly opposed to the current of American cases?

Neither space nor time will permit me to refer to the numerous cases decided in the courts of last resort in the various states of the Union, which sustain the doctrine enunciated in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr and in the turntable cases. We will, however, refer to and quote from some text-books, which, without exception, support the principles of the turntable cases. The principle underlying these cases is well stated in Ray's Negligence of Imposed Duties, Personal, p. 33: "If an act you are contemplating, right in itself, will likely cause someone to expose himself to danger which he does not anticipate, it is your duty to take care that such exposure does not prove injurious to him. In determining the question whether the act will induce such exposure, it is your duty to consider the motives and impulses that induce action by others who are likely to be influenced by your act. If men may be misled in their judgment by your act, you must take measures to warn them or to avoid injuring them by proper care. If children, from their known childish instincts and curiosity, may be led into danger, such care is due them also." The same learned author also says (page 28): "The owner of any machine which he knows to be dangerous to children too young to know the danger, and of too immature judgment or discretion to control their natural instinct to amuse themselves with anything that may attract them as a plaything, and which he knows or ought to know may attract them, and who knows it is so placed that it does attract them to play with it,—is under a duty, as to such children, to exercise the degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person would use to prevent its injuring them. Whoever, therefore, does anything in or immediately adjacent to a public street, park, or locality where children may rightfully congregate, and are accustomed so to do, calculated to attract children into danger which they cannot appreciate, or are too untrained and inexperienced to resist, owes the imposed duty of protecting them against the temptation he places before them, by suitably guarding the source of danger; or, in case this cannot be done, by giving timely warning to their parents or guardians of the existence of the danger." In 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 5th ed. § 73, it is said: "It was held in some English cases that, if a child's own act directly brings the injury upon him, while the negligence of the defendant is only such as exposes the child to the possibility of injury, the latter cannot recover damages. But these decisions have been condemned in England, and are directly opposed to the current of American cases. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The law has been settled to the contrary. In America, by the famous series of turntable cases, in which railroad companies were held liable by the Federal Supreme Court, as well as by several state courts of last resort, for injuries suffered by little children, in consequence of their own acts in meddling with railroad turntables, which were left open to public access, unfastened and unguarded, although, of course, perfectly harmless if let alone." In a note to the section will be found a reference to the states whose courts have sustained the doctrine of the text. In volume 2 of the same work (§ 705) it is said: "The owner of land where children are allowed or accustomed to play, particularly if it is unfenced, must use ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition, for they, being without judgment, and likely to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger, are not to be classed with trespassers, idlers, and mere licensees." In the recent second edition of his exhaustive work on the Law of Negligence, Judge Thompson says (vol. 1, § 1024): "A well-grounded exception to the foregoing principles is that one who artificially brings or creates upon his own premises any dangerous thing which, from its nature, has a tendency to attract the childish instincts of children to play with it, is bound, as a mere matter of social duty, to take such reasonable precautions as the circumstances admit of, to the end that they be protected from injury while so playing with it, or coming in its vicinity. Things of this kind frequently pass under the designation of attractive nuisances." In § 1031, the learned author says: "In respect of the first of cases, that of attractive nuisances, it is to be observed that it would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon, baited with stinking meat, so that his neighbor's dog, attracted by his natural instincts, might run into it and be killed; and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it and tempted to intermeddle with it by instincts equally strong, might thereby be killed, or maimed for life." This extract is quoted and indorsed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619. The same principle is announced in other text-books: Wharton, Neg. 2d ed. §§ 112, 343, 824a; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 3d ed. § 204; Barrows, Neg. p. 69; Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 854.

It is unnecessary to discuss the doctrine of the turntable cases. It has been thoroughly discussed by both the English and the American courts, and for the purposes of this case nothing need be added to the reasoning of those cases. It does not deprive the landowner of the use of his premises, nor make him liable for their condition to one who enters without permission. All that it requires, and which humanity demands, is that he will not erect upon his premises a dangerous machine or structure, unguarded or unprotected, so near a public highway that children accustomed to frequent the highway will be allured or enticed into a danger which may result in their death. The doctrine now announced by the majority of this court will require the people in the densely populated parts of the city of Philadelphia to keep their children of tender age at all times in the house or in the charge of a nurse. The playground of such children must be in the house, and not upon the public places, even the parks of the cities of the commonwealth. They cannot be permitted to go to the parks for recreation or play without being subjected to the dangers of the traps and pitfalls which a reckless and heartless owner of property may erect or construct. With a small expenditure of money, turntables and other attractive playthings for children may be guarded, and children at play may be protected and get the recreation which they require. Under the evidence in this case, a few dollars would have restored the fence surrounding the turntable, and the children of that populous neighborhood would have been protected from the dangers of the place. I cannot agree that the thousands of people who live in the city shall be required to keep their children in their houses or employ nurses, most of them illy able to bear the expense, to protect their children, when such protection could be given by the owner of the premises with a small expenditure of money. It seems to me a sacrifice of humanity to the greed of commercialism.

The doctrine announced in the majority opinion is unquestionably a departure from the settled law of this commonwealth. It is substantially the doctrine of the dissenting opinion in Duffy v. Sable Iron Works, 210 Pa. 326, 59 Atl. 1100, filed less than three years ago. It is not in accord with our own cases or with those of the overwhelming majority of the other states. It is in conflict with the decisions of all the Federal courts of this country, and it is condemned by the courts of England.

For the reasons stated, I would affirm the judgment of the court below.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

ALABAMA WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ALABAMA EX REL. ALEXANDER M. GARBER, Attorney General.

(— Ala. —, 46 So. 468.)

Nuisance — action by state.

The state may maintain a bill to abate a nuisance in a city street.

(April 16, 1908.)

Case Note. — State as proper party to maintain a bill to abate or enjoin a public nuisance in a city street.

It will be observed that the question in the foregoing case, and the question indicated in the above title, is not whether the remedy by a bill in equity to enjoin or abate a nuisance has been supplanted by other remedies, but whether the right to maintain such a bill is vested in the municipality to the exclusion of the state. It is expressly declared in State v. Franklin, 133 Mo. App. 486, 113 S. W. 652, that, where the municipality fails to act, the state may, in the exercise of its visitatorial powers, through the arm of the attorney general or of the prosecuting attorney of the county wherein the nuisance is maintained, bring a suit in equity, or a proceeding under the statute, for its abatement. There are many cases, of which Augusta v. Reynolds, 122 Ga. 754, 69 L.R.A. 564, 106 Am. St. Rep. 147, 50 S. E. 998, Hunt v. Chicago Horse & Dummy R. Co. 121 Ill. 628, 13 N. E. 176, and State ex rel. Detienne v. Vandalia, 119 Mo. App. 406, 94 S. W. 1009, are types, which hold or assume that the attorney general or other law officer of the state may maintain a suit in equity to enjoin or abate a public nuisance in a city street; and there are also numerous cases cited in the note to Coast Co. v. Spring Lake, 51 L.R.A. 657, which discuss the right of a municipality to maintain a suit to enjoin or abate a public nuisance in a street; but seem to assume that the attorney general or other proper law officer of the state is at least a proper party to represent and vindicate the rights of the public by such a bill, assuming that the conditions are such that it may be maintained at all, although, as shown in the note just referred to, the courts have frequently upheld the right of a municipality to maintain such a bill, without, however, intimating that its right in this respect is exclusive.

In Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264, the court said: "The jurisdiction of a court of equity to abate an existing or prevent a threatened nuisance, upon information filed by the attorney general, is limited to those public APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the City Court of Birmingham overruling a motion to dismiss for want of equity a bill filed to abate a nuisance in a city street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Percy & Benners, for appellant:

The state is not the proper party to file a bill for the abatement of a public nuisance where such nuisance is in a public street in a city.

People v. Equity Gaslight Co. 141 N. Y. 232, 36 N. E. 194; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Atty. Gen. v. Sheffield Gas Consumers' Co. 3 De G. M. & G. 304; Atty. Gen. v. Hane, 50 Mich. 447, 15 N. W. 549; McCain v. State, 62 Ala. 138.

Messrs. Alexander M. Garber, Attorneys upon an information, and not upon the ground that the attorney general was not the proper party to maintain such a suit, assuming that the facts were sufficient to justify it.

It was held in People v. Law, 34 Barb. 494, 22 How. Pr. 109, however, that the people, in their character as the aggregate body of the public, could not maintain a suit to enjoin the construction of a railroad in a city street until compensation should be made; and further, that the people, in such character, were not the proper representatives of the property rights of the municipality, but that the municipal corporation must protect such interests.

In Morris & E. R. Co. v. Atty. Gen. 20 N. J. Eq. 530, it was held that the remedy by indictment for maintenance of a public nuisance in a street being so efficacious, courts of equity would entertain jurisdiction very reluctantly when their intervention was invoked at the instance of the attorney general or a private individual; and this doctrine was followed in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Gloucester City v. Brown, 24 N. J. Eq. 89. It will be observed, however, that these cases relate rather to the question whether a resort to a court of equity is the proper remedy, and not to the question who is the proper party to invoke that remedy.

While, as already stated, this note is not concerned with the question whether the remedy by a suit in equity by the law officer of the state, to enjoin or abate a nuisance, has been supplanted by legal remedies, it may be noted incidentally in this connection that the remedy given by statute to county commissioners for the obstruction of a state or county road has been held not exclusive of the right of the attorney general to maintain a suit for an injunction in the name of the state. State ex rel. Crosby v. Dayton & S. E. R. Co. 36 Ohio St. 434.

So, the penalty prescribed by statute for infringing the building line in an urban district is not exclusive of a suit for an injunction by the attorney general in behalf of the public. Atty. Gen. v. Wimbledon House Estate Co. [1904] 2 Ch. 34.

Of course, the many cases in which the state has been defeated upon the merits, or upon the ground that a suit in equity to abate or enjoin the nuisance was not the proper remedy, are not within the scope of this note.

nuisances which affect or endanger the public safety or convenience, and require immediate judicial interposition. . . . And the court will not interfere when the obstruction to the rights of the public is of such a character that it may with equal facility be removed by other constituted authorities and public officers. Atty. Gen. v. Bay State Brick Co. 115 Mass. 431, 438. There must be a want of adequate sufficient remedy, and the injury to public rights must be of a substantial character, and not a mere theoretical wrong." It was accordingly held in this case that the court would not entertain an information filed by the attorney general to restrain a railroad company from proceeding under an order of the board of aldermen of the city of Boston, authorizing it to lay tracks in a certain street, upon the ground that the construction of the tracks and the running of cars thereon would create a public nuisance. This, however, seems to be upon the ground that the municipality could apply the proper remedy through its control of the streets and its power to locate the tracks and regulate the running of cars thereon; and the case is therefore hardly authority for the proposition that the maintenance of a suit in equity to abate a nuisance in a city street, when that is the proper remedy, is the exclusive province of the municipality, and not of the state.

The same observation applies to People v. Equity Gaslight Co. 141 N. Y. 232, 36 N. E. 194, which quotes with approval the foregoing language from the Massachusetts case. In the New York case the court refused to entertain a suit in equity by the attorney general to restrain a gas company from opening the streets of the city of Brooklyn and laying gas pipes therein; remarking that the people had abundant remedy without coming into a court of equity, the state having delegated to various officials acting under the charter of Brooklyn ample power to protect and maintain the streets. The true character of the decisions in the Massachusetts and New York cases is further indicated by the fact that both cite, in support of their decisions, the case of Atty. Gen. v. Sheffield Gas Consumers' Co. 3 De G. M. & G. 304, in which the decision against the attorney general in a suit by information and bill for an injunction was clearly upon the ground that the disturbance of the pavement in a town by an unincorporated gas company was not such a nuisance as to justify an injunction either upon a bill or 19 L.R.A. Jur. 3d ed. § 479.

Messrs. Brown & Murphree also for appellee.

Dowdell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case is filed in the name of the state, on the relation of the attorney general. The purpose of the bill is to abate a public nuisance, namely, an obstruction of a certain public street in the city of Birmingham. The case was heard below on a motion to dismiss the bill for want of equity, upon the theory that the state is not the proper party to file a bill for the abatement of a public nuisance, where such nuisance is in a public street in a city, but that such duty devolves upon the municipal authorities. The court below overruled the motion to dismiss the bill, and from the decree overruling the motion this appeal is prosecuted.

The jurisdiction of a court of chancery to abate a nuisance is not denied by the respondent, appellant here; but it is conceded. It is contended, however, that the city alone has the right to maintain a bill to abate a public nuisance in its streets, and cases from other jurisdictions are cited in support of this contention. Whatever may be the decisions of courts of other jurisdictions, this court, we think, is committed to a different doctrine. A public street in a city is a public highway, and its uses belong to the public generally, and it cannot be said that such uses are limited to the municipality or to its citizenship alone. Nor is the authority and power of the municipality over its streets as to the abatement of nuisances exclusive. This was expressly held in the case of Hoole v. Atty. Gen. 22 Ala. 190. It may be that such authority might be by legislative grant conferred exclusively upon the municipality; but such is not the case here.

of Hoole v. Atty. Gen. supra, the question as to who was the proper party to maintain the bill was not decided. The question, nevertheless, was argued in brief of counsel, and the court held that the bill had equity, though the case was decided on its merits on the facts. The question here is on the equity of the bill, its averments being confessed. In this respect, we think the case of Hoole v. Atty. Gen. supra, is undoubtedly in point as an authority. There might be a case in which the municipality authorized the nuisance complained of, and in such a case it is hardly to be supposed that the municipal authorities would take action to abate the nuisance; and, if the doctrine contended for by appellant be upheld, the wrong to the general public would be without redress. There are a number of our cases that might be cited, persuasive of the view we have expressed, but we are contented to rely upon the case of Hoole & Paulin, supra, and the general doctrine of equity jurisdiction in cases of public nuisance, and the right of the state to take action for the suppression of the same.

The decree appealed from will be affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

F. W. BROMBERG, Appt.,

v.

EUGENOTTO CONSTRUCTION COMPANY et al., Respts.

(—Ala. —, 48 So. 60.)

Specific performance — personal contract.

1. Equity will not enforce performance of a contract to let a certain amount of floor space in a building to be constructed, which would require supervision of the method of construction to produce the requisite space.

Note. — As to specific performance of contracts requiring constant supervision, see case note to Lone Star Salt Co. v. Texas Short Line R. Co. 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828.

For a discussion of the principle invoked in the case reported, that where a court of equity has no jurisdiction to decree the equitable relief sought, and no other special equity intervenes, the bill cannot be retained for the purpose of awarding damages, see case note to Johnston & G. Bros. v. Bunn, ante, 1064. Such note, however, does not assume to include cases of the kind herewith reported, in which the question seems to be not so much one of the existence of jurisdiction to award pecuniary compensation, as of the propriety of its exercise.

Injunction — violation of completed contract.

2. Injunction will not lie to prevent violation of a contract to lease a certain floor space in a building to be constructed after the construction of the building is completed with a provision for less floor space than called for by the contract.

Mandatory injunction — alteration of building.

3. The court will not grant a mandatory injunction to compel the alteration of a completed building to make it comply with the terms of a contract executed before its construction, for the lease of a certain floor space therein.

Equity — specific performance — damages.

4. A bill for specific performance of a contract will not be retained for the assessment of damages where a case is not made for specific performance, and no other special equity is shown which will support jurisdiction of the court.

(December 17, 1908.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the City Court of Birmingham dismissing a bill brought to enforce the specific performance of a contract to lease a certain amount of floor space in a proposed building, a part of which complainant alleged he would be deprived of by the manner in which the building was being constructed. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Tillman, Grubb, Bradley, & Morrow for appellant.

Messrs. Campbell & Johnston, for respondents:

The performance of a contract to erect a certain kind of building will not be specifically enforced by courts of equity.

Madison Athletic Asso. v. Brittin, 60 N. J. Eq. 160, 46 Atl. 652; Wharton v. Stoutenburgh, 35 N. J. Eq. 277; Kendall v. Frey, 74 Wis. 26, 17 Am. St. Rep. 118, 42 N. W. 466; Beck v. Allison, 56 N. Y. 366, 15 Am. Rep. 430; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846; Kansas & E. R. Constr. Co. v. Topeka, S. & W. R. Co. 135 Mass. 34, 46 Am. Rep. 442; Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Ala. 509, 3 Am. St. Rep. 758, 3 So. 449; Bridgeport Land & Improv. Co. v. American Fire-proof Steel Car Co. 94 Ala. 592, 10 So. 704; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 93, 94.

Where the bill does not make out a case entitling complainant to a decree for specific performance, compensation for damages resulting from a breach of the contract will not be decreed.

Pl. & Pr. p. 482; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 237; Harrison v. Deramus, 33 Ala. 468.

Where specific performance is impossible, or where the complainant knew before bill filed that defendant had disabled himself to perform, then, in either case, the bill will not lie.

26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 86; Harrison v. Deramus, 33 Ala. 463; Hatch v. Cobb, 4 Johns. Ch. 559; Beeler v. Levy, 26 N. J. Eq. 333; Morss v. Elmendorf, 11 Paige. 277; Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 256; 4 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. 1410.

Dowdell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case is taken from a decree on the demurrer to the bill. The bill is to enforce the specific performance of a contract, and in the alternative, as it is urged in argument, to enjoin the violation of a contract. The contract is for the lease of a storeroom in a proposed building, and by the terms of said lease contract the lessee was to have a certain amount of floor space, of a part of which he complains in his bill he is being deprived of by the respondent, lessor, in the manner of construction of the said building. The question is whether a court of equity will entertain a bill for the enforcement of this contract.

In Madison Athletic Asso. v. Brittin, 60 N. J. Eq. 160, 46 Atl. 652, in speaking of the specific performance of building contracts, it was said by the New Jersey court: "The doctrine of the later cases is that the court will not ordinarily enforce specific performance of building contracts, not only on the ground that damages at law are generally an adequate remedy, but also on the ground of the inability of the court to see that the work is carried out." In Wharton v. Stoutenburgh, 35 N. J. Eq. 266, it was said: "There is a class of special and exceptional contracts in which courts of equity refuse to exercise jurisdiction by way of specific performance. These are contracts having such terms and provisions that the court could not carry into effect its decree without some personal supervision and oversight over the work to be done, extending over a considerable period of time, such as agreements to repair or build, to construct works, to build or carry on railways, mines, and the like." In Kendall v. Frey, 74 Wis. 26, 17 Am. St. Rep. 118, 42 N. W. 466, which was a suit to compel specific performance of a contract to erect a building on a certain lot, the court, adopting the rule above announced, denied relief. In Beck v. Allison, 56 N. Y. 366, 15 Am. Rep. 430, where the suit was for the specific performance of a contract in a lease on the part of the lessor to repair damages by fire, among other things, it was said by the court: "The idea that the court can appoint a receiver to take possession of the property and cause the work to be done with money furnished by the defendant would be, in the language of Lord Worthington, absurd." The relief sought was denied. In a case of our own (Bridgeport Land & Improv. Co. v. American Fireproof Steel Car Co. 94 Ala. 502, 10 So. 704), it was said: "We are of opinion that a bill for a specific performance would not lie under the facts as they appear in the present case. The consideration expressed is the 'erecting and operating of a car factory,' etc. To carry out this agreement requires the exercise of labor and special skill, judgment, and discretion; . . . and, furthermore, a court of chancery will not undertake to enforce a specific performance, 'when it involves the exercise of special skill, judgment, and discretion,'"—citing Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Ala. 498, 3 Am. St. Rep. 758, 3 So. 449, and Clark's Case, 1 Blackf. 122, 12 Am. Dec. 214.

It seems, both on reason and authority, that where the erection of the building requires the exercise of skill, judgment, and discretion, a court of equity will not assume jurisdiction for the enforcement of specific performance of a contract in such a case. There can be no doubt that the erection of the building, such as is referred to in the contract in this case, would require the exercise of "special skill, judgment, and discretion," and would extend over a considerable period of time. The erection of such a building would require the services of the architect, the skilled mechanic, and various workmen and superintendents. Necessarily the distribution and placing of the beams, vents, and air-shafts, component parts of such a building, and the very things of which the bill complains as diminishing the "floor space" contracted for in the lease, are involved in the exercise of the required special skill, judgment, and discretion in the construction of the building. Under the authorities cited above, and on the facts stated in the bill, we are clearly of the opinion that there cannot be an enforcement of specific performance of the contract in a court of equity.

It is insisted by counsel for appellant that, even though the appellant be not entitled to have the contract specifically performed by the decree of the court, yet, since his prayer for relief is in the alternative for relief by injunction, that he ought to be granted that relief. The prayer for injunction is in the alternative,—to restrain the defendant from violating its contract as to the "floor space" leased to complainant, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"or" commanding the respondent to perform its contract in this respect. It is insisted that the bill has equity for this purpose. The equity of the bill is to be determined on the facts stated in the bill, and not on the prayer for relief alone. It appears on the face of the bill that the thing complained of as constituting a violation of the contract, and asked to be enjoined, had already been done, and hence the violation was complete at the time of the filing of the bill. There is, therefore, no room for invoking the doctrine of the interposition of a court of equity to prohibit the violation of a contract. As to the alternative prayer for a mandatory injunction to compel the respondent "to so distribute the floor space on the ground floor of said building as to give your orator the amount to which he is entitled by the terms of said lease," for the same reasons, in a case like the present one, that a court of equity would decline to enforce a specific performance of the contract, it would refuse to interfere by mandatory injunction. Practically there can be no difference in the application of the two remedies—that of specific performance and mandatory injunction—under the facts in the case. The court, in either event, would be confronted with the proposition of the "special skill, discretion, and judgment" required in the erection of the building. Manifestly the relief sought by injunction would compel a removal of the "beams, vents, and air shafts" which have already been placed, and, for aught that appears, such a thing, if feasible, could not be accomplished without materially deranging the whole plan of structure of the building. We repeat that, under the facts in this case, the same principal is involved in the granting of relief by mandatory injunction as in the enforcement of a specific performance of the contract. The case of Hendricks v. Hughes, 117 Ala. 501, 23 So. 637, cited by counsel for appellant, is not in point. The facts of the present case clearly differentiate these two cases.

It is further insisted that the bill should be retained for the purpose of compensation in damages. The rule is stated as follows in 20 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 483: "The power to grant relief by way of compensation exists only as ancillary or incidental to the power to grant specific performance. It is only under special circumstances and upon peculiar equities, as, for instance in cases of fraud, or when a party has disabled himself by matters ex post facto from a specific performance, or when there is no adequate remedy at law, that the court awards pecuniary compensation in lieu of other relief. Where the court has no jurisdiction to decree specific performance, and no other special equity intervenes, the bill cannot be retained for the purpose of awarding damages." Sims v. McEwen, 27 Ala. 184; Harrison v. Deraamus, 33 Ala. 463; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 237.

The bill here must depend for its equity upon the doctrine of specific performance; and, as we have seen, under the facts stated, that principle cannot be applied. There is no other special equity shown by the facts that would justify a retention of the bill for the purpose of awarding damages. For this purpose the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law.

It follows, from what we have said, that the decree must be affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

LUDWIG A. D. GATHMAN

v.

CITY OF CHICAGO, Appt.

(236 Ill. 9, 86 N. E. 152.)

Pleading — variance.

1. There is no variance between a declaration charging a city for negligent injury by the act of its bridge tender, and evidence showing that the injury was caused by persons who, to the knowledge of the city, were employed by its appointee to do the actual work of operating the bridge.

Trial — fellow servants — jury.

2. Whether or not a city employee sent by an officer of one department of the government to take measurements of a bridge, and the persons tending the bridge, who are in another department of the government, and under the control of other officers, and whose duties do not bring them into habitual association with the former, are fellow servants, is a question for the jury.

Case Note. — Liability of municipality for negligence of bridge tender.

The following cases hold that a municipal corporation is not liable for the negligence of its bridge tender unless such liability is imposed by statute: Daly v. New Haven, 69 Conn. 644, 38 Atl. 397; Butterfield v. Boston, 148 Mass. 544, 2 L.R.A. 447, 20 N. E. 113; French v. Boston, 129 Mass. 592, 37 Am. Rep. 393.

And this doctrine of nonliability was applied in Corning v. Saginaw, 116 Mich. 74 40 L.R.A. 528, 74 N. W. 307, where a municipal corporation did not derive any benefit from a drawbridge which it maintained for the public good in its governmental and public character.

Servant — assumption of risk — raising bridge.

3. A servant sent to take measurements underneath a bridge, who, before going beneath it, has an understanding with the bridge tenders that the bridge shall not be raised without a signal from him, does not assume the risk of their negligent violation of that understanding.

Master — liability — employees of agent.

4. A municipal corporation is liable for the negligent operation of a bridge by persons employed with its knowledge by its duly-appointed bridge tender to do the actual work required in the operation of the bridge, although they are not in the actual employment of the city.

Municipal corporation — employee — injury — liability.

5. A municipal corporation is liable for injury through the negligent operation of a bridge maintained as part of its highway system to one sent to take measurements beneath it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Hand, J.:

This was an action on the case commenced by Ludwig A. D. Gathman against the city of Chicago and James O'Connor, in the circuit court of Cook county, to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been sustained by him while in the employ of the city of Chicago, through the negligence of the defendants. The plaintiff dismissed the case as to O'Connor, and thereafter there was a trial upon a declaration containing one count (to which the general issue was filed), which, in substance, porate as distinguished from its governmental duty prevails in Wisconsin, it was held in Naumburg v. Milwaukee, 77 C. C. A. 67, 146 Fed. 641, that a city is liable for the negligence of a bridge tender where, by statute, he was declared to be a city officer, and the duty of maintaining and attending the bridge was thereby imposed upon the city. However, a dictum is found in Stephani v. Manitowoc, 89 Wis. 467, 62 N. W. 176, to the effect that there is no liability unless created by statute.

So, the combined negligence of a bridge tender and one whom he has employed to assist him, although not a servant of the municipality, in driving a child from the open draw of a bridge, will render the city liable where the child received an injury. Chicago v. O'Malley, 196 Ill. 197, 63 N. E. 652.

charged that on January 10, 1901, the defendant the city of Chicago owned, controlled, and operated a certain bridge, known as the "Van Buren street bridge," in said city, and employed the defendant James O'Connor as a bridge tender thereon, and to have charge of the machinery and attachments of said bridge for the operation thereof, and to raise and lower the same; that on said day the plaintiff was also employed by the said defendant the city of Chicago as a machinist, and was by said defendant ordered to make certain measurements, and to perform certain work, on the said Van Buren street bridge, and beneath and about the same; and while he was in the performance of said work, and at work beneath the bridge, the said defendants carelessly and negligently set the machinery of said bridge in motion, and that, while the plaintiff was exercising reasonable care for his own safety, because of the negligence of the defendants, he was caught between two heavy pieces of iron, and was greatly and permanently injured. At the first trial the jury returned a verdict, under the direction of the court, against the plaintiff, upon which the court rendered judgment in favor of the city, which judgment was reversed by the appellate court. 127 Ill. App. 150. Upon the second trial the plaintiff recovered a verdict for the sum of $5,000, upon which judgment was rendered against the city, which judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court for the first district, and a further appeal has been prosecuted to this court.

The appellate court, in its last opinion, made the following statement of facts, which we find, from an examination of the record, to be substantially correct: "Appellee, at the time of his injury, had been in the employ of the city for a number of years in the bridge department; a subordinate department of the department of public works of the city. A Mr. Willman had immediate charge of the bridge department, under Patrick White, the superintendent of bridges, and had authority to give directions to appellee. January 10, 1901, Mr. Willman directed the appellee to go to the Van Buren street bridge, and take a measurement of the stroke of the arm of the heel lock when the bridge was stationary, and then the bridge tender would raise the bridge for him to take another measurement, so as to get the full stroke of the arm. The evidence tends to prove that, in order to ascertain the full stroke of the arm, it was necessary to take one measurement when the bridge was stationary and another when it was raised. Van Buren street lies east and west, and the bridge in question is across the Chicago river on the line of Van Buren street, and connects the part of the street east of the river with the part west of it, so that when it is closed it is a part of the street. The bridge is a rolling lift bridge, and is operated by machinery moved by electrical power. The machinery which operates the east part of the bridge is under the street on the east side, and that operating the west part under the street on the west side. The parts of the bridge each side of the center are operated separately by separate machinery, and each part requires a man to operate it, so that the operation of the bridge requires at least two men. There is a shanty at the southeast corner, and another at the northwest corner, of the bridge, in which are situated the appliances to turn on and regulate the power which moves the bridge machinery. When either part of the bridge is raised, the end next the approach to the bridge goes up. To take measurements as directed, it was necessary for the appellee to go beneath the part of the bridge which lay east of the center when the bridge was closed or stationary. James O'Connor was the bridge tender at the time

And it was held in Chicago v. Mullen, 54 C. C. A. 94, 116 Fed. 292, and in Lehigh Valley Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 237 Ill. 581. 86 N. E. 1093, that a municipality is liable for the negligence of a bridge tender in operating the draw of a bridge over navigable water so as to inflict an injury upon a passing vessel, as, in operating a bridge, it acts in its private, instead of its governmental or public, capacity. To the contrary, however, see Corning v. Saginaw, supra.

And the doctrine just stated was applied in Weisenberg v. Winneconne, 56 Wis. 667, 14 N. W. 871, where, by statute, a municipality was charged with the duty of maintaining a bridge, keeping it repaired "and attended," and the negligence of the bridge tender in operating the draw resulted in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the death of one upon a boat which attempted to pass through it.

So, a municipality will be liable for injuries sustained by a vessel in passing through a drawbridge as the result of the negligence of the bridge tender, where, by statute, the bridge is declared a public highway, and the control thereof vested in the department of parks. Edgerton v. New York, 27 Fed. 233.

Attention may be called to the case of Woodhull v. New York, 150 N. Y. 450, 44 N. E. 1038, reversing 76 Hun, 390, 28 N. Y. Supp. 120, where it was held that a city was not responsible for a false arrest made by a bridge policeman, appointed pursuant to statute, in the discharge of his public duty, even assuming that it would have been liable had he acted merely as a servant or agent of the municipality.

of the accident, having been regularly appointed as such by the mayor of the city, with the concurrence of the city council. The actual work of operating the bridge was done by James O'Brien, who operated the part of it east of the center, and by James McDonald, who operated that part of it west of the center. These men were not employed or paid by the city, but were hired and paid by James O'Connor, the bridge tender. Patrick White, superintendent of bridges, testified that he 'had authority, if he saw a man operating a bridge improperly, to discharge him, or make him leave that work; that it made no difference who he was, if he was doing something wrong, he could discharge him immediately.' Appellee testified that after he was directed by Willman, as above stated, he went to the bridge, and into the bridge house on the east side, and told O'Brien that he was sent there to take a measurement; that he would take one measurement first, and then would signal him (O'Brien) that he had taken that measurement, and for him to lift the bridge, and then he would take the other, and when through would signal him to lower the bridge; and O'Brien said, 'it was all right.' The appellee further testified that after the conversation above mentioned, and four or five minutes before he went beneath the bridge, he went to the west side of the bridge, and talked with McDonald, and then went back to the east side and repeated to O'Brien what he had said to him before. McDonald, who operated the west side of the bridge, testified that plaintiff came to him about 10 o'clock, and said he wanted to take some measurements, and would want the bridge raised, and witness told him to notify the operator on the other side, and plaintiff said he would do so, and give that operator the signal when he was ready; and the arrangement was that plaintiff and his helper, James Burke, were to notify the operator on the east side of the bridge when they were ready to have that side raised, and that four or five minutes after plaintiff went underneath the bridge, witness was signaled from the east side to raise the bridge; that it was necessary for witness to raise his part of the bridge 5 feet to unlock the bridge, so as to allow the east half to be raised. It appears from the evidence that James J. Kennedy, a common laborer, who had been employed occasionally by McDonald and O'Brien to assist them, and paid by whichever of them employed him, was on the bridge at the time in question. He testified that he was in the shanty at the east end of the bridge when the plaintiff was on his way below, and that O'Brien, who was shoveling snow at the time, told witness to get ready to make a lift,—to go ahead and make the lift, as plaintiff wanted to make some measurements,—and witness signaled to McDonald, who signaled back that he was ready, and rang the bell to clear the bridge, and started to raise his end when the west side went up several feet; that witness turned on the current, and started to raise the east end, when he heard a voice, 'Stop! for God's sake, stop!' and witness shut off the current. He also testified that before he made the lift he received no signal from below. While plaintiff was underneath the floor of the bridge, with James Burke, his helper, and engaged in making the first measurement of the arm of the heel lock, the power was turned on, the machinery set in motion, and the east half of the bridge raised without any signal from either him or Burke. The consequence was that appellee was caught and crushed between the moving arm of the heel lock and an iron column, and was seriously, and, as the evidence tends to prove, permanently, injured."

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is first contended that there was a fatal variance between the declaration and the proof in this: That the declaration charged that O'Connor was the employee of the city, responsible for the accident which caused the injury of appellee, while the evidence showed that O'Connor was not present at the time of the accident, but that the actual work in raising the bridge at the time appellee was injured was performed by James O'Brien and James McDonald, who were in the employ of O'Connor, and not in the employ of the city. There are two satisfactory answers to this position of the city: First, by the dismissal as to O'Connor, he was eliminated from the case, and the declaration thereafter, without amendment, charged the city with the negligent acts which caused the injury to the appellee; and secondly, the proof sustained the averment of the declaration that it was the negligent act of O'Connor which caused the injury. The evidence showed that O'Connor, a saloonkeeper, was regularly appointed by the mayor of the city of Chicago bridge tender of the Van Buren street bridge; that he did not tend the bridge personally, but employed O'Brien and McDonald to do the work for him, and that James J. Kennedy, under the direction of O'Brien, set the machinery in motion on the occasion when the appellee was injured. The city knew that O'Brien and McDonald were in the employ of O'Connor, and were in actual control of the bridge. O'Brien and McDonald, therefore, as to the city, stood in the place of O'Connor, and the negligence of O'Brien in directing Kennedy to raise the bridge at the time of the injury was the negligence of O'Connor, and proof that the negligent order to raise the bridge was given by O'Brien sustained the averment of the declaration that it was the negligence of O'Connor which caused the accident.

It is next contended that O'Connor, O'Brien, McDonald, and Kennedy were the fellow servants of the appellee, and that appellee cannot recover for the negligence of O'Connor, or persons in his employ, in handling said bridge. The question whether the servants of a common master are fellow servants is usually a question of fact, and never becomes a question of law, unless the facts proven show such relation so clearly to exist that all reasonable minds will readily agree that such is the relation of the servants of the common master to each other. Duffy v. Kivilin, 195 Ill. 630, 63 N. E. 503; Spring Valley Coal Co. v. Patting, 210 Ill. 342, 71 N. E. 371; Missouri Malleable Iron Co. v. Dillon, 206 Ill. 145, 69 N. E. 12. Here the injured servant was performing service in one department of the city government, and was sent by his superior officer to the bridge to make certain measurements, while the servants of the city causing the injury performed service in another department of the city government, and were under the control of other superior officers, and the servants of the city handling the bridge had nothing to do with making the measurements which appellee had been directed to make; their duties being to care for and handle the bridge. The appellee and the servants of the city who caused the injury were not, therefore, at the time of the injury, co-operating with each other in the particular business of making said measurements or of raising said bridge, but, at the time the appellee was injured, he was engaged in one employment,—i. e., in making measurements,—while the other servants of the city who caused his injury were engaged in doing an entirely other thing,—i. e., raising the bridge. The appellee and said servants were not therefore necessarily co-operating together at the time appellee was injured. Neither did the line of the employment, or the usual duties of the appellee and the servants of the city who operated the bridge, necessarily bring the appellee and said servants into habitual association, so that they might exercise a mutual influence upon each other promotive of the caution which would protect each other from an injury which might result from the negligence of each other. In Chicago & A.

R. Co. v. Hoyt, 122 Ill. 369, 12 N. E. 225, on page 374, it was said: "It was said by this court in North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 57, 29 N. E. 186, that the servants of the same master, to be coemployees, so as to exempt the master, from liability on account of injuries sustained by one resulting from the negligence of the other, shall be directly co-operating with each other in a particular business,—i. e., the same line of employment,—or that their usual duties shall bring them into habitual association, so that they may exercise a mutual influence upon each other promotive of proper caution." We therefore think it clear the court properly submitted the question whether the appellee and the servants of the city who controlled the bridge at the time he was injured were fellow servants to the jury as a question of fact.

It is also urged that the appellee assumed the risk of being injured by the negligence of the bridge tenders in prematurely raising the bridge while he was beneath the bridge, making the measurements which he had been sent to the bridge to make. The general rule is a servant only assumes the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed. In this case, before going beneath the bridge, he had an understanding with the servants of the city in charge of the bridge that they would not raise the bridge until he signaled them so to do, and the injury which he subsequently sustained was caused by reason of the fact that said servants violated that understanding, and raised the bridge before the appellee had signaled them so to do, and without notice to the appellee that they were about to raise the bridge. Clearly, the negligence of the servants of the city in charge of the bridge in raising the bridge, after they had agreed not to raise it until they had been signaled to raise the same by the appellee, was not a risk which the appellee assumed by virtue of his contract of employment with the city. In Illinois Third Vein Coal Co. v. Cioni, 215 Ill. 583, 74 N. E. 761, on page 590, it was said: "When a servant enters the employment of the master, the ordinary risks of such employment which he assumes include the negligence of fellow servants associated with him. But he does not assume the risk of the negligence of employees of the same master who are not fellow servants with him." And in Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. White, 209 Ill. 124, 70 N. E. 588, on page 132, it was said: "A servant, however, does not assume the risk of a negligent manner of doing the work by other servants who are not his fellow servants, unless it is customary to do the work in that manner. The risk of such an act is not one of the usual or ordinary hazards of the employment."

It is also urged that the court erred in instructing the jury that the city was responsible for the negligent acts of the men in charge of the bridge in raising the same without being signaled so to do by appellee, as it is contended O'Brien, McDonald, and Kennedy were not the servants of the city. O'Connor was the regularly appointed representative of the city, and in charge of the Van Buren street bridge, and the city was responsible for his negligent acts, done in the line of his duty. With the knowledge and consent of the city, O'Connor did not personally perform the duties imposed upon him, but the city permitted such duties to be performed by persons employed by O'Connor. When the city permitted O'Connor to employ men to operate the bridge, and the persons employed by him did operate the bridge with the knowledge and the consent of the city, we think it clear the city became liable for the negligent acts of such employees to the same extent that it was liable for the negligent acts of O'Connor, and that it cannot escape liability by reason of the fact that the men in active control of the bridge were paid by O'Connor instead of by the city. Suppose the persons employed by O'Connor operated the bridge in a negligent manner, and, in consequence of such negligence, a person crossing the bridge had been injured. It clearly would not have been a defense to an action brought by such person that the persons in charge of and operating the bridge, with the knowledge and consent of the city, were paid by O'Connor instead of by the city. Our conclusion is that the city was responsible for the negligent acts of the persons in charge of said bridge, and that the court did not err in so instructing the jury.

Other instructions given on behalf of the appellee have been criticized. We think, however, the jury were instructed substantially in accordance with the law.

It is finally contended that the city is not liable to the appellee for the injury which he sustained. The bridge forms a part of one of the public streets of the city, and while it is not stationary, like the street of which, when closed, it forms a part, it is as much under the control of the city as the street; and, if the servants of the city, in raising or lowering the bridge, injured a person rightfully crossing the bridge, or a person upon a boat beneath the bridge, the city would clearly be liable for such injury; and we are unable to see why the city should not be held liable to the appellee, who was lawfully upon the bridge at the time he was injured, for the negligence of the persons who were operating the bridge with the knowledge and consent of the city.

Finding no reversible error in this record, the judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

WATERLOO, CEDAR FALLS, & NORTH-ERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(138 Iowa, 369, 116 N. W. 144.)

Case Note. — Right to show parol warranty in connection with a contract of sale of personalty.

It is not intended in this note to include cases involving fraudulent representations or fraudulent warranties, or cases involving fraud or mistake in omitting a warranty in a written contract of sale. Neither will cases be included which involve warranties as to property other than chattels. Cases of implied warranties are also excluded.

Evidence of an oral warranty relating to an article which is the subject-matter of a written contract of sale is generally held inadmissible.

Some jurisdictions, however, recognize exceptions to this general doctrine. Thus, it has been held that even though a contract of sale is in writing, and contains specific warranties, yet evidence of a parol warranty relating to a matter as to which the written warranties are wholly silent is competent.

This exception to the rule prevails in England, and the doctrine of a majority of the American decisions on the subject is there modified to this extent, although the earlier decisions of that country applied the doctrine of exclusion of oral warranty as strictly as do a majority of the jurisdictions of this country. Such cases, however, have been expressly disapproved by the later cases on the subject. The doctrine was first modified in that country in passing upon the admissibility of evidence to show other agreements made contemporaneously with a written contract, which induced the contract, but which were not incorporated therein. Such oral agreements were held to be collateral to the written contract, and therefore evidence of the same was held admissible. Among such cases are: Morgan v. Griffith, 23 L. T. N. S. 783; Ersine v. Ardeane, 29 L. T. N. S. 234; and Angell v. Duke, L. R. 10 Q. B. 174.

(May 6, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Blackhawk County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain electrical apparatus. Affirmed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Action to recover the balance of the purchase price of certain storage batteries and ing that evidence of a parol warranty of an article sold by written contract was inadmissible were disapproved, and the doctrine was enunciated that where a contract of sale contained no warranty as to the matters in reference to which it was claimed that a parol warranty had been made at the time of the execution of the contract, and which had not been incorporated therein, evidence of such warranty was competent. In this case the parol warranty sought to be proved related to a water power and appurtenances, which was the subject-matter of the contract of sale. The oral warranties were in effect as follows:

(a) That water power to a given extent could and would, at a stated price, be developed within a reasonable time and at a specified maximum expense at a certain place without the utilization of any other falls. (b) As to the quantity of pulpwood conveyed. (bl) As to the cost of cutting and delivering at the mill logs for making pulp. (c) As to the condition of the property and suitability for the purpose intended. (d) As to the time when the buildings and works could be completed. (e) As to the amount of pulpwood which would be at the mill at a given time to enable the purchaser to operate the mill. (f) That there was no contract or agreement which interfered with the rights of the claimants (purchasers) in respect to the property in question, or restricted their use or enjoyment thereof.

In reaching its conclusion, after having considered the cases already mentioned, the court said that these authorities were binding upon it, and that they could no longer act on the principle laid down in Kain v. Old, 2 Barn. & C. 627, wherein evidence tending to prove a verbal warranty that a ship conveyed by written contract was copper-bolted was held incompetent. As to warranties b 1, c, d, and e, Bruce, J., said: "On the authority of the cases I have mentioned, I think evidence, as I have already said, may be given to prove a verbal war-

Whether a written instrument does purport to be a complete and final repository of the agreement, so as to exclude parol testimony, is a question of law for the court, to be determined upon an inspection of the instrument.

collateral agreement of warranty constituting no part of the contract of sale, properly speaking. The warranty in this case was given at the time the order was executed, and was to the effect that the machine contracted for would be capable of doing certain work in a good, workmanlike, efficient, and satisfactory manner.

The doctrine of the Chapin Case was also recognized in Eighmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288, wherein it was held that writings for the exchange of property for oil wells and improvements relating thereto, which, taken together, covered both sides of an entire contract and were designed to signify and to execute its terms, and were adequate for that purpose, although containing no warranty, could not be varied or affected by evidence of a contemporaneous parol warranty to the effect that the oil wells which were covered by the lease would yield a certain number of barrels of oil per day, and that the machinery, etc., used in connection with the wells, was new and of improved pattern, and that the debts of the concern did not exceed a given amount. In reaching this conclusion the court distinguished this case from the Chapin Case. Referring to that case, the court said: "That case did sustain a parol warrant in the face of a written agreement of sale: but that warranty was not as to the then present quality or condition of the thing sold, but as to what it would accomplish in the future, after the completed and executed sale, the terms of which it did not seek to touch or modify." After quoting that portion of the opinion of that case which is quoted herein, the court continued: "The guaranty sustained, it is thus apparent, was founded upon a future contingency which assumed the completed contract as executed, and to remain unchanged. Indeed, the agreement was, in the specified emergency, to take the machines back. If the case be near the border line in the application of the exception to the facts, there can be no question as to the soundness of the doctrine asserted."

Waterbury v. Russell, 8 Baxt. 159, also holds that a memorandum of the terms of a contract which is reduced to writing, and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Decmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant owns and operates a system of electric street railway in the cities which contains no warranty, may nevertheless be enlarged or added to by proof of an oral warranty as to the quality of corn conveyed in such contract. This decision follows as authority Hogg & Belcher v. Cardwell, 4 Sneed, 157, wherein it was held that a contract in writing for the trade of tobacco, which contained no warranty clause, could be added to or enlarged by evidence of an oral warranty as to the quality of the tobacco. The court treated the representations as to the quality of the tobacco as made to influence the contract, and said that if in fact they had that effect, it was equivalent to a warranty.

So where a written order for roofing material contained no warranty, but did not in terms exclude a warranty, it was held, in Florence Wagon Works v. Trinidad Asphalt Mfg. Co. 145 Ala. 677, 40 So. 49, that the purchaser could show a contemporaneous oral warranty of the roofing against defects for a designated period of time, and could set off damages for the breach of such warranty in an action against it for the purchase price.

Merriam v. Field, 24 Wis. 640, seems also to recognize the doctrine that where no express warranties are contained in a written contract of sale, evidence of parol warranty is competent; and it apparently limits this exception to the general rule to such a case. On this point the court said: "The plaintiff offered to show a warranty, by showing that the vendor represented the lumber to be merchantable at the time of the sale. But this was excluded, upon the ground that it was an attempt to add to the terms of the written contract by parol. This ruling was correct. The plaintiff relied on a class of cases holding that, although a bill of sale or other conveyance had been executed in writing, still, where such paper did not profess or attempt to express the entire agreement between the parties, but was merely executed in part performance of it, the whole agreement might be shown, although part of it rested in parol. But the difficulty in applying that rule here is, that the written bill of sale does contain express warranties in respect to one or two particulars. And where that of Waterloo and Cedar Falls, an interurban line between said cities, and also an electric line to Denver Junction, in Bremer county. Defendant's power house is located in Waterloo. It has a rotary transformer for its Denver line at the station of Glasgow. It had a storage battery in Cedar Falls for several years prior to the time involved in this case. As the business of the defendant increased, it became necessary to increase its power in Cedar Falls. It had secured the business of delivering coal to the State Normal School, which is located on the outskirts of Cedar Falls, on a hill. It did not have sufficient power to move the coal to the Normal during the day without interrupting its other traffic, and was compelled to haul the coal at night. The matter was taken up by Mr. Cass, president of the defendant, with the plaintiff at its office in Chicago, and the object which the defendant desired, to wit, sufficient power with which to haul defendant's coal cars to the Normal School, was stated. In November Mr. Osthoff, plaintiff's engineer, who had charge of such matters, came to Waterloo, and made a personal examination of defendant's plant, lines, and equipment, with a view of working out a plan which would produce the results required by the defendant. In February of the year 1903, after Osthoff had been at Waterloo, and returned to the plaintiff's place of business, plaintiff wrote defendant a plan for bringing about the results desired, and making a proposition is the case, it can no longer be said that the writing does not attempt to express the contract of the parties, so far as express warranties are concerned. The presumption then is, that it expresses the whole contract, as to such warranties; and to allow others to be shown by proving verbal statements at the time of the sale would be in violation of the old and salutary rule against varying and adding to written contracts by parol evidence."

The doctrine was enunciated in Tufts v. Verkuyl, 124 Mich. 242, 82 N. W. 891, that where there is an implied warranty that an article is suitable for the purpose for which it was bought, evidence of a verbal warranty, similar to that which would be implied by the contract itself, does not change the terms of a written instrument, and is therefore admissible. It was applied as to the purchase of a soda fountain, the court saying that there was an implied warranty that the fountain was suitable for the purpose for which it was bought, although the written order for it contained no such warranty; and that because the law would imply such a warranty, proof of an oral warranty to the same effect was admissible.

To the same effect is Little v. G. E. Van Syckle & Co. 115 Mich. 480, 73 N. W. 554 (contract for sale of a piano).

But in Ehrsam v. Brown, 64 Kan. 466, 67 Pac. 867, where neither a written order for the purchase of certain gyrators for use in a flour mill, nor the letter of acceptance, contained words of warranty of any kind, the order and letter were held to constitute such a contract in writing as to preclude the purchaser, in an action against him for the purchase price, from showing by parol evidence the existence and terms of an express warranty, independent of such writings, to the effect that such gyrators would be constructed of good material and of first-class workmanship, and would be supplied with necessary and suitable fixtures, and would in all respects be suited for the work intended. It was, however, said that if the defendant had based his right to affirmative relief upon the existence of an implied warranty substantially to the effect of the claimed parol express warranty, and had the trial court submitted this theory of the case to the jury, the argument that the law would imply a warranty as to the suitability of the article for the purpose intended might be applicable, but would not be applicable, where the right to relief was based upon such a warranty as an express warranty.

Where written contract contained no warranty.

As stated, the majority of the decisions in this country on the subject do not recognize any exceptions to the general rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument apparently complete on its face. These cases may therefore be said to be opposed to the doctrine of the foregoing cases, wherein certain exceptions to this general rule have been either recognized or applied. The failure, however, in many instances, to consider the question from the standpoint of the cases already considered detracts considerably from their value as opposing authority. The nature of the question presented also tends greatly to diminish or enhance the value of the case as opposing those considered, even though no distinction is made, but the general doctrine of exclusion is applied without reference to the particular facts presented. Perhaps as clear-cut a denial of the existence of any exceptions to the general doctrine stated as can be found is contained in the cases cited in this subdivision, wherein the general rule of exclusion was applied although the written contract contained no warranties at all and it was sought to show a parol warranty.

The doctrine of the cases already discussed, which admit exceptions to the general rule excluding evidence of parol warranties where there is a written contract seems to have been considered and denied in Wheaton Roller-Mill Co. v. John T. Noye Mfg. Co. 60 Minn. 156, 68 N. W. 854, holding that a written contract for the sale of machinery, formal and complete in its character, and specifying with minute detail the particular make, name, size, and power of which it was hoped would be satisfactory. This proposition was in writing, and reads as follows:

Chicago Office, Marquette Building, February 19, 1903.

Waterloo & Cedar Falls Rapid Transit Company.

Waterloo, Iowa.

Gentlemen:—

We propose to furnish and install two couples, consisting of two positive and two negative type F plates in each of your present 215 F-13 glass jars, in your plant at Cedar Falls, Iowa, for the sum of $4,000. This quotation includes the cleaning of the present battery by us, and also new acid for the present battery. We have assumed that there will be sufficient room to install the additional cells. All additional racks and wire or cable connections between the old and the new cells, and any changes in the present wiring which may be necessary to be furnished and done by you. All material to be first-class and of our latest type, and all work to be done in a first-class workmanlike manner and satisfactory to your company. Two thousand ($2,000) dollars or fifty per cent (50 per cent) to be paid us upon delivery of the material, and two thousand ($2,000) dollars or the remaining fifty per cent (50 per cent) when the material is installed.

Respectfully submitted by the Electric Storage Battery Company, by Otto E. Osthoff, Engr. Chicago Office.

Accepted. The Waterloo & Cedar Falls Rapid Transit Company,

by L. S. Cass, President.

Routing of shipment to be supplied by Waterloo & Cedar Falls Rapid Transit Company.

Osthoff, plaintiff's engineer, followed this to Waterloo; and it is claimed that, before the proposition was accepted, the parties the engine and boiler, and the appurtenances to be furnished, but which contained no warranty, could not be added to by proof of an oral warranty that the machinery would be capable of operating the plaintiff's mill at its full capacity, although it was claimed that the warranty was made in connection with, and at the same time as, the written contract. In reaching this conclusion, and in answering the contention that evidence of a parol warranty did not fall within the rule of exclusion, as the evidence thereof tended to prove a separate oral agreement as to a matter on which the writing was silent, and which was not inconsistent with its terms, the court said that the doctrine that, where an instrument was incomplete and did not contain the whole agreement, parol evidence of the omitted portion was admissible, did not go to the length of holding that this may be done by going outside the writing, and proving that there was a stipulation entered into, not contained in it, and hence that only part of the contract was put in writing; adding that if any such doctrine were to obtain, there would be very little left of the rule against varying written contracts by parol. And again: "If the written contract, construed in view of the circumstances in which, and the purpose for which, it was executed,—which evidence is always admissible to put the court in the position of the parties,—shows that it was not meant to contain the whole bargain between the parties, then parol evidence is admissible to prove a term upon which the writing is silent, and which is not inconsistent with what is written; but, if it shows that the writing was meant to contain the whole bargain between the parties, no parol evidence can be admitted to introduce a term which does not appear there. In short, the true rule is that the only criterion of the completeness of the written 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contract as a full expression of the agreement of the parties is the writing itself; but, in determining whether it is thus complete, it is to be construed, as in any other case, according to its subject-matter, and the circumstances under which and the purposes for which it was executed."

And in Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 374, 26 N. W. 1, it was held that a written agreement for the sale of logs, which contained nothing on its face to indicate that it was a mere informal and incomplete memorandum, must be conclusively presumed to contain the whole engagement of the parties, and the manner and extent of the undertaking. The court said that a warranty of quality was an item and term of such a contract, and not a separate and independent collateral agreement, and it could not, therefore, be added to the written agreement by oral testimony although the agreement contained no warranty.

The theory that a representation as to the manner in which a dry kiln would operate might amount to a collateral oral warranty, in the absence of any warranty in the written contract of sale, was considered by Judge Taft in Curran v. Hauser, 6 Ohio N. P. 281, who, after considering the cases on the subject, held that such representations, either oral or by way of a circular furnished the purchaser, were not collateral warranties, and could not be received in evidence as such.

The doctrine was enunciated in McClure v. Jeffrey, 8 Ind. 79, as to contracts conveying the right to sell certain patent improvements to force pumps, which consisted of certain deeds of the patent rights, and a note for the purchase price, that it would be presumed under such circumstances that all oral negotiations or stipulations between the parties, which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument, were merged in it, and it would be treated entered into an oral agreement, whereby the plaintiff undertook and agreed to make such changes and install such additions to the battery of the defendant then in use in Cedar Falls, in connection with other changes in defendant's equipment and additions thereto, as would enable the defendant to operate a freight train, consisting of a 23-ton locomotive and a 60-ton trailer loaded with coal to the Normal School at the same time defendant was operating its two 21-ton cars on other parts of its line, as well as its other traffic. Defendant further contends that plaintiff, through its agent, represented and guaranteed that, if defendant carried out the plan proposed, it would produce the results desired. Defendant contends that the real contract between the parties was oral, while plaintiff insists that its agreement is to be found in the proposition before referred to, which defendant accepted; that this embodies the entire agreement, and that parol evidence is not admissible to change or vary the same. Further, it argues that, even if there was a warranty which was not complied with, defendant retained and used the goods for such a length of time, without objection or complaint, as that it should be held to have waived any defects in the property sold. Reduced to its last analysis, defendant's claim is not that there were any defects in the specific items of property furnished, but that, as a whole, it did not produce the results which plaintiff's engineer promised it would. The exact statement which it is claimed plaintiff made is shown by the testimony of one of defendant's witnesses, as follows: "When Mr. Osthoff came to my office in February, after I had received the written proposition and recommendations, we made up the figures as to the cost of making the changes and improvements set out in Mr. Osthoff's letter of February 19th. The figures amounted to fully the cost of installation of a rotary transformer station, as the exclusive medium in ascertaining the agreement to which the parties bound themselves. Therefore, where the warranties sought to be proved were not contained in the written contract, parol evidence thereof was held inadmissible. It does not appear that the written contract contained any warranties at all.

The doctrine was also stated in McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Yoeman, 26 Ind. App. 415, 59 N. E. 1069, that where a written contract is made, oral warranties are merged in the written contract, and by its terms the parties must be bound. It was, however, not applied, as the case was disposed of on a question of pleading. The doctrine was also stated in Shirk v. Mitchell, 137 Ind. 185, 36 N. E. 850; and Rose v. Hurley, 39 Ind. 77; Smith v. Dallas, 35 Ind. 255; but the cases were disposed of on other grounds.

In Seitz v. Brewers' Refrigerating Mach. Co. 141 U. S. 510, 35 L. ed. 837, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46, evidence tending to show an independent collateral oral contract to the effect that a certain refrigerating machine—the subject-matter of the original contract, which was in writing—was capable of cooling certain rooms in a brewery, which had been examined by the seller prior to the execution of the contract, was held inadmissible. The contract itself contained no warranty clause. This case has often been cited as one of the leading cases on this question, and it is therefore interesting to note that it is based on a state of facts very different from that usually presented, and from that presented in the cases which have followed it as authority. From the statement of facts it appears that, subsequent to the execution of the contract in question, a correspondence was had between the parties or their agents, in which the purchaser expressed his dissatisfaction with the contract because a warranty similar to the alleged oral warranty was not incorporated therein, and the seller expressly refused to make such a warranty a part of the contract. Thereafter the purchaser, through his agent, wrote to the seller that he would like to have him commence at once to put up the machine. The court also said that, even if the evidence of the representations alleged to be a parol warrant were received, they would amount to no more than mere expressions of opinion.

So, where the contract for the sale of a boiler specifically described the boiler, and contained no warranty in reference thereto, it was held, in Fitch v. Woodruff & B. Iron Works, 29 Conn. 82, that evidence on the part of the purchaser that the seller warranted the boiler purchased to be as efficient as the purchaser's old boilers in operating his mill was inadmissible. It was further held that the rule that a written contract of purchase could not be varied, contradicted, or added to by parol proof was not affected by the fact that, during negotiations which resulted in the agreement, the purchaser informed the seller as to the amount of machinery the old boilers in his mill would operate, and that he wanted a new boiler which would operate as much machinery as the old one, and that the seller assured him that the boiler they were selling him would be as efficient in all respects as the old boilers, and consume at least one third less fuel.

And in Detroit Shipbuilding Co. v. Comstock, 144 Mich. 516, 108 N. W. 286, in an action on a note representing a part of the purchase-price of a steam boiler manufactured and sold by plaintiff to defendants under a written contract containing no warranty, evidence of parol representations made prior to the execution of the contract, and not contained therein, to the effect that the boiler would give greater steam power, pressure, and economy than the purchaser's and this fact was stated by me in the conversation. When Mr. Osthoff came in, I had the figures all prepared. We went over them, and I said to Mr. Osthoff: 'Now, Mr. Osthoff, this expenditure of money will install a rotary transformer station at Cedar Falls, and give us something that we absolutely know there is no question about doing our business. Now, if you know and will guarantee that this expenditure of money will produce the results that you know we must have, which you are thoroughly familiar with, we will buy this battery from you, and permit you to go ahead and install an electric battery; but, if you are not prepared to guarantee absolutely and positively that this will do the work, then we propose to throw out the battery and expend this money by putting in a rotary transformer.' Mr. Osthoff said: 'There is absolutely no question but that, with the expenditure of this money, you will have very much better results than you would obtain from a rotary transformer, and I have no hesitancy in guaranteeing to you that it will do so.' It was upon these alleged statements that it is claimed defendant placed the order. Plaintiff denies that Osthoff made any representations or guaranties, save that he proposed a plan and made recommendations for the equipment of the plant, so as to produce the desired results. Defendant claims that the plan did not produce the desired results, that plaintiff could not make it do so, even after repeated attempts, and that the scheme was an absolute failure; old boiler, was held inadmissible to aid the implication of a warranty.

A written order for machinery, which contains no warranties, cannot be added to by evidence of an oral warranty that the machine mentioned therein would be strong and sufficient for the purpose for which the purchaser intended it, as such a warranty is not necessary to complete the original contract, and, although contemporaneous therewith, is not collateral to it. Buckeye Mfg. Co. v. Woolley Foundry & Mach. Works, 26 Ind. App. 7, 58 N. E. 1069.

Conant v. National State Bank, 121 Ind. 323, 22 N. E. 250, held that where the provisions of a written contract were to the effect that the sellers were to furnish and put in operation machinery for a 100-barrel flour mill, and the machinery to be furnished was particularly described and designated, but there was no warranty, at least, none as to capacity, the purchaser could not add to the written contract an oral stipulation to the effect that the sellers were to furnish and place in operation machinery that would manufacture three designated grades of flour, and with the capacity of 100 barrels daily. It is not clear whether the language in the contract constituted a warranty. No distinction was made, however, as the court regarded it as unimportant whether the contract contained a warranty or not.

Where a contract for the sale of coal is in writing, and it contains nothing to indicate that a sample was used or referred to, parol evidence cannot be allowed to show a sale by sample. Neither is evidence admissible to show that the contract was for coal of the same kind and quality as the purchaser had previously bought of the seller. Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469, 26 Pac. 830.

Although the case was disposed of principally upon the theory that the rule of an implied warranty did not apply, it was also held in Davis Calyx Drill Co. v. Mallory, 69 L.R.A. 973, 69 C. C. A. 662, 137 Fed. 332, that evidence of oral contemporaneous statements that a drill sold by written contract would bore holes through specific strata in the earth, at a designated locality, was incompetent, although the contract contained no warranty. The court said that evidence of such an agreement was excluded by the fact that the contract was in writing, and by the rule that where the written contract of the parties is complete in itself, the conclusive presumption is that it embodies the entire engagement of the parties, and the manner and extent of their obligations, so that parol evidence of other terms is inadmissible to extend, modify, or contradict it.

In Lower v. Hickman, 80 Ark. 505, 97 S. W. 681, evidence of an oral warranty as to the capacity of a sawmill, the subject-matter of a written contract of sale, containing no warranty, was held to have been properly excluded.

A contract for the sale of machinery, which constitutes a perfect and complete contract for the sale of the property therein described, stating the consideration and acknowledging its payment, but which contains no terms relative to the condition, quality, or value of any articles enumerated, cannot be affected or added to by proof of an oral contemporaneous warranty as to the condition of the machinery. Chamberlain v. Van Campen, 7 N. Y. S. R. 99.

Neither can such a contract in writing for the sale of machinery, which contains no warranties, be changed by proof of a contemporaneous oral warranty as to the suitability of the machinery for the purpose intended. Hungerford Co. v. Rosenstein, 46 N. Y. S. R. 195, 19 N. Y. Supp. 471. To the same effect as to a written contract for the sale of adding registers is Lamson Consol. Store Service Co. v. Hartung, 46 N. Y. S. R. 191, 19 N. Y. Supp. 233. No warranty was contained in this contract, and the nature of the alleged oral warranty does not appear.

A contract in writing for the sale of machinery for a flour mill, which, so far as the opinion shows, contained no warranty, cannot be added to by evidence of a contemporaneous parol warranty as to how long it would take to put the machinery in place, and as to the quality of flour it would prothe contention here being that the equipment was too small, the booster and the feeders being inadequate in size from 75 to 100 per cent.

The first question in the case is the admissibility of the parol testimony to establish the warranty pleaded by defendant. Upon no subject known to the law of evidence has there been more difficulty than with what is known as the "parol evidence rule." The cases are not at all harmonious, and the decisions are often conflicting in the same jurisdiction. The difficulty is intensified when application of the rule is sought to be made to sales of personal property where there has been a written contract of sale. Plaintiff contends that the instrument of date February 19, 1903, heretofore set out, is a complete, unambiguous, and certain contract, and that to import therein such a warranty as defendant relies upon would be contrary to the parol evidence rule. This is the primary question in the case, and with that solved in plaintiff's favor, there is nothing further to consider. The rule, as stated by Mr. Mechem in his work on Sales, is as follows: "Where the parties have reduced to writing what appears to be a complete and certain agreement importing a legal obligation, it will, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the whole of the agreement between the parties, and parol evidence of prior, contemporaneous, or subsequent conversations, representations, or statements will not be duce. Kummer v. Dubuque Turbine & Roller Mills Co. 4 Neb. (Unof.) 347, 93 N. W. 938.

Evidence of an oral warranty as to the condition and value of two newspaper establishments sold by written contract of sale is not admissible in behalf of the defendant to the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage given for the purchase price, where the written contract was silent as to any provision of warranty. Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 Pac. 625.

In Mast v. Pearce & Cowan, 58 Iowa, 579, 43 Am. Rep. 125, 8 N. W. 632, 12 N. W. 597, evidence of an oral warranty that certain cultivators were well made, of a material adapted to the purposes for which they were constructed, in all respects sound and perfect, and of merchantable value and quality, was held to have been improperly received where the contract for the sale of the cultivators was in writing and contained no warranty.

An interesting case, wherein the doctrine of exclusion of an oral warranty was applied, is Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 Pac. 904. It was there held that a written contract for the sale of a quantity of beans, which contained no warranty, and was silent as to quality, nevertheless precluded evidence of a parol warranty that the beans would be of a quality similar to the sample shown upon the execution of the contract. The action was by the original owner of the beans against a subsequent purchaser from the original purchaser, the question involved being whether title had passed under the original contract, and this question depended upon whether or not the sale was by sample. If by sample, title had not passed, as it was conceded that the original purchaser, although he retained possession of the beans, refused to accept them under the contract, on the ground that they did not compare in quality with the samples. This claim was acquiesced in by the original owner, but, before he had removed the beans, the purchaser sold them to the defendant. By a majority of one, the court applied the doctrine of Harrison v. McCormick, supra, and Thompson v. Libby, 34 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Min. 374, 26 N. W. 1, and held that evidence that the sale was by sample was inadmissible.

Wiener v. Whipple, 53 Wis. 298, 40 Am. Rep. 775, 10 N. W. 433, holds it to be incompetent for the purchaser of barley by written contract, which contained no warranty, and did not show the sale to have been made by sample, to show by parol that the seller represented that the barley should be of the quality of a sample exhibited at the time of the contract.

Thompson v. Gortner, 73 Md. 474, 21 Atl. 371, also held that evidence of a verbal agreement for the sale of corn, in which the corn was warranted to be equal in quality to a sample, was incompetent to vary or contradict the terms of a written contract covering the same subject-matter, but containing no warranty.

Although a written contract for the sale of a quantity of apricots contained no warranty, it was held in Germain Fruit Co. v. I. K. Arnsby Co. 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319, that parol evidence was inadmissible to prove the existence of a warranty of quality. The court said that when, on the sale of personal property, a warranty was given, it was one of the terms of sale, and not a separate and independent contract; that to justify the admission of parol evidence on the ground that it is collateral, it must relate to a subject distinct from that to which the writing relates.

A contract in writing for the sale of a patent right to manufacture a certain type of sewing machine, which contained no representations or warranties of any kind, cannot be engrafted upon by evidence of a contemporaneous oral warranty that such machines would work so as not to drop stitches and that they would do the promiscuous sewing of a family. Galpin v. Atwater, 29 Conn. 93.

In Jolliffe v. Collins, 21 Mo. 338, where the written conveyance of a patent-right improvement to hay rakes contained no warranty, the purchaser was not permitted to set up a parol warranty. The court said that it would be presumed that the written instrument contained the entire contract.

received for the purpose of adding to or varying the written instrument. If, therefore, such a writing exists between the parties, and it contains no warranty at all, no warranty can be added by parol; if it contains a warranty of some kind or to some extent, parol evidence will not be admitted to extend, enlarge, or modify that which the writing specifies." Mechem, Sales, § 1254. Perhaps the leading case on this subject is Seitz v. Brewers' Refrigerating Mach. Co. 141 U. S. 510, 35 L. ed. 837, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46. This case is very closely in point, and is a strong authority in favor of appellee. In Mast v. Pearce, 58 Iowa, 579, 43 Am. Rep. 125, 8 N. W. 632, 12 N. W. 597, this question was before us, and during the course of the opinion the following language

The deed of a patent right, which contains no warranty, cannot be added to by proof of a contemporaneous oral warranty that the patent is a useful improvement. Van Ostrand v. Reed, 1 Wend. 424, 19 Am. Dec. 529.

A contract in writing for the sale of a patent right for a churn, which contains no warranty, excludes parol proof of an oral warranty to the effect that the churn, the subject-matter of the contract, is a valuable and useful invention, and is in great demand and fast coming in general use. Bond v. Clark, 35 Vt. 577.

Engelhorn v. Reitlinger, 23 Jones & S. 485, holds that proof of a verbal warranty by the seller of a quantity of quinine, to the effect that he would only sell quinine to the trade at a stipulated price, which warranty the purchaser claimed was the inducement to the contract of purchase, was incompetent, the contract being in writing and containing no warranty.

That a previous or contemporaneous warranty as to material and workmanship of snaths sold under a written contract of sale containing no warranty cannot be engrafted by parol evidence on such contract was also held in Frost v. Blanchard, 97 Mass. 155.

In Quinn v. Moss, 45 Neb. 614, 63 N. W. 931, in an action on a written contract of guaranty for the payment of an order in writing for a bill of cigars, which contained no warranty, evidence on the part of the defendant, tending to show that, at the time the cigars were purchased and the guaranty given, plaintiff agreed that the cigars should be union-made and union-labeled, was held to have been properly excluded.

Day Leather Co. v. Michigan Leather Co. 141 Mich. 533, 104 N. W. 797, also held that it was not error to exclude evidence of an express oral warranty as to the quality of a quantity of leather sold by a written contract, which contained no warranty clause.

Evidence of an oral warranty as to the quality of hides conveyed by written bill of sale containing no warranty was held to be inadmissible in Reed v. Wood, 9 Vt. 285. The court said that, in order that a warranty of the quality of property, made before a bill of sale thereof had been executed by the parties, should apply, it should have been inserted in the writing of the parties when executed.

Where a contract to redecorate a house and reupholster furniture has been reduced to writing in the shape of written propositions by the seller, and written acceptances by the purchaser, but which contains no warranty, it cannot be contradicted or varied by evidence of an oral warranty that the material to be furnished and the work to be performed will be satisfactory to the purchaser. Pitcairn v. Philip Hiss Co. 61 C. C. A. 657, 125 Fed. 110.

In Etheridge v. Palin, 72 N. C. 213, it was held that a written contract for the sale of a fishery, and seines, ropes, and other appurtenances thereto, which contained no warranty, could not be added to by proof of a contemporaneous oral warranty by the seller as to the quality and quantity of materials described in the contract, although, in the trial court, the jury found as a fact that the parties to the contract intended conditions of sale other than those included in the written contract.

McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Thompson, 46 Minn. 15, 48 N. W. 415, held that a written contract for the sale of a quantity of binding twine, which apparently embodied a complete expression of the agreement of the parties, but, so far as appears from the opinion, contained no warranty, would preclude evidence of a prior or contemporaneous oral warranty of quality.

A contract in writing for the sale of barrels, which contains no warranty as to coo- perage, cannot be added to by proof of an oral express warranty relating to the coo- perage. Graham v. Eiszner, 28 Ill. App. 269.

Where a contract for the sale of accounts contained no warranty as to their collectability, it was improper to add to its terms by proof of what the parties said as to the collectability of the accounts at the time of the execution of the contract. Robinson v. McNeill, 51 Ill. 225.

A bill of sale of a vessel, which contains is supposed to contain all the contract, and that it cannot be added to or varied by parol evidence. It will be understood that there is no fraud, accident, or mistake averred in the answer in this case, and that the written contract amounts to a contract of sale. It is not an instrument merely intended as a receipt or as an acknowledgment of the payment of the price or the like. It seems that, in such cases, parol evidence is not admissible to show a warranty. 1 Parsons, Contr. p. 589. We think the court should have excluded the evidence as to a parol warranty, and should have instructed the jury that the parties were bound by the terms of the written contract." See also Nichols v. Wyman, 71 Iowa, 160, 32 N. W.

258; Warbasse v. Card, 74 Iowa, 310, 37 N. W. 383.

A case very like the one now before us is Western Electric Co. v. Baerthel, 127 Iowa, 467, 103 N. W. 475, which seems to be the latest pronouncement of this court upon the subject. There, as here, there was a purchase of electrical apparatus, and a guaranty or warranty as to some of the items thereof. Defendant attempted to show a parol warranty to the effect that the plant would be sufficient to light the hotel and run the elevators therein, but, upon the authority of Mast's Case, supra, he was not permitted to do so. That case seems to be conclusive of the question now before us. None of the cases cited for appellant run counter to the views here expressed. Peter-no warranty, cannot be enlarged by proof of an oral warranty that the vessel was composition-fastened, complete for coppering. Mumford v. M'Pherson, 1 Johns. 414, 3 Am. Dec. 339. Considering this subject, the court said: "Admitting a parol warranty to have been fully proved, no action could have been maintained upon it. The contract between the parties was reduced to writing and contained in the bill of sale, and recourse must be had to that instrument to ascertain its extent."

A written memorandum for the sale of a vessel, which contains a statement of the fact that a sale had been made, a description of the thing sold, and the price and terms of the credit, is all that is necessary to make a complete contract of sale, and it would be violating the rule that no new terms may be added to a written contract by extraneous evidence to allow proof of an oral warranty that the vessel in question was built mostly of white-oak timber. Randall v. Rhodes, 1 Curt. C. C. 90, Fed. Cas. No. 11,556.

A promissory note for the purchase price of a mule, which contains no warranty as to soundness, cannot be added to by proof of an oral warranty of soundness. Fleming v. Satterfield, 4 Ga. App. 351, 61 S. E. 518.

Jackson v. Helmer, 73 App. Div. 134, 77 N. Y. Supp. 835, also held that where a contract for the sale of a colt was in writing, and it contained no language that amounted to a warranty, it must be assumed that none was intended; and therefore evidence of conversations which preceded the execution of the contract, and which tended to show a warranty, was incompetent.

Storer v. Taber, 83 Me. 387, 22 Atl. 256, also held that a bill of sale of a one-half interest in a Spanish jack, containing no warranties, could not have a warranty of soundness affixed thereto by parol. (But see Neal v. Flint, 88 Me. 72, 33 Atl. 769.)

In Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918, 45 S. E. 711, a note for the purchase price of a horse, which described the horse as a little thick-winded, was held not to amount to an express warranty of soundness, and that evidence of an oral warranty of soundness was inadmissible.

Based on the Louisiana Code, 2255, 2256, which in substance provided that the transfers of slaves should be in writing, and parol evidence should not be admitted against or beyond what was contained in the sale acts, or as to what might have been said before or at the time of making them, or afterwards, it was held in Goodloe v. Hart, 2 La. 447, that parol proof of an agreement made at the time of the execution of the bill of sale, to the effect that, if any of the slaves mentioned therein should run away, abscond, or prove sickly, the note in suit, which was given for a portion of the purchase price, should be void and of no effect, was incompetent, as there was no warranty to that effect in the bill of sale.

Milliken v. Andrews, 11 Rob. (La.) 241, also held that where the sale of a slave was evidenced by an act of sale, which contained no reference to certain qualities which the seller had declared the slave to possess, parol evidence of representations of such qualities was incompetent.

To the same effect as to a warranty of the soundness of a slave, where the bill of sale contained no warranty, is Hanger v. Evins, 38 Ark. 334.

Among some of the earlier English cases, wherein the same doctrine was applied as is applied in this country, is Powell v. Edmunds, 12 East, 6, wherein it was held that a contract in writing for the sale of standing timber sold at auction, and which contained no warranties, could not be enlarged by evidence of an oral warranty of quality, made by the auctioneer at the time of the sale.

Also in Schweir v. Thorns, 3 Fost. & F. 243, wherein, in an action on an oral warranty of sugar bags, to the effect that they were sugar bags, they having been sold in a lump, Martin, B., said that, as the result of the bargain was put into a sale note, the parties could not travel out of it to show such an oral warranty.

And the same doctrine was applied in De Lassalle v. Guildford [1901] 2 Q. B. 215, as to an oral warranty that a house, leased by son v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 92, 45 N. W. 573, has reference to a railway ticket which was held to be a memorandum or receipt, subject to parol explanation. Keen v. Beckman Bros. 66 Iowa, 672, 24 N. W. 270, involved a receipt given by defendants to plaintiff, which, as is well known, does not, as a rule, come within the principles we are now discussing. Fawcner v. Lew Smith Wall Paper Co. 88 Iowa, 173, 45 Am. St. Rep. 230, 55 N. W. 200, is really an authority for appellee, as parol evidence was rejected in that case. The supreme court of Minnesota has adopted the view taken by this court, and, in Thompson v. Libby, 34

Minn. 374, 26 N. W. 1, held that parol evidence of a warranty, where there is a written contract of sale, is inadmissible.

Following the cases heretofore cited, it is manifest that the testimony offered by defendant as to the parol warranty should be rejected. This being true, defendants have presented no defense to plaintiff's cause of action. Moreover, even if such testimony were admissible, we should not feel like disturbing the decree of the trial court. There is nothing in the correspondence antedating the contract which indicates that a guaranty such as is now claimed was intended by either party, and it was not for a long time written lease, containing warranties, was dry and the drains perfect.

Parol warranty relating to different subject-matter than written warranty.

In the following cases where the written contract contained an express warranty, evidence was held incompetent, although tending to establish a parol warranty relating to some matter as to which there was no written warranty. As a rule, no distinction was made between such a case and one where the parol warranty related to the same matter as the written warranty. These cases, in principle at least, are opposed to such cases as Edward Lloyd Limited v. Sturgeon Falls Pulp Co. 85 L. T. N. S. 102, although as to just what weight should be given most of them on that point is not clear, as the majority of them applied the general doctrine of exclusion without apparently having the distinction in mind.

The subject was, however, apparently considered in Merriam v. Field, 24 Wis. 640, which held that where a written bill of sale of lumber contained express warranties of title and against encumbrances, evidence of an oral warranty that the lumber was merchantable was properly excluded. The court said that the presumption was that the writing expressed the whole contract as to such warranties, and to allow others to be shown by proving verbal statements at the time of the sale would violate the salutary rule against varying and adding to written contracts by parol evidence. It was, however, held in this case, that while evidence of the parol warranty of the quality was not admissible, yet, that under the circumstances, an implied warranty, substantially to the same effect, was raised, which could be relied upon by the purchaser.

Also in Humphrey v. Merriam, 46 Minn. 413, 49 N. W. 199, wherein it was held that, where a written contract for the sale of mining stock contained an express warranty as to title and against assessments, such warranty legally precluded the purchaser from recovering upon oral representations, made in the course of the negotiations, as to the condition and productiveness of the mine, as warranties.

eral rule of exclusion was applied without the court apparently giving any consideration to the question whether there should be an exception where the parol warranty related to some matter as to which there was no written warranty. Such a case is Willard v. Ostrander, 46 Kan. 591, 26 Pac. 1017, where evidence of oral warranty of the soundness of sheep conveyed by written bill of sale containing a warranty only as to title was held inadmissible.

A bill of sale conveying the exclusive right under certain patents to manufacture, sell, and use certain ice-making, refrigerating machines in a designated territory, which contained no warranty except a warranty of title, was held, in Kansas Refrigerator Co. v. Pert, 3 Kan. App. 364, 42 Pac. 943, to render inadmissible evidence of an oral warranty that the machine would do certain things. (The specific terms of the warranty are not set out.)

To the same effect as to an oral warranty as to the condition and quality of a churn-drill outfit, where the bill of sale contained warranties of title, is McNaughton v. Wahl, 99 Minn. 92, 116 Am. St. Rep. 389, 108 N. W. 467.

The same may be said of McFarland v. McGill, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 298, 41 S. W. 402, wherein a bill of sale of horses, containing a warranty of title, was held to render incompetent proof of a contemporaneous oral agreement to furnish proofs of pedigree sufficient to enable the purchaser to procure the registration of the horses purchased.

To the same effect where the contract contained a warranty as to pedigree and title, where it was sought to prove a parol warranty of soundness, is Bradford v. Neill, 46 Minn. 347, 49 N. W. 193; also Rodgers v. Perrault, 41 Kan. 385, 21 Pac. 287, where a written contract contained a warranty of title, and it was sought to prove a parol warranty of soundness.

That an oral warranty of soundness could not be added to a written contract for the sale of a slave, which contained a warranty of title, was also held in Smith v. Williams, 5 N. C. (1 Murph.) 426, 4 Am. Dec. 564. A similar doctrine, upon substantially similar facts, was also applied in Stucky v. Clyburn, Cheves, L. 186, 34 Am. Dec. 590;

after the installation of the equipment that defendant said anything about a guaranty. Plaintiff's engineer was undoubtedly called upon to make plans for the improvement, and there is no doubt that he thought, believed, and so stated, that, if his recommendations were followed, the items which he planned would do the work. Defendant did not demand any other guaranty when they made the contract than was expressed therein, and made no complaints as to any breach of warranty until pressed many times for the payment of its bill. Plaintiff gave instructions as to the use of the apparatus after it was installed, but these were not followed by the defendant. Again, it appears that defendant accepted and used the equipment furnished by plaintiff for many months, without criticism or complaint, and did not refer to or seemingly rely upon the alleged warranty until plaintiff commenced proceedings to enforce its claim. This in itself would be a sufficient answer to defendant's defense. Mackey v. Swartz, 60 Iowa, 710, 15 N. W. 576; Allison v. Vaughan, 40 Iowa, 421.

An examination of the entire record convinces us that the decree is correct, and it is affirmed.

Smith v. Cozart, 2 Head, 526; Wood v. Ashe, 1 Strobb. L. 407.

Smith v. McCall, 1 M'Cord, L. 220, 10 Am. Dec. 666; held that where a bill of sale of a slave contained a warranty of title and soundness, evidence of an express parol warranty as to the moral character of the slave was inadmissible.

A bill of sale under seal of a vessel, containing only a covenant of warranty as to title, cannot be added to by proof of a contemporaneous oral warranty of soundness. Pender v. Fobes, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 250.

A contract for the sale of a horse, which contained a written warranty against an existing temporary lameness, but nothing whatever as to his being a sure foal-getter, was held, in Farmers' Stock Breeding Assn. v. Scott, 53 Kan. 534, 36 Pac. 978, not subject to be enlarged or changed by evidence of an oral warranty, prior to the execution of the contract, relating to the horse's qualities as a foal-getter.

A contract for the sale of horses, which amounts to a bill of sale, and which contains nothing to indicate that it does not fully express the contract of the parties, and which contains no warranty in terms, unless it be as to pedigree, cannot be enlarged by evidence of a parol warranty of soundness and age. Bush v. Bradford, 15 Ala. 317.

This doctrine was also applied in McQuaid v. Ross, 77 Wis. 470, 46 N. W. 892, where an attempt was made to add to a written contract for the sale of a bull, which contained a warranty of pedigree, by showing an oral warranty against sterility.

In Arden Lumber Co. v. Henderson Iron Works & Supply Co. 83 Ark. 240, 103 S. W. 185, where a written contract for the sale of machinery contained a description of each piece in detail, giving the name, kind, make, and dimensions, and which also contained a written guaranty that the machinery should be "as represented" in the contract, the court said that the circuit court might very properly have narrowed the defense of breach of warranty to the question as to whether or not the machinery was as represented in the written contract. That, "as to all other matters alleged as breach of warranty, the contract was sufficient." 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

lent, and appellant could not, as to these, engraft upon the written contract a warranty by parol proof."

Where a contract for the sale of a furnace is in writing, and contains no warranty other than a guaranty to keep the furnace in good condition for one year, an oral warranty made at the same time, or previously, to the effect that the smoke consumer in such furnace would save fuel, prevent smoke, and increase the efficiency of the boilers, is inadmissible. McMillan v. De Tamble, 93 Ill. App. 65.

To the same effect as to a written contract for the sale of an oil tank, wherein it was guaranteed for a specified period of time, where it was sought to engraft on the contract an oral warranty that the use of the tank would not interfere with the buyer's fire insurance, is Johnson v. Hughes, 83 Ark. 105, 103 S. W. 184.

Where the specifications attached to a contract for the sale of elevator machinery mentioned the number and size of the articles to be furnished, but made no mention of the capacity of the machinery, except as to one item, the hopper to the scales, it was held, in Barry-Wehmiller Machinery Co. v. Thompson, 83 Ark. 283, 104 S. W. 137, that evidence tending to establish a verbal warranty as to the capacity of the elevator, or evidence of representations from which a warranty might be implied, was incompetent.

In Sullivan Machinery Co. v. Breeden, 40 Ind. App. 631, 82 N. E. 107, an answer to a complaint to recover for the purchase price of machinery sold by written contract of sale was held to be demurrable where it admitted the execution of the contract as averred in the complaint, but undertook to avoid it by alleging an altogether different parol contract of warranty from that contained in the writing sued upon. The written guaranty contained in the contract of sale between the parties was to the effect that a channeling machine conveyed thereby was equal in design, material, and workmanship to other machines recently shipped into the district where it was intended to use this machine. There was also an agreement to replace defective machinery. No breach of this warranty was alleged in the answer, but it alleged the breach of a parol warranty to the effect that this machine was the best on the market, that it would cut a designated number of lineal feet of stone per day, and that it was economical in operation.

Wilson v. United States Cattle-Ranch Co. 20 C. C. A. 244, 36 U. S. App. 634, 73 Fed. 994, enunciates the doctrine that where the parties to a written contract for the sale of a herd of cattle expressed therein guaranties or warranties as to the number and description of the cattle in general, the legal inference irresistibly followed that all prior representations, statements, and declarations made in good faith, and all prior oral contracts, were merged in the written agreement, and that it contained all the warranties and guaranties that the parties to the negotiations made; and, in the absence of fraud or mistake in reducing the complete contract containing the warranties to writing, the presumption was conclusive that it contained all the warranties that the parties intended to, or did, make. It was therefore held to be improper to receive evidence of a warranty to the effect that there were 800 beef cattle among the herd covered by the contract.

In Shepherd v. Gilroy, 46 Iowa, 193, it was held that a judgment based upon the finding of a jury that there was a parol warranty and a breach thereof, made with reference to the sale of a threshing machine by the seller, should be set aside where it appeared that the contract for the sale of the machine was reduced to writing which contained warranties (the nature of which does not appear). The trial court instructed the jury that the warranties contained in the written contract were conclusively presumed to be the only warranties made, which instructions the jury violated by finding for the defendant upon the theory of the breach of a parol warranty.

So, in Nichols, S. & Co. v. Wyman, 71 Iowa, 160, 32 N. W. 258, in an action for the purchase price of a steam engine and separator, sold under a written contract containing an express warranty (the terms of which do not appear), it was held incompetent for the defendants to show a different oral warranty to the effect that the machinery covered by the contract was to be perfect and capable of doing good work, and that the engine would haul the separator, tank, water, and one-half ton of coal through stubble and over plowed fields anywhere in the territory wherein defendant intended to operate it. The court said that where there was a written contract of sale, an oral warranty of the things sold could not be shown; and when there was a written warranty, the vendee could not show an additional parol warranty.

In Western Electric Co. v. Baerthel, 127 Iowa, 467, 103 N. W. 475, evidence of a parol warranty of an engine and electrical supplies was held inadmissible where there was a written warranty as to the capacity of such articles, which it was not alleged was breached. The oral warranty sought to be proved was to the effect that the machinery furnished would produce sufficient electricity to light the purchasers' hotel and run the elevator therein to their satisfaction.

Parol warranty relating to same subject-matter as written warranty.

The courts are practically unanimous in holding that evidence to establish a parol warranty relating to a matter covered in part by a written warranty is incompetent. As a rule, however, the decisions are not based upon the fact that the warranties relate to the same matter, but rather upon the application of the general rule of exclusion of oral evidence to vary or contradict the terms of a written contract; and no point is made of the fact that the oral warranty relates to the same subject-matter as the written warranty. While in the following cases the foregoing doctrine was usually stated in sufficiently broad terms to include cases involving the exceptions to the general doctrine heretofore considered, yet the weight to be attached to them, as bearing on the exceptions to the rule, is questionable, as the facts presented to and considered by the court did not require the consideration of the latter question.

The fact that the warranties related to the same matter was, however, apparently in the mind of the court in some of the cases. Thus, in J. I. Case Plow Works v. Niles & S. Co. 90 Wis. 590, 63 N. W. 1013, wherein it was held that oral representations as to the construction and suitability of iron wheels for agricultural implements were incompetent to establish a parol warranty of quality and suitability, where such representations preceded the execution of a written contract which contained a warranty guaranteeing the wheels against breakage in shipping, and against defects in material and workmanship. The court characterized this warranty as a limited warranty in respect to material and workmanship, going to and covering in part the suitability of the wheels for the purpose for which the purchaser desired them.

So, in John Hutchison Mfg. Co. v. Pinch, 107 Mich. 12, 64 N. W. 729, 66 N. W. 340, where a written contract for the purchase of machinery to be used in a mill contained a provision that the machinery was to be paid for when it gave good results, the court said that parol testimony of an agreement adding to this requirement, to the effect that the machinery would require no more power for its operation than machinery then in use by the buyer, was necessarily contradictory of the instrument, and therefore inadmissible; and the fact that the warranty was somewhat vague would not permit parol testimony to show that it was in fact more definite.

And in Nichols, S. & Co. v. Crandall, 77 Mich. 401, 6 L.R.A. 412, 43 N. W. 875, evidence was held incompetent to show a parol warranty of the power of an engine to run a separator under stated conditions, made prior to an order in writing for such engine and separator, which contained a provision to the effect that the machine was purchased and sold subject to the "following express warranty and agreement." The warranty in substance was that, with good management, the separator was capable of doing a good business in threshing and cleaning grain, etc. Also, that the engine was well made and of good material, and, if properly run and rightly managed, was capable of driving the separator to do good business in threshing.

Van Pub. Co. v. Westinghouse C. K. & Co. 72 App. Div. 121, 76 N. Y. Supp. 341, while recognizing that it was entirely competent, where the written agreement was not complete and did not embody the entire understanding between the parties, to prove an oral collateral agreement not inconsistent with the written, held that the rule did not go so far as to permit prior oral negotiations to be introduced in evidence for the purpose either of supplementing or contradicting a formal written contract for the sale of a gas engine, which contained a warranty that the engine conveyed thereby would develop a certain horse power. The court said that, in the absence of any claim that at the time the formal proposal to sell the machine was made and accepted, any other or different agreement than that embodied in the writing was made, prior conversations between the parties as to the character and advantages of the machine would not be considered collateral oral warranties, and were therefore not admissible in evidence. The fact is emphasized in this case that the statements relied upon as oral warranties were not contemporaneous, but were prior in point of time, and were not alluded to when the contract in writing was made.

In Williamson v. Seely, 22 App. Div. 389, 48 N. Y. Supp. 196, where a written assignment of a contract to furnish electric lighting to a town contained no warranty, but did contain an agreement on the part of the assignor that he would superintend and manage the performance of the assigned contract without compensation for one year, and operate the electric light plant in accordance with the terms of the contract, and use his best endeavors properly and successfully to perform the same, it was held that it was incompetent to prove a parol warranty to the effect that the assignor would guarantee that the plant would be run at a certain expense per month, since that part of the agreement already quoted was an agreement on the identical subject of the additional contract which the buyer was attempting to prove.

In Mayer v. Dean, 115 N. Y. 556, 5 L.R.A. 540, 22 N. E. 261, it was held that a written contract for the sale of mustard seed, which showed that it was sold by sample, but which contained no other warranty, could not be added to or enlarged by evidence of parol warranty as to quality. The court, however, held that such evidence was admissible to show that the contract was procured by fraudulent representations. 49 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(The latter question, however, is not included herein.)

Stonehill Wine Co. v. Lupo, 110 N. Y. Supp. 408, held that a written order for a quantity of wine described as "Tipso Castelvetro (light in color laich Dry Catawba)" embodied both the character and quality of the goods, and that therefore evidence that the goods delivered were not like the sample shown at the time of the execution of the order, and not as guaranteed at that time, was incompetent.

In Whitehead v. Lane, 72 Ala. 39, where sawmill machinery was sold under a written warranty to the effect that the machinery was of good material and workmanship, and that it would do work well if properly used, and would do as good work and as much work under the same conditions as any machinery of its class in the United States, it was held that, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, there was no room for parol evidence of a different warranty to the effect that the machinery conveyed in the contract was adapted to squaring large timber, for which use the purchasers intended it.

The doctrine that evidence of an oral warranty as to the power of an engine sold under a written contract of sale containing particular warranties comes within the rule excluding parol evidence to vary the terms of a written contract, and is therefore inadmissible, was applied in Buchanan v. Lamber, 39 Wash. 410, 81 Pac. 911. The oral and written warranties were substantially similar, the only difference being that a provision of the written contract that notice must be given the seller of the failure of the engine to comply with the written warranties would apply unless waived, if the parol warranty was excluded.

In denying the admissibility of evidence of a contemporaneous oral warranty as to mill machinery, that certain mill stones would be prepared ready for use, in addition to a written warranty as to the quality and condition of the machinery described in the written contract of sale, the court, in Cooper v. Cleghorn, 50 Wis. 113, 6 N. W. 491, said: "When parties have deliberately put their engagements into writing, in such terms as import a legal obligation, without any uncertainty as to the object or extent of such engagement, it is conclusively presumed that the whole engagement of the parties, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, were reduced to writing; and all oral testimony of a previous colloquium between the parties, or of conversation or declarations at the time when it was completed, or afterwards, as it would tend, in many instances, to substitute a new and different contract for the one which was really agreed upon, to the prejudice, possibly, of one of the parties, is rejected."

A contract for the sale of a self-feeder for a threshing machine, which contains a warranty as to its working qualities and against defects, will be conclusively pre-manifest defects in the material. The contract also contained a clause to the effect that no terms thereof could be modified or changed unless in writing, and signed by the seller.

To the same effect, under a very similar contract for the sale of a corn harvester, is D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Wigent, 127 Mich. 624, 86 N. W. 1022.

So, in S. Morgan Smith Co. v. Monroe County Water Power & Supply Co. 221 Pa. 165, 70 Atl. 738, evidence of a warranty in the nature of a contemporaneous oral agreement by the agent of the seller as to what certain water-wheel governors would do was held inadmissible to vary the terms of an express warranty contained in a written contract for the sale of such governors, as to quality of machinery and against defects. There was also a restrictive clause to the effect that all prior communications, agreements, etc., relating to the subject-matter of the contract, were annulled, and that no modification of the contract, unless consented to in writing by the parties, should be binding upon the seller.

National Computing Scale Co. v. Eaves, 116 Ga. 511, 42 S. E. 783, also held, where there was a written contract between the parties for the sale of a set of computing scales, which contained no warranties, but which contained a provision that it contained all the stipulations entered into by them, that a plea to an action for the purchase price, which set forth certain representations which had been made by the agent of the seller to the buyer in regard to the character and quality of the scales, should have been stricken upon the seller's motion so to do.

It was also held in Stimpson Computing Scale Co. v. Taylor, 4 Ga. App. 567, 61 S. E. 1131, that where a written contract for the sale of a set of scales contained an express warranty as to accuracy, and also a provision that no agreement or warranty other than that specified in the contract should be binding upon the seller, such warranty precluded all anterior agreements and stipulations. The nature of the parol warranty does not appear.

In Electric Vehicle Co. v. Price, 138 Ill. App. 594, a circular issued by the manufacturers of automobiles, descriptive of the vehicle sold, setting forth its mechanism and qualities, and its ability as to speed and endurance, which was exhibited to the buyer, and in reliance upon which he entered into a contract in writing to purchase an automobile of the kind described therein, was held inadmissible in evidence to establish a warranty other and different from that contained in the written contract (the terms of which are not given). The written contract contained a provision to the effect that all previous representations and communications between the parties with reference to the subject-matter of the contract were thereby abrogated.

Ford Motor Co. v. Osburn, 140 Ill. App. 633, also held that evidence of a parol warranty that an automobile was all right was improperly received, where the automobile was sold by written contract which contained a warranty limited to replacement of all parts of the automobile giving out under normal service, in consequence of defective material or workmanship. The written contract also contained a clause to the effect that the seller would not be responsible for any undertakings or warranties made by its agents beyond those contained in the written contract.

So, in McCray Refrigerator & Cold Storage Co. v. Woods, 99 Mich. 269, 41 Am. St. Rep. 599, 58 N. W. 320, it was held that a contract in writing for the purchase and erection in a refrigerator of a patent system of refrigeration, which contained no warranty, but did contain a clause that the sellers would not be responsible for any promises made by their agents that were not made a part of the contract attached thereto, either printed or written therein, could not be varied or added to by proof of an oral warranty that the system would preserve fresh meat for a designated period of time.

And in Hallwood Cash-Register Co. v. Millard, 127 Mich. 316, 86 N. W. 833, where a written contract for the sale of a cash register contained an agreement to repair and keep it in order, also a stipulation that the contract covered the entire agreement between the parties, evidence was held inadmissible to show an oral warranty made to induce the purchaser to give the order for the machine, to the effect that it could not, by any means or assistance, be manipulated so as to register incorrectly, and could not be so worked as to show the purchaser one figure and register another, and that it would be a full protection to the purchaser against any dishonest employee.

Where corn planters were sold under a written contract which provided that no agreement other than that incorporated in the contract would be recognized, and the contract contained no warranty or representation as to quality or fitness of the corn planters, it was held in Ramsey v. Beedle, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 702, that it was not competent for the purchaser to show warranties by the sellers or their agent in regard to the quality or fitness of the planters.

So, in Hooven & A. Co. v. Wirtz, 15 N. D. 477, 107 N. W. 1078, where an order in writing for the purchase of binding twine contained no warranties, but did contain a clause to the effect that no agreement, condition, or stipulation, verbal or otherwise, save those mentioned in the order, would be recognized unless approved or accepted in writing by the seller, it was held that testimony on the part of the buyer, tending to prove that the seller's salesman, at the time he procured the order in question, orally warranted the quality of the twine, was properly excluded.

In Martin v. Moore, 63 Ga. 531, in an action on a written contract for the sale of fertilizer, which contained a stipulation that the sellers did not in any way warrant the quality of the fertilizer, or its beneficial effects on crops, but the same was sold with all faults at the risk of the purchaser, it was held that a plea alleging an oral representation or warranty as to the quality of the fertilizer was inconsistent with the written contract, and therefore inadmissible.

So, in Allen v. Young, 62 Ga. 617, where the buyer of fertilizer accepted in writing a limited guaranty, and stipulated not to exact anything beyond such guaranty, it was held that parol evidence that the seller represented or warranted the fertilizer to be of good quality was inadmissible to establish a different oral warranty.

A subscription contract for Balzac's "Comedie Humaine," which contained a stipulation that no other conditions or representations than those therewith printed would be binding upon the subscriber or publisher, cannot be changed or enlarged by evidence of oral representations or warranties as to the moral character of the work. Barrie v. Smith, 105 Ga. 34, 31 S. E. 121. It does not appear what, if any, warranties, were contained in the subscription contract, except that it contained no warranties as to the moral character of the book subscribed for.

Branch v. James, 4 Ga. App. 90, 60 S. E. 1027, held that it was not error to exclude evidence of an oral warranty as to the soundness of a mule, offered as a defense to an action on a note which contained a clause that the seller "does in no wise guarantee except in title."

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ORLANDO WEEKS
v.
FESSENDEN E. HACKETT.

EDWIN E. MORTON
v.
SAME.

(— Me. —, 71 Atl. 858.)

Treasure-trove — right of landowner.

1. The owner of the soil in which treasure-trove is found acquires no title to it by virtue of his ownership of the land.

Trover — property found.

2. A joint finder of a package containing legal tender coins may maintain trover to recover possession of his share from his companion, who takes charge of the entire property, and refuses to divide it.

Lost property — joint finding.

3. A joint finding of treasure-trove may be found from evidence that, while several workmen were engaged in making an excavation, one discovered the top of an old can, and called the attention of the others to it, whereupon all proceeded to get it out of the soil, in doing which it was broken and its contents of coin disclosed, and that, in securing such contents, other cans containing coin were discovered and secured.

(June 11, 1908.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Franklin County made during the joint trial of separate actions of trover, each brought to recover the value of an alleged interest in certain coins, which resulted in a verdict for each plaintiff. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph C. Hillman, for defendant: One tenant in common cannot maintain an action against his original cotenant.

Dain v. Cowing, 22 Me. 347; Carter v. Bailey, 64 Me. 464, 18 Am. Rep. 273; Witham v. Witham, 57 Me. 447, 99 Am. Dec. 787; Huchinson v. Chase, 39 Me. 512, 63 Am. Dec. 645; Waller v. Bowling, 108 N. C. 289, 12 L.R.A. 261, 12 S. E. 990; Cooley, Torts, 455.

There has been no conversion of the property by the defendant.

Weld v. Oliver, 21 Pick. 559.

Mr. Frank W. Butler, for plaintiffs:

Case Note. — Rights inter se of joint finders of lost property.

But few cases are to be found which pass upon the rights inter se of joint finders of lost property.

Upon the facts of Cummings v. Stone, 13 Mich. 70, as detailed in WEEKS v. HACKETT, it was held that the owner of the tugboat might maintain assumpsit against the owner of the raft to recover his portion of the proceeds of the sale of the anchor, which they had agreed to divide equally between them.

And the case of Keron v. Cashman (N. J. Ch.) 33 Atl. 1055, in which the chancery court divided the money found equally among the joint finders, is sufficiently set out in WEEKS v. HACKETT.

Coins found upon the body of an unknown man, floating at sea, which are unclaimed by anyone, will be divided in admiralty, one half to the vessel owners and crew, and the balance to the United States, as successor to the prerogative rights of the King of England. Gardner v. 99 Gold Coins, 111 Fed. 552.

And this method of division was applied in Peabody v. 28 Bags of Cotton, Fed. Cas. No. 10,869, to the proceeds of derelict property found afloat at sea.

As to the joint rights and liability of the finder of lost property, see subject note to State v. Hayes, 37 L.R.A. 116, and the case note to Kuykendall v. Fisher, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 94.

Dec. 502; Lawrence v. Buck, 62 Me. 275.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These were actions of trover brought by each of these plaintiffs to recover one third in value of a certain quantity of coins of the United States and of certain foreign coins, alleged to have been found by each plaintiff jointly with the other and with the defendant, Fessenden E. Hackett. It is not in controversy that the coins in question, of the aggregate par value of $1,284.67, were found contained in three metallic cans buried and concealed in the soil and underneath the surface of land owned by one

Leonard J. Hackett in the town of New Vineyard, and it appears in evidence that after the coins were found, and prior to the commencement of these actions, the defendant, Fessenden E. Hackett, purchased all the right, title, and interest, if any, which Leonard J. Hackett had in and to these coins as owner of the land where they were found.

Three contentions were set up in defense:

(1) That the defendant found the coins under circumstances which made him the sole owner of them as against these plaintiffs.

(2) That, if the plaintiffs participated in the finding, they are joint tenants or tenants in common with the defendant, that he is entitled to hold the coins in trust for the true owner, and that the plaintiffs, as tenants in common, cannot maintain trover against him for their respective shares.

(3) That the defendant became the sole owner of the coins by purchase from Leonard J. Hackett, the owner of the premises where they were found.

The presiding justice did not sustain the legal propositions involved in these contentions of the defendant, but instructed the jury, in substance: That gold or silver coin deposited in the soil, as this appeared to have been, becomes what is known in law as treasure-trove, the title to which does not pass with the soil, the owner of the premises where the coin was found acquired no title to it by virtue of his ownership of the land, and that the defendant consequently acquired no title by purchase from Leonard J. Hackett; that, if the coin was purposely buried in the soil, and forgotten, or its place of concealment remained undisclosed by reason of the death of the depositor, the finder acquired a right to the possession of it and a qualified property in it, subject to the right of the true owner when he appeared, and in that sense became a trustee for the owner; but, if several participated in the finding, so as to become joint finders, with equal rights, the ownership pertained to all of them, and one of them was not authorized to hold exclusive possession as against his fellows; and, finally, that since the coins were separable and divisible by weight or count, if the defendant refused to deliver to each of such tenants in common the share to which he was entitled, an action of trover would lie against the defendant for the conversion of such number or portion of the coins as rightfully belonged to each of the joint finders.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of each plaintiff for the sum of $291.20, being one third of the aggregate market value of the coins, and the cases come to the law court on exceptions to these instructions and on a motion to set aside the verdicts as against the law and the evidence.

1. It is the opinion of the court that the instructions given by the presiding justice were correct, and that the exceptions must be overruled.

"Treasure-trove" is a name given by the early common law to any gold or silver in coin, plate, or bullion found concealed in the earth, or in a house or other private place, but not lying on the ground; the owner of the discovered treasure being unknown. 1 Bl. Com. 295; 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 339; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 472; Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452, 43 Am. Rep. 600; Sovern v. Yoran, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293, 20 Pac. 100. To what extent the doctrine of the English common law in regard to treasure-trove has been merged, in this country, into the law respecting the finding of lost property, and whether, in modern commercial life, the term "treasure-trove" may be held to include not only gold and silver, but the paper representatives of them, are questions not necessary to be considered here (see Huthmacher v. Harris, 38 Pa. 499, 80 Am. Dec. 502, and Danielson v. Roberts, 44 Or. 108, 65 L.R.A. 526, 102 Am. St. Rep. 627, 74 Pac. 913); for while it is not in controversy that the coins here in question clearly fall within the common-law definition of "treasure-trove," the general rule is established by a substantially uniform line of decisions in the American states, with respect to both lost goods, properly so termed, and treasure-trove, that, in the absence of legislation upon the subject, the title to such property belongs to the finder as against all the world except the true owner, and that, ordinarily, the place where it is found is immaterial. Lawrence v. Buck, 62 Me. 275; Durfee v. Jones, 11 R. I. 588, 23 Am. Rep. 528; Hamaker v. Blanchard, 90 Pa. 377, 35 Am. Rep. 664; Bowen v. Sullivan, 62 Ind. 281, 30 Am. Rep. 172; Danielson v. Roberts, supra; Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 505, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 631; Bridges v. Hawkesworth, 7 Eng. L. & Eq. 424, 21 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 75. The owner of the soil in which treasure-trove is found acquires no title thereto by virtue of his ownership of the land. R. v. Thomas, Leigh & C. C. C. 313; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 473. According to Bracton, lib. 3, chap. 3, as quoted in Viner's Abridgement: "He to whom the property is shall have treasure-trove, and, if he dies before it be found, his executors shall have it, for nothing accrues to the King unless when no one knows who hid that treasure." [20 Vin. Abr. 414.] And according to Lord Coke (3 Inst. 132), the common law originally left treasure-trove to the person who deposited it, or, upoh his omission to claim it, to the finder. 2 Kent, Com. 458. The rule of the common law respecting the rights and duties of the finder of lost money or goods has been variously modified by the terms and provisions of local statutes of many states, but the provisions of the Maine statutes (Rev. Stat. chap. 100, §§ 10 et seq.) have no reference to the law of treasure-trove.

In Danielson v. Roberts, supra, in which the facts were strikingly analogous to those at bar, two boys unearthed on the defendant's premises an old tin can containing gold coin of the value of $7,000. The circumstances under which the money was discovered, the rust-eaten condition of the can in which it was contained, and the place of deposit, tended strongly to show that it had been buried for a long time, and that the owner was probably dead or unknown. It was held that the fact the money was found on the premises of the defendants in no way affected the plaintiffs' right to possession or their duty in relation to the treasure, and that they could maintain trover therefor against the defendants, to whom they had been induced to deliver the money. In a well-reasoned opinion, the court says:

"Ever since the early case of Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 505, where it was held that the finder of a jewel might maintain trover for the conversion thereof by a wrongdoer, the right of the finder of lost property to retain it against all persons except the true owner has been recognized. In that case a chimney sweeper's boy found a jewel and carried it to a goldsmith to ascertain what it was. The goldsmith refused to return it, and it was held that the boy might maintain trover on the ground that, by the finding, he had acquired such a property in the jewel as would entitle him to keep it against all persons but the rightful owner. This case has been uniformly followed in England and America, and the law upon this point is well settled. Sovern v. Yoran, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293, 20 Pac. 100; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 579. But it is argued that property is lost, in the legal sense of that word, only when the possession has been casually and involuntarily parted with, and not when the owner purposely and voluntarily places or deposits it in a certain place for safe-keeping, although he may thereafter forget it, and leave it where deposited, or may die without disclosing to anyone the place of deposit.

"But, at the present stage of the controversy, it is immaterial whether the money discovered by plaintiffs was technically lost property or treasure-trove; or, if treasure-trove, whether it belongs to the state or the finder, or should be disposed of as lost property if no owner is discovered. In either event the plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the money as against the defendants, unless the latter can show a better title. The reason of the rule giving the finder of lost property the right to retain it against all persons except the true owner applies with equal force and reason to money found hidden or secreted in the earth as to property found on the surface."

In Durfee v. Jones, 11 R. I. 588, 23 Am. Rep. 528, the plaintiff bought an old safe and soon afterwards, through his agent, left it for sale with the defendant, who was a blacksmith. Upon examination of it soon after it was left with him, the defendant found secreted between the exterior and the lining a roll of bank bills amounting to $165. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant knew the money was there before it was found, and the owner was unknown. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant to recover the money, claiming that, as owner of the safe, he was entitled to the money by right of prior possession; but the court held that the plaintiff "never had any possession of the money except unwittingly, by having possession of the safe which contained it;" that although it was originally deposited in the safe by design, it was not so deposited after the safe became the property of the plaintiff, so as to be in the protection of the safe as his safe, or so as to affect him with any responsibility for it, and it was accordingly held that the defendant, as finder of the money, was entitled to retain it as against the plaintiff, the owner of the safe, and as against all the world except the real owner.

In Bowen v. Sullivan, 62 Ind. 281, 30 Am. Rep. 172, the plaintiff, while engaged as an employee in the defendant's paper mill, found two $50 bank bills, in a clean, unmarked envelope, in a bale of old paper which the defendant had bought for manufacture, and delivered the bills to the defendant for the purpose of ascertaining if they were good, and upon his promise to return them. The defendant refusing to return them, the plaintiff brought suit to recover their value, and the court held that she was entitled to recover, citing, among other cases, Lawrence v. Buck, Durfee v. Jones, supra, and Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange, 505, and stating that the place of the finding was ordinarily immaterial.

The result, therefore, seems unquestionable that, in the case at bar, the coins sued for belonged to the finder or finders as against all the world except the true owner or his legal representatives, when discovered. Indeed, the defendant's counsel does not seriously contend to the contrary; but, as already noted, he claims under the motion that the defendant was in fact the sole finder of the coins, and further insists under the exceptions that, in any event, these actions are not maintainable, for the reason that an action of trover will not lie in favor of one tenant in common against his original cotenant.

With respect to things so far indivisible in their nature that the share of one cannot be distinguished from that of the other, it is undoubtedly a well-established rule that one tenant in common cannot maintain trover against his cotenant, for the reason that the two are equally entitled to possession, and the one who has it cannot be guilty of conversion by retaining it; but this rule "can have no reasonable application to such commodities as are readily divisible by tale or measure into portions absolutely alike in quality, such as grain or money." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 533. Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex. If A. and B. are tenants in common of a car load of corn, and B. denying A.'s right to any part of it, refuses to surrender his half on demand, this is deemed in law a conversion, because the commodity would be capable of exact division by weight or measure, and, by refusing to surrender A.'s half, B. exercised a dominion over it inconsistent with A.'s rights. As observed by the court in Pickering v. Moore, 67 N. H. 536, 31 L.R.A. 698, 68 Am. St. Rep. 695, 32 Atl. 830: "One is entitled to the possession of the whole in those cases only where it is necessary to his enjoyment of his moiety. Here it is not necessary. There is no more difficulty in separating one portion from another than there is in selecting A.'s marked sheep from B.'s flock. Either may make the division. The law is not so unreasonable as to compel a resort to the courts in order to obtain a partition which either may make without expense and without danger of injustice to his cotenant." See, also, Fiquet v. Allison, 12 Mich. 328, 86 Am. Dec. 54; Ripley v. Davis, 15 Mich. 75, 90 Am. Dec. 262; Gates v. Bowers, 169 N. Y. 14, 88 Am. St. Rep. 530, 61 N. E. 993; German Nat. Bank v. Meadowcroft, 95 Ill. 124, 35 Am. Rep. 137.

It is also familiar law that absolute and unqualified ownership of a chattel is not essential to enable one to maintain trover for its conversion. Either a general or special property in the plaintiff, with the right of possession at the time of the conversion, will be sufficient. It has been seen that, in all the cases above cited in which it has been held that the finder of lost property is entitled to retain possession of it as against all the world until the rightful owner appears, it was also held that the finder had a special or qualified property in the thing found sufficient to enable him to maintain trover for its conversion against anyone except the true owner.

Upon the assumption, then, that the plaintiffs and the defendant were joint finders, and therefore tenants in common, of the coin contained in the cans found in the case at bar, each was entitled to possession of one third of it, and charged with the duty of holding it for the true owner if he could be ascertained. He was under obligations to exercise reasonable care to safely keep his share of it, and be prepared to restore it to the true owner whenever he might appear; and was therefore authorized to maintain such action as might be necessary to entitle him to retain or recover possession of it. The coins were readily divisible into three parts by counting and weighing, but the defendant denied the plaintiffs' rights and refuses to surrender any part of the coin. This was effectually a conversion of their respective shares as tenants in common, and an action of trover was the appropriate remedy for each plaintiff.

2. Under the motion the defendant insists that he discovered the cans under circumstances that constitute him the sole finder of the coins; but, under instructions upon this point to which no exceptions were taken, the jury evidently reached the conclusion that the plaintiffs participated in the discovery so as to become joint finders with the defendant, with equal rights in the property found. They awarded to each plaintiff $291.20, and this appears to have been precisely one third of the aggregate market value of all the coin. As it satisfactorily appears that the quantity of coin in any one can was not of the same value as that in any other, the jury must have decided that there was a joint finding by all, and not a separate finding of a single can by each, and the question now is whether this conclusion of the jury was warranted by the evidence.

A mill owned by Leonard J. Hackett had been destroyed by fire, including a small building 14 feet distant from it and a covered passageway connecting it with the mill. The plaintiffs and defendant were employed by the owner of the premises, among other things, to make an excavation about 8 feet wide for a shaftway preparatory to the erection of a new mill on the same site. At the time of the discovery of the coin, they were all engaged in digging out the gravel and small stones in the passageway connecting the old mill with the small building. It appeared in evidence that there had been some "joking" between these workmen and Mr. Sweet, a neighbor who happened to be present, with reference to a tradition that one Porter, a former owner, had buried some money on the premises; but, according to the 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) testimony in behalf of the plaintiffs, the coin was discovered under the following circumstances: The plaintiffs and defendant were working in the trench about 4 or 5 feet from each other, when the defendant discovered the top of an old can, and asked Sweet, who was walking away, to come back, saying, "I have found it." Thereupon the plaintiff Morton commenced to dig out the stones and gravel around the can, when the defendant tried to pull it out with his hands, and said: "I can't lift it. I guess it is filled with sand." After further digging the plaintiff Morton took up the can, when the bottom dropped out, and the silver coins were seen falling from the can among the stones. The defendant exclaimed: "It is money. I wish I hadn't said anything, for there will be a row over it." While digging out more stones for the purpose of picking up the coins that fell among stones, the plaintiff Morton discovered the second can, which was taken out by the defendant and Mr. Sweet. Morton continued to dig out the stones and gravel and soon uncovered the third can, the top of which, however, appears to have been first seen by the plaintiff Weeks. This can was removed by the defendant and the plaintiff Morton. The three cans were set in a triangular position about a foot equidistant from each other; the spaces between them being filled with stones and gravel.

The money was turned into a pail and pan and carried to the house of Leonard J. Hackett by the defendant and Mr. Sweet, where it remained from Saturday afternoon until the following Monday, when, by arrangement between the defendant and the owner of the land, the money was deposited in a national bank.

The defendant's account of the finding is materially different. He testifies that the cans were standing in a row close to each other, and that when he unearthed the first one, and before it was taken out, he discovered the other two through the openings in the stones, and plainly saw the bright coins in the cans. He expressly admits, however, that "we all had hold of these cans," and it is the opinion of the court that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in accepting the plaintiffs' version of the finding, and in drawing the inference that neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant had any knowledge or belief that silver coins had been discovered until they were seen to fall through the bottom of the first can after it was taken out by the plaintiff Morton. It may also be fairly inferred from the conduct of the parties that, at the time of the discovery of the coins, neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant understood that the finder of money under such circumstances acquired any legal claim to it as against the owner of the soil where it was found.

The solution of the question thus raised, respecting the rights of the several parties who participated in the discovery and removal of the cans containing the coin in dispute, is necessarily attended with some practical difficulties. Other courts have encountered similar difficulties under analogous circumstances.

In Keron v. Cashman (1896; N. J. Ch.) 33 Atl. 1055, one of several boys playing along a railroad track picked up an old stocking in which something was tied, and, after he had swung it about in play for a time, a second one of the boys snatched it, or, it having been thrown by the finder, the second boy picked it up and began striking the other boys with it. In this way it passed from one to another, and, finally, while the second boy was swinging it, it broke open, and paper money to the amount of $775 was found therein; all then examining it together. It was held that the money belonged to all the boys in common. In the opinion the court says:

"This money within the stocking was therefore the lost property, and, as to this money, the first intention, idea, or 'state of mind,' as it is called in some of the authorities, arose on this discovery. As a plaything the stocking with its contents was in the common possession of all the boys; and inasmuch as the discovery of the money resulted from the use of the stocking as a plaything, and in the course of the play, the money must be considered as being found by all of them in common. . . .

"All of the cases agree that some intention or state of mind with reference to the lost property is an essential element to constitute a legal 'finder' of such property, and the peculiarity of the present case is that the intention or state of mind necessary to constitute the finder must relate to the lost money inclosed within a lost stocking, and not to the lost stocking itself, in the condition when first found; and, under the circumstances established by the evidence in this case, the finder of the lost stocking was not, by reason of such finding, the legal finder of the lost money within the stocking. A decree will therefore be advised dividing the money equally between the defendants."

In Cummings v. Stone, 13 Mich. 70, the plaintiff's tugboat, while towing a raft belonging to the defendant, slackened speed, and on starting again, the tow line, which was the property of the defendant, caught and drew up an anchor and chain, which were secured and put on the raft by the defendant, and it was held that the plaintiff and defendant were joint finders of the property.

In these decisions the courts appear to have been governed by those practical considerations of fairness and conceptions of common right which influence just and thoughtful men in the ordinary affairs of life, and which are in harmony with the principles of equity, and not discountenanced by rules of law. In reaching the conclusion that the discovery of the three cans should be deemed one transaction, and that the participation of the plaintiffs in the discovery of the coins was sufficient to constitute them joint finders with the defendant, the jury in the cases at bar appear to have been governed by the same equitable considerations, and it is the opinion of the court that the verdicts were warranted by the evidence.

Exceptions and motions overruled.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

SHANBERG, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

(85 C. C. A. 343, 158 Fed. 1.)

Appeal — jurisdiction — waiver.

1. A plaintiff who makes no objection to the jurisdiction of a Federal court to which the case is removed on the ground of diverse citizenship because neither party resides within the district, but proceeds with the trial, will not be heard to raise the objection on appeal.

Accident insurance — rupture of heart — liability.

2. Rupture of the heart, which is in a state of fatty degeneration, by assisting in carrying a door weighing 86 pounds, or by filling the lungs with air by drawing a long breath after putting it down, causing death, is not within the provisions of a policy insuring against death from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means.

(November 4, 1907.)

Case Note. — Rupture of blood vessel as an accident within accident insurance policy.

In McCarthy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 8 Biss. 362, Fed. Cas. No. 8,682, it was held that the rupture of a blood vessel while exercising with Indian clubs would not be accidental if the insured voluntarily used the clubs in the ordinary way for taking such exercise, without the occurrence of any unusual circumstance interrupting or interfering with such use, or causing any un-ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Van Devanter and Adams, Circuit Judges, and Riner, District Judge.

Mr. I. J. Ringolsky, with Mr. J. C. Rosenberger, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Charles S. Cryster and Clifford Histed, with Mr. J. H. Harkless, for defendant in error.

Riner, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover upon an ac-foreseen, accidental, or involuntary movement of the body; but that if, while engaged in such exercise, there occurred any unforeseen, accidental, or involuntary movement of the body, or any unforeseen or unexpected circumstance interfered with or obstructed the usual course of such exercise, and produced an involuntary movement, strain, or wrenching, by means of which the injury was occasioned, it would be an accident within the spirit of the policy.

In Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Schmaltz, 66 Ark. 588, 74 Am. St. Rep. 112, 53 S. W. 49, it appeared that the insured, at the time of the injury, was healthy and strong, and, while removing a cylinder head from a railroad locomotive, which was one of his duties as a machinist, and which he had frequently done in safety, he made some sudden, unusual, unexpected, and involuntary movement of the body in order to prevent the head from falling, which caused the rupture of a blood vessel. It was held that the rupture was accidental.

In McGlinchey v. Fidelity & C. Co. 80 Me. 251, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190, 14 Atl. 13, it appeared that the insured was driving a carriage containing himself and his two small boys when the horse became frightened and ran away, nearly colliding with other teams, but was brought under control before upsetting the carriage or throwing anyone out. Immediately afterwards, the insured experienced great sickness and pain and died within about one hour. The court said: "Our belief is, on the facts legitimately before us, that death was produced by a ruptured blood vessel about the heart, and that such rupture was caused by the extraordinary physical and mental exertion which the deceased put forth to save his children and himself from injury;" and held that death was caused by bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means within the terms of the insurance policy.

In Taylor v. General Acci. Assur. Corp. 208 Pa. 439, 57 Atl. 830, the insured fell down the steps leading up to his office, and stated that he did not know how he happened to fall. The fall was followed by violident insurance policy. The action was originally brought in the state court, and removed by the defendant to the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri. The defendant answered in the case, the plaintiff filed her reply thereto, and the case proceeded to trial before the court and a jury. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant.

While numerous errors are assigned in the record, two, only, are relied upon here: First, the court erred in entertaining jurisdiction of the case, because it affirmatively appears from the record that neither plaintiff nor defendant was, at the time the suit was brought and tried, a citizen of the state or district in which the suit was brought, lent hemorrhages due to the rupture of blood vessels in the stomach, from which he died. His physicians agreed that there was nothing in his condition indicating that he was afflicted with any disorder that might have contributed to the fall or to his death. It was held that his death was caused by an accident within the terms of the policy.

In Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 107 Iowa, 538, 43 L.R.A. 693, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212, 78 N. W. 252, it was held that death resulting from a ruptured artery was not accidental, where the rupture occurred while the insured was reaching over a chair to close window shutters, and he did not fall, slip, or lose his balance, and nothing was done or occurred which was not foreseen and planned, except the rupture of the artery.

In Smouse v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 118 Iowa, 436, 92 N. W. 53, it appeared that insured, just recovering from an attack of pneumonia, being suddenly aroused from sleep, arose in a somewhat confused condition of mind, and hurriedly attempted to remove his nightshirt over his head, and while his arms were raised above his head, became entangled in the garment, and, putting forth more or less violent exertion in an effort to extricate himself, ruptured a blood vessel, causing his death. It was held error to instruct the jury that "an accidental cause is such as may happen by chance; unexpected taking place; not according to the usual course of things, or not as expected," since the use of the word "may" served to weaken the definition given of "accident," and suggested by inference that the element of chance and unexpectedness was not always necessary to an accidental result; and held, further, that while the insured's confused condition may have caused him to become entangled in his garment, and may have made him incapable of exercising ordinary care and prudence in the physical exertions employed by him in escaping therefrom, nevertheless, those exertions were voluntary, in the proper sense of the word, and therefore the fatal result could not be regarded as accidental.

In Niskern v. United Brotherhood of Car- the plaintiff in error being a citizen and resident of the state of Kansas, and the defendant in error being a citizen and resident of the state of New York; therefore the case was not one which could be removed into the circuit court; second, that the court erred in instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

The question of jurisdiction was not raised in the court below. No objection whatever to its jurisdiction was made in that court; plaintiff voluntarily appeared, filed a reply, and proceeded in the trial without objection, the question of jurisdiction being now raised for the first time in the brief of plaintiff in error, filed in this court. It is insisted that the case of Ex parte Wisner, 203 U. S. 449, 51 L. ed. 264, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 150, is controlling in this case, and fully sustains the contention of the plaintiff. It must be conceded that there is a statement found in the opinion of the court in that case which tends to give color to this contention, but, to determine what was really decided, we must look at the case then before the court. In that case, Wisner, a citizen of the state of Michigan, commenced an action in the state court in the state of Missouri against Beardsley, a citizen of the state of Louisiana. Beardsley filed his petition to remove the case from the state court into the circuit court of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Missouri, on the ground of diversity of citizenship, together with the bond required in such cases; an order of removal was thereupon entered by the state court, and a transcript of the record was filed in the circuit court. Wisner moved to remand on the ground that the circuit court had not acquired jurisdiction by the removal. The motion was heard and denied. Wisner then applied to the Supreme Court for leave to file a petition for mandamus, which was granted, and rules entered returnable upon a day fixed, and the case submitted on the returns to the rules. The Supreme Court held that the motion to remand to the state court should have been sustained on the ground that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to proceed. It will thus be seen that the Wisner Case differs materially from the case at bar, in that in that case the plaintiff took advantage of the first opportunity to raise the question of jurisdiction by presenting his motion to remand upon that ground, whereas, in this case the plaintiff not only failed to ask that the case be remanded, but voluntarily filed her reply and proceeded to trial, thus bringing the case more nearly within the principle announced by the Supreme Court in the case of Central Trust Co. v. McGeorge, 151 U. S. 129, 38 L. ed. 98, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 286. In the case last cited, the Central Trust Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the state of New York, filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia against the Virginia, Tennessee, & Carolina Steel & Iron Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the penters & Joiners, 93 App. Div. 364, 87 N. Y. Supp. 640, the insured, a carpenter, claimed that he was suffering from a hardening of the blood vessels of the body, and that a strain, to which he was subjected in lifting heavy timber, ruptured a diseased blood vessel. The evidence showed that he suddenly became dizzy while engaged in endeavoring to put up the frame and rafters of a porch. It was held that, since the most liberal inference that could be drawn from the evidence was that he put forth an effort in the performance of his work which proved too much for him in his physical condition, an accidental injury was not established.

In Scarr v. General Acci. Assur. Corp. [1905] 1 K. B. 387, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 787, it appeared that the assured's heart was in a weakened condition; that he attempted to eject a drunken man, using some physical exertion by pushing or pulling the man, who offered only a passive resistance, no blow being passed. It was held that, since the exertion was intended, and there was no slip or fall, there was no accident within the meaning of the policy.

It will be observed that, upon the question here discussed, none of the preceding cases is in conflict with the rule adopted and applied in SHANBERG v. FIDELITY & C. Co., 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

viz., that where the act of the assured which causes the rupture of the blood vessel is done by the assured voluntarily, and in an ordinary way, with no unforeseen, accidental, or involuntary movement of the body, such rupture is not an accident.

But Horsfall v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 Wash. 132, 63 L.R.A. 425, 98 Am. St. Rep. 846, 72 Pac 1028, appears to be out of harmony with this view. Here the insured, accustomed to lifting from 200 to 250 pounds, was assisting in lifting a bar of iron weighing 350 or 400 pounds; he had to stand on the top of a pile and reach below his feet in order to pick up his end, and, by reason of his position, was at a disadvantage; he ruptured his heart, which was in a healthy condition, and died in consequence. This was held to be an accident upon the ground that the "result" was unexpected and not according to the usual course of things. The holding might be justified, however, upon the ground that his disadvantageous position was unusual, occasioning an unforeseen and unintentional overexertion.

Upon the general subject of what constitutes an accident within the meaning of an accident insurance policy, see note to Fidelity & C. Co. v. Johnson, 30 L.R.A. 206.

state of New Jersey. The defendant company entered a general appearance, and joined with the complainant in its prayer for the appointment of a receiver, without objection to the jurisdiction. Thereafter the circuit court dismissed the bill on the ground that, under the act of March 3, 1887, chap. 373, 24 Stat. at L. 552, as amended by the act of August 13, 1888, chap. 866, 25 Stat. at L. 433, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 508, it was without jurisdiction of the cause. The Supreme Court reversed the decree dismissing the bill, holding that exemptions from being sued out of the district of its domicile is a privilege which a corporation may waive, and which is waived by pleading to the merits; and, further, that the fact that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant resides in the district in which the suit is brought does not prevent the operation of the waiver. See also Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369, 24 L. ed. 853; First Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 132 U. S. 141, 33 L. ed. 282, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. McBride, 141 U. S. 127, 35 L. ed. 659, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 982; Southern Exp. Co. v. Todd, 5 C. C. A. 432, 12 U. S. App. 351, 56 Fed. 104; Memphis Sav. Bank v. Houchens, 52 C. C. A. 176, and cases cited in note on page 192 (115 Fed. 96); Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 444, 36 L. ed. 768, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935; Southern P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 36 L. ed. 942, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44. In the two cases last cited, the right of a corporation to avail itself of the exempting clause of the acts of 1887-88 was maintained, yet in both cases the defendants appeared specially and set up the right of exemption. If the plaintiff in this case had, upon its removal from the state court, filed a motion to remand on the ground that the circuit court was without jurisdiction, the case would clearly come within the rule announced in the Wisner Case; but, not having done so, by pleading to the merits and voluntarily submitting herself to the jurisdiction of the circuit court, we think the objection to the jurisdiction now raised in this court for the first time comes too late.

The second assignment of error relates to the action of the court in directing a verdict for the defendant. It appears from the record that P. Shanberg, the husband of the plaintiff, who lived in Kansas City, Kansas, on the 22d of March, 1904, applied for and obtained from the defendant's agent in Kansas City, Missouri, an accident policy. The provisions of the policy, so far as they are material here, are as follows: "The Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York (herein called the company), in consideration of the premises, and of the statements in the schedule of warranties, hereinafter 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contained, which statements the assured makes on the acceptance of this policy and warrants to be true, does hereby insure the person named and described in said schedule (and herein called the assured) for the period of one year from noon, standard time, of the day this contract is dated (1) against disability or death resulting directly and independently of all other causes, from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means. . . . If death shall result within ninety days from said injuries, the company will pay the beneficiary hereinafter named, if surviving, $5,000.'

The policy also insures against disability from certain illnesses therein specified, and then provides: "This insurance does not cover disability from disease or illness resulting from voluntary or unnecessary exposure to contagion or infection; nor any illness or illnesses other than those specified in this policy; nor any illness complicated with or resulting from a disease not specifically covered by this policy; nor any illness occasioned by or resulting from a surgical operation; nor any disease contracted within fifteen days from noon of the day this policy is issued."

It is further shown by the record that, at the time of his death, which occurred January 30, 1905, the assured was the owner of two buildings in Kansas City, Kansas; that the distance between the two buildings was about three city blocks; that, on the morning of the 30th of January, he and the witness, Higgins, carried a cellar door, 3 feet, 4 inches in width by 6 feet, 9 inches in length, and weighing about 86 pounds, from one of these buildings to the other. The witness, Higgins, testified that, upon arriving at their destination, and just as they had set the door down, the assured turned to him and said: "Shorty, I am tired." He then turned his head back, and a few seconds afterwards his head drew back with a quick jerky motion, his lips turned blue, he grabbed the door with both hands and fell forward on his face from the door; that witness attempted to pick him up, but found he was dead. This witness further testified that the weather was cold, with some snow on the ground; that during the time they were engaged in carrying the door from one building to the other the assured did not at any time slip or stumble; that the door did not strike the assured at any time, nor the assured strike the door; that on that morning, up to the time he died, he had suffered no wrench, slip, injury, or fall. The autopsy disclosed that the assured was suffering from what is known to the medical profession as "fatty heart" or "fatty degeneration of the heart," and that the heart was ruptured. Dr. Hailey, who conducted the examination, testified that the walls of the heart of the assured were thin and it was a feeble heart, the muscular structure being thin and degenerated, what was known as "fatty degeneration of the heart," and that straining, holding the breath, filling the chest with air, as is done by making powerful exertion, could, under the facts as disclosed by this case, cause the rupture of the heart.

The policy is one of indemnity against disability or death, resulting directly, and independently of all other causes, from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, and also against disability from certain illnesses therein specified. The disease from which the assured was suffering at the time of his death was not enumerated in the policy, and, as we view the case, there was no accident in the means through which the bodily injury was effected. It would not help the matter to call the injury itself—that is, the rupture of the heart—an accident. That was the result, and not the means, through which it was effected. Carrying the door, or, after putting it down, the act of filling his lungs with air by drawing a long breath, was the means by which the injury was caused. Both were done by the assured voluntarily, and in an ordinary way, with no unforeseen, accidental, or involuntary, movement of the body whatever. There was no stumbling, slipping, or falling; there was nothing accidental in his movements, any more than there would be in walking on the street, or passing down the steps of his house, during each of which he might have filled his lungs by drawing a long breath, and ruptured his heart. The policy does not purport to be a contract of indemnity against death or injury by all means. The cause of death must, in all cases where it is sought to recover under the provisions above quoted, result directly, and independently of all other causes, from bodily injury sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, or the event is without the scope of the contract. The degree of violence or force is not material. Had the assured, while assisting in carrying the door, lost his balance and fallen and struck upon some unforeseen object, or slipped on the ice, his death might be said to have resulted from violent or accidental means, and, assuming that there was no want of due diligence on his part, would doubtless be covered by the policy. But, from the facts as disclosed by the record in this case, we do not think it can be said that the rupture of the assured's heart, and which caused his death, was in any sense the result of an accident. He engaged in carrying this door for his own convenience; he encountered no obstacle in doing so; he accomplished just what he intended to, in the way he intended to, and in the free exercise of his choice. No accident of any kind interfered with his movements, or for an instant relaxed his self-control.

Even assuming that the walls of the heart gave way under the strain to which the assured had voluntarily put it, under circumstances free from all peril or necessity, we are of opinion that the case would not come within the provisions of the policy, and therefore that the circuit court rightly instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

Attorneys. Conviction in another jurisdiction held not within a statute declaring that an attorney must be disbarred upon his conviction of a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. 892. A Kentucky case holds that a proceeding to disbar an attorney for unfitness to practice his profession because he has collected money for clients which he has refused upon demand to pay over may be instituted by the commonwealth's attorney in the name of the commonwealth, although a statute permits him to be disbarred for such cause upon application of the person whose money is withheld. 413.

Commerce. The right of a merchant of another state to sell his goods carries with it the right to deliver them and to employ for that purpose any agency he may deem proper, provided that at no time before delivery the goods become so mingled with the common mass of property in the state as to deprive the transaction of its interstate features. 405. A state statute requiring express companies to make free delivery of parcels held invalid as applied to interstate shipments as an attempted regulation of interstate commerce. 93.

Courts. That a judge is an active partisan, held not to disqualify him to try a contested election one of the parties to which is a member of his political party. 602. A Kansas case holds that a police judge of a city of the second class, though exercising judicial functions, is not a repository of judicial power, so as to prevent the legislature from requiring him to notify the county attorney of violations of the prohibitory liquor law which come to his notice, and to furnish the names of the witnesses by whom such violations may be proved. 615.

Elections. A Louisiana case holds that the term "residence," used by the Constitution in fixing the qualification of voters, does not mean domicil. 759.

Eminent domain. That a corporation seeking by right of eminent domain property necessary to enable it to generate electricity has power to serve a private use, held not to defeat its application for property which it proposes and proves shall be used exclusively for a public service. 725. A drainage district which constructs a levee along a river and from the river to the highlands, in such a way as to obstruct the natural flow of the flood water of the river and cast it back upon property farther up the stream, held liable for the injury caused thereby, where the Constitution provides that property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation. 991.

Insurance agents. The New York statute limiting amounts which insurance companies may expend for securing new business held not applicable to an existing long-term contract with a general agent, so as to reduce the amounts to be paid him under his contract; if the statute were construed otherwise, it would contravene the provision of the Federal Constitution against impairing the obligation of contracts. 946.

Monopolies. The circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit, in a decision affirmed by the United States Supreme Court, holds that jobbers who are compelled to become parties to a general undertaking between manufacturers of a household necessity for the creation of a corporation to act as their sales agent for the purpose of stifling competition between them, which is void under the Federal anti-trust act, cannot be compelled by the sales agent to pay for goods purchased under and in accordance with the agreement. 143.

Municipal corporations. A Minnesota case holds that the legislature may legally require ten days' written notice to the city prior to the accident, of the existence of a defect in a street or sidewalk, as a condition precedent to liability for damages caused thereby. 689. Charter authority to regulate, suppress, and impose taxes on skating rinks, held not to empower a municipality to require such rinks as are not in fact nuisances to close at 6 o'clock P. M. 637. The power conferred upon a municipality to establish waterworks held not limited to the establishment of a municipal plant, but to empower the city to confer upon a corporation proper privileges and franchises in the use of the streets to enable it to furnish an adequate supply of water for the purposes of the city and its inhabitants. 183.

Towns. A town council has no authority to satisfy a judgment obtained by the town upon payment of the costs of the action, since such satisfaction is in fact a gift to the judgment debtor which the council has no power to make. 320.

Peddlers. A state statute imposing a heavy license tax upon the right to canvass from house to house for a certain limited number of articles not produced or manufactured within the state not injurious to health or morals, for the apparent purpose of favoring resident merchants with established places of business, held to violate the provisions of the Federal Constitution against abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States and denying equal protection of the laws. 297.

Physicians and surgeons. One licensed to practise "medicine and surgery" held not entitled, by virtue thereof, to practise "dentistry" without securing a license as a dentist. 877.

Public officers. A Nebraska case denies the power of the legislature to provide for the appointment of park commissioners of cities by judges of the district court of the judicial district in which the cities shall be situated. 578. A Minnesota case holds that there may be a de facto officer though no de jure office exists, as in de facto municipal corporations or de facto courts. 775. A mayor who sanctions a system of imposing fines upon places where liquor is illegally sold as a method of obtaining public revenue, and fails to make a bona fide attempt to enforce the law against them or inform the prosecuting attorney of known 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

violations of the law, held to forfeit his office. 224. The members of a board of health acting in the performance of a public duty under a public statute to prevent the spread of an infectious or contagious disease held not personally liable for damages arising out of their acts in establishing a quarantine, even where the disease does not actually exist, provided they act in good faith. 262.

Mandamus. Mandamus held the proper remedy to restore a party to an office from which he has been illegally removed. 49.

Public records. An Illinois case upholds the right of private abstract companies to make copies of books containing abstracts of title, which are required to be made by the recorder, and for copies of which made by him he is required to charge a fee. 386.

Railroads. A statute and ordinance requiring the maintenance by a railroad company at street crossings of lights which are not excessive in foggy or stormy weather held not, because they may be so in clear weather, to be so unreasonable as to amount to unconstitutional invasion of property rights. 658. A Kentucky case denies the right of a railroad company to give one hackman the right to occupy such a position on its grounds as necessarily to result in his securing by far the larger share of patronage. 756.

Schools. Taxpayers of a school district, who for a long series of years permit the school moneys to be expended in sectarian instruction, held not entitled to maintain a suit to compel reimbursement to the district by the school officers and the recipients of the money. 171. Publishers of school books held not entitled to enjoin discontinuance in a particular school of the books published by them because the school board has not complied with the provisions of the statute in making the change. 1003.

Street franchise. A Massachusetts case holds that a street railway company having the right or license to operate its tracks in a public street only until revoked or terminated by the public authorities may, at its pleasure, discontinue the operation of the whole track covered by a particular location, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary. 865.

Taxes. Constitutional provisions that a deduction of debts and credits may be allowed in assessing taxes, and that the property must be taxed, held not to recognize credits as property, so as to prevent the legislature from exempting credits. 707. A statute providing that any mining right may be conveyed by lease, and that such conveyance shall be considered as separating such right from the land so that it may be taxed separately, held applicable to an oil lease. 746. A New Jersey case holds stock in a New Jersey corporation belonging to a testator domiciled in England is not subject to an inheritance tax. 887. Personal estate of a testator situated at his domicile in one state and real estate situated in another, which he directs to be converted into money, held not subject to a succession tax in the latter, although he directs the fund to be transmitted to trustees there situated, for distribution. 290.

Telephones. A rule of a rural telephone company that telephone rent must be paid six months in advance held reasonable, justifying the refusal of the company to continue the service to a subscriber who refuses to comply therewith. 693.

Timber law. State regulation of the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild and uncultivated land, or prohibition of the wanton cutting of small trees on such land, which are of equal or greater value standing than cut, for the purpose of protecting the water supply of the state, held not a taking of property for which compensation must be made under the 14th Amendment. 422.

Local option. A statute denying an appeal in a proceeding to contest a local-option election held not unconstitutional as special legislation, even though an appeal is allowed in proceedings to contest other elections. 377.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Consideration. A release from the engagement, held a sufficient consideration to support an agreement to support a woman whom the promisor, after agreeing to marry, induced to submit to surgical operations which rendered her unable to support herself. 655. An agreement in writing, by one, to take up a past-due note of another if it remains unpaid at a certain future date, without additional consideration to support it, held to be without consideration and unenforceable, where the promisor makes no request for forbearance, and the promisee does not agree to forbear; the mere fact that he does so forbear is not sufficient to establish either such promise or request. 842. Shipping a display cabinet which a hotel proprietor has contracted in writing to place on the counter held not to make the contract mutual, so that it can be enforced against him although not signed by the other party, where it was to run for six years, with a change of cabinet every two years, since the undertaking of the shipper is void under the statute of frauds. 919. An assignment of a land contract held to be a transfer of an interest in real estate, within the statute of frauds. 879. Issued shares in a corporation held to be goods, within statute of frauds. 874.

Incompetent person; infant. A New York case holds that a deed by an incompetent person may be avoided in an action at law to recover possession of the granted premises. 461. An Oklahoma case holds that a grantor in the possession of land described in the deed cannot invoke the aid of equity to have the deed canceled, without offering to refund the consideration received by him, although the deed was executed by him while an infant upon his false and 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) fraudulent representations, believed by the other party, that he was of age. 1056.

Attorney's contract. That an attorney, by the terms of a general employment, debars himself from employment by others whose interests are antagonistic to those of his client, held to be a proper matter for consideration in determining his compensation for services rendered under the contract. 960.

Assignment for creditors. An assignor for creditors held not entitled to complain that the property was sold to a corporation for shares of its stock, where the property was not sufficient to satisfy in full the demand of creditors, and then consented to take the stock in payment of their claim. 682.

Bills and notes. A Kansas case holds that, in the absence of stipulations evincing a different intention, the negotiable quality of a promissory note made in Kansas and payable in Missouri will be determined by the law of Missouri. 665. The word "trustee" added to the payee's name in a written instrument held sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to all the terms and conditions under which it may have been executed. 276. A New York case holds that parol evidence is admissible to show the true relation to a bill of exchange of an irregular indorser notwithstanding the provisions of the negotiable instruments law. 136. The rights of the owner of negotiable paper indorsed in blank and deposited in a receptacle in a bank for safe-keeping held inferior to those of a transferee for value without notice in due course from a bank official, who wrongfully misappropriates the paper and uses it for his own purpose. 106.

Checks. A Kansas case holds that it is not negligence for a bank to pay a check written on the blank of another bank, without making inquiry. 402.

Bonds. A Connecticut case holds that interest may be added to amount of recovery on a bond, although the total sum is thereby made to exceed the penalty of the bond. 83. Mere fear or suspicion on the part of the lessor that a lessee intends to sell intoxicating liquor on the leased premises without authority of law held not to avoid a bond by which the lessee undertakes to hold the lessor harmless from any expenditure or cost because of the unlawful sale of liquor upon the premises. 662.

Railroad-aid bonds. The construction of the road upon a certain route through the county, and the expenditure of the subscription therein, held not a condition precedent to the issuance of county bonds in aid of a railroad, under a vote upon a submission of the question whether or not bonds should be issued upon condition that the company so locate and construct the road and expend the money. 849.

Brokers. A contract by a real-estate broker to find a purchaser of real estate for a compensation held not void because of the failure of the broker to comply with a municipal ordinance enacted pursuant to statute, imposing a license tax upon the business of "real estate." 675. A broker receiving exclusive authority to sell real estate by a writing which he does not sign, held not entitled to recover commissions in case the property is sold by the owner without aid from him, if he fails to show that, prior to the sale, he had used ordinary diligence in attempting to make a sale of the property, resulting in the expenditure of time, money, or effort under the contract. 598.

Building and loan associations. A New Jersey case holds that, as to mortgage debts of borrowing shareholders that became due by the default of the borrower prior to the insolvency of the association, a receiver of an insolvent building and loan association, appointed, proceeds in like manner as the directors of the association might have done if the insolvency had not supervened, as to mortgage debts of borrowing members which became due prior to insolvency by the default of the borrowers. 588.

Carriers. One who boards a car plainly marked as going only as far as the nearest stop to which his ticket entitles him to ride held not entitled to damages where the car turns back after reaching that point, and he is ejected therefrom without undue force after being refused a transfer to another car. 704. A provision in a 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

transportation ticket relieving the carrier from responsibility for the destruction of baggage by fire held binding as to fires not caused by the carrier's negligence, although it is in print so fine that the passenger cannot, because of defective sight, read it, the printed provisions of the ticket being sufficiently conspicuous to charge him with notice that they contain a contract. 100. A New York case holds that an attorney traveling over a street railway simply for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a transfer will be given him at a certain point, as required by statute, which information he desires for the benefit of suits already commenced on behalf of clients for the statutory penalty, is not entitled to bring an action in his own behalf for such penalty. 778. One who boards a train after telegraphing for a reservation on a certain Pullman car, which is not attached to that train, but is to be picked up a few miles down the road, and is allowed to remain in the meantime on another Pullman car, held not a passenger of the Pullman company, so as to render it liable for the negligence of its conductor, resulting in the passenger's missing the car for which his reservation calls. 753. A North Dakota case discusses the general question of the liability of a common carrier of goods, with especial reference to the duty of the shipper and the carrier respectively as to the condition of the cars. 952. The common-law liability of the carrier held not to extend to any damage resulting from the nature, disposition, or viciousness of any animal transported by it. 191. Initial carrier held liable for any damages to goods resulting directly from its negligence, although the loss may not actually occur until after the goods are delivered to the second carrier.

Good will. A Massachusetts case holds that a sales agent located in a commercial center, who, upon surrendering the agency, sells to his principal the good will of the business, cannot derogate from his grant by engaging in a competing business and endeavoring to sell similar goods to his old customers. 762. A sale of the good will of an established business in connection with the sale of the business held not void because unlimited as to time, if reasonable in other respects. 769.

Guaranty. One guaranteeing payment for goods furnished to a certain individual held not liable on guaranty for goods furnished to a company bearing the surname of such individual, in the absence of proof that he solely comprised the company. 901.

Insurance. The holder of a policy of title insurance held not entitled, upon the insolvency of the company, to a return of that part of the premium which the application for insurance stipulated might be retained by the company for its services in investigating the title insured. 639. The appointment of a receiver in a suit to take possession and control of the property, who takes actual possession of it, held to prevent a recovery upon a fire-insurance policy conditioned that it shall be void if any change takes place in the interest, title, or possession of the property, "whether by legal process, or judgment, or otherwise." 643. Loss of a barn knocked down by lightning, but not burned, held not recoverable under a policy in a mutual insurance company insuring against loss by fire, although the custom has been to pay such losses and levy assessments therefor. 421. A fire caused by the leaking of gasoline from a tank of an automobile when it ran into a ditch, and the explosion when the vapor penetrated the lamp forming the headlight, held to have originated within the vehicle, within the meaning of an exception of fire so originating, in a policy of insurance on the automobile. 133. Failure to attach a copy of the application to the policy held not to preclude the insurer from relying on the breach of conditions and warranties in the policy, although they are similar to those contained in the application. 102. A statement in an accident-insurance policy that, in consideration of the warranties and agreements in the application, the applicant is insured, held not to make the application a part of the contract, so as to render a statement in it as to the age of the applicant a warranty. 88. Consultation by the applicant with a physician, within the meaning of a question in the application, shown by the fact that her husband notified a physician that she was indisposed and asked him to attend her, and, on his arrival at the house, she advised him of her symptoms and received aid from him. 798. Rupture of the heart, which was in a state of fatty degeneration, by assisting in carrying a door, or by filling the lungs with air by drawing a long breath after putting it down, causing death, held not within the provisions of a policy insuring against death from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means. 1026. Notification of a policy holder by an insurer, after the premium note is overdue, that, unless the note is paid at once, it will be compelled to return the note, which will cancel the policy, held to be a waiver of the forfeiture for nonpayment of the note when due, preventing the insurer from insisting upon the forfeiture upon learning that the insured was in a dying condition when the notification was mailed. 227. An adult 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

son held to have an insurable interest in the life of his mother, although he is not dependent upon her for support and has no direct pecuniary interest in her life. 233.

Landlord and tenant. A Tennessee case holds that a lease for years of property to be used for the sale of intoxicating liquor is terminated by the adoption, during the term, of a law making the sale of liquor illegal. 964. But a Georgia case holds that the lessee is not entitled to a reduction or proportional abatement of the agreed rental upon the passage of a prohibitory act after the commencement of a lease of a hotel described as consisting, inter alia, of a bar, and providing that the tenant might sublet the bar. 966.

Release. An acknowledgment by the plaintiff of satisfaction against two of several defendants who are sued as joint wrongdoers held not to release the others, when the instrument discloses that it was not intended to have such effect. 618.

Sale. A conditional vendee of personalty, who agrees that, upon failure to make the requisite payments, the vendor may take possession of the property and remove the same, held not entitled to recover against the latter in trespass for using only such force "in retaking the property as was requisite to overcome resistance wrongfully interposed by him. 606. Where a merchant directed another to have shipped to him corn of a certain kind and grade at a certain price over a certain railroad, the weight and grade of the corn to be evidenced by a certain official certificate, held that the fact that the corn became heated while in transit will not excuse the vendee from payment of the purchase price. 261. The destruction of cotton by fire before actual delivery, preventing the ascertainment of the purchase price by weighing by the buyer at the time of actual delivery as contemplated by the contract, held to defeat the sale and prevent an action for the purchase price. 197. An Iowa case holds that a warranty that an apparatus installed will produce certain results cannot be established by parol, where the contract of sale is in writing. 1183.

Telegram. The sendee of a telegram held bound by the terms of the contract with the sender that the company will not be answerable for mistakes in transmission, beyond the price, unless the message is repeated, where the message is sent in response to one from the sendee seeking information, which makes the sender the sendee's agent to transmit it. 1021. See also infra, VIII., Mental anguish.

Usury. A loan held not usurious because the agent of the lender, without his knowledge or consent, exacts from the borrower a bonus for his services in addition to the highest legal rate of interest which the contract reserves for the benefit of the lender. 399. An Iowa case holds that a loan by one of money in his possession belonging to another, which he handles entirely according to his own judgment, cannot be freed from the taint of usury, whether he bears to the owner the relation of debtor or that of attorney, by the device of calling himself in the papers the agent of the borrower, and designating the excess over legal interest commission for his services. 391.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Corporations. The trust-fund doctrine, requiring one who pays for corporate stock in property to show that the property was actually worth the value of the stock, held not applicable as between the corporation itself and the stockholder. 115. A Minnesota case holds that, where shares of stock are transferred to a party as collateral, and are so registered in the stock record, the transferee is not liable as a stockholder for the debts of the corporation. 249. The statutory liability of stockholders for the debts of the corporation held to extend to interest on claims beyond the time the affairs of the corporation are placed in the hands of a receiver, although the commissioner appointed to determine the claims in the receivership proceedings was instructed to allow interest to the date of the receivership. 428.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

Antenuptial contract. Acceptance by a wife of the sum allowed her by a decree of divorce in lieu of dower, held to bar her rights under an antenuptial contract which provides for payment to her, at her husband's death, of a certain sum of money in lieu of dower. 384.

Divorce. A Georgia case holds that a judgment in personam for temporary alimony and attorneys' fees cannot be lawfully rendered in a divorce suit against a non-resident husband who is not served with process within the state and does not appear, but is only constructively served by publication. 193. A Michigan case holds that the courts of one state may enforce the decree of another for alimony payable in instalments, where no power to change the decree is reserved by the court or conferred by statute. 245.

Entireties. A wife holding land by entireties with her husband held not entitled to partition of trees cut therefrom by him, nor of lumber into which they are converted, since both are seised of the entirety. 1037.

Death of wife. A husband held not entitled to recover damages for the loss of the society, care, and comfort of his wife, due to her death because of the neglect of a physician engaged by him to attend her, unless the action is brought under the statute providing for damages for death caused by negligence. 633.

Married woman's liability for tort. A Florida case holds that a married woman is not liable in an action of tort against her husband and herself jointly, for injuries sustained by a patron of a swimming pool and bath house on real estate owned by her, conducted by herself and husband as a public resort. 531.

Support. A decree refusing a divorce to a man because of his adultery held not to prevent his setting up the adultery of the wife, on which the former action was based, in defense of a statutory action by her for support, in which such a defense is expressly authorized by statute. 468.

V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS: PERSONAL CAPACITY; AGENCY.

Executors and administrators. A claim against the estate of a decedent in the hands of an administrator with the will annexed in one state held not barred because not presented and therefore barred against the estate of the decedent in the hands of the domiciliary executors in another state. 553.

Principal and agent. A Washington case holds that an agent of a corporation 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may be properly found to have received property in satisfaction of notes, where he sold machinery for which the notes were issued, received the notes and the mortgage securing them, collected all payments upon them, and conducted the proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, although an officer of the corporation stated that his authority was only to collect the notes. 324.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; NUISANCES.

Automobile. A Wisconsin case holds that an automobile which has been purchased with the understanding that the purchaser's son shall be taught to operate it may be found to be in the possession of the son as agent of the purchaser while the instructions are being given. 332. That the daughter of defendant was accustomed to drive his automobile, asking his permission when he was at home, but taking it without his permission when he was not at home, held insufficient to show that she was his servant or agent, so as to render him liable for injuries inflicted by her while negligently using the machine for her own pleasure. 335.

"Attractive nuisance;" "turntable doctrine." A California case applies the doctrine of attractive nuisance where a railroad company left a loaded push car unfastened and unattended, standing in a street on a grade down which, if started, it could not be readily stopped, a child having been caught and crushed while attempting to stop the car after it had been set in motion. 1094. But the doctrine is repudiated in a Connecticut case holding that persons engaged in the demolition of a building which is left with standing chimneys on Saturday night are not, although the building is uninclosed, bound to anticipate that children may, during the next day, trespass on the property and undermine the chimneys, suffering injury in their fall. 1101. So, a Kentucky case holds that the fact that a railroad company has left a pile of sand unguarded on a vacant lot adjacent to its tracks, which is attractive to children, will not render it liable to a child who, attracted thereto to play, attempts to board a passing train to his injury. 1112. And a North Carolina case holds that the mere maintenance of an insecurely covered well of hot water upon an open space unfenced from the street, near the rear of a theater, will not render the owner liable for injury to a thirteen-year-old child of average intelligence who falls into it, although the child is allured to the place by a desire to see what is going on in the rear part of the theater. 1116. And an Ohio case, disapproving the doctrine of the turntable cases, holds that a railroad company is not liable to an infant who comes upon its premises without invitation, and who is injured there while playing, without its knowledge, on a turntable. 1136. Likewise, a Pennsylvania case holds that a railroad company owes no duty to a trespassing child to lock or guard its turntables, although such machines are calculated to allure children to them for amusement. 1162.

Fright. Damages for mental pain and anguish, illness, threatened miscarriage, and possibly permanent injuries, due to fright resulting from an assault committed by a stranger in the hearing of a pregnant woman, held too remote to form a basis of action on her behalf, against the assailant. 225.

Injury on highways. A property owner who throws water from his roof by means of a spout, onto his walk, from which it flows to a public walk, where it freezes, held liable for injuries thereby caused to a pedestrian who is in the exercise of due care. 236. A municipal corporation held liable for an injury through the negligent operation of a bridge maintained as part of its highway system, to one sent to take measurements beneath it. 1178. A municipal corporation permitting the maintenance by an electric railway company of a trolley pole in the street in such manner as to constitute a dangerous obstruction to public travel held liable to a traveler injured thereby. 506. The motorman of an electric car which passes immediately in front of a fire-engine house held guilty of double negligence when he drives the car at full speed in approaching the house and fails to see, in time to enable him to stop the car and avoid collision with an outgoing hose wagon, a signal given whilst his car is nearly 150 feet distant from the engine house. 623.

Master and servant. An Arkansas case holds that a miner does not assume the risk of injury from the master's breach of its statutory duty to furnish necessary props to make the room in which he is working safe. 646. A master held not chargeable with negligence in employing a minor to work on dangerous machinery in violation of the terms of a statute, if, in the exercise of proper vigilance and due caution, he was led to believe that the employee was above statutory age. 783. A wire stretched over and across a railroad track, not high enough to permit an employee standing on the top of a freight car to pass safely thereunder, held not to constitute a "defect in the way or track," within the employer's liability act, where there is nothing to indicate that the wire is not a mere movable object, temporarily placed too near the track. 738. One engaged in discharging coal from vessels, who provides suitable apparatus for the work, held not responsible to an employee for the manner in which it is set up by the men employed in doing the work. 680. A Massachusetts case holds that it may properly be found to be negligence for a street car company to fail to take precautions against the forgetting or misunderstanding of an order which requires a regular car to await the arrival of a special one before proceeding, where the result of its nonob-servance may be death. 239. A master held not negligent in failing to warn an adult employee of ordinary intelligence, who had had several months' experience in drilling holes for blasting and in the actual firing of the blasts, of the danger of putting powder into a drill hole in which dynamite had been exploded, before the fire from the fuse and wrappings had had time to burn out. 997. When the method adopted by a salt company for carrying on its business involves the occasional dislodging of masses of salt, held that the duty to warn employees before such dislodgment is a nondelegable one. 749. The promise of the master, on the complaint of an employee, to furnish another step ladder, held not to relieve the employee from the imputation of having assumed the risk by continuing to use the defective ladder. 793. The rights of a section man on a street railway, injured while riding to work from his home on the company's car without paying fare in accordance with a custom of the company to carry such employees free upon displaying badges furnished to them, held not those of a passenger, but merely those of an employee. 717. A Massachusetts case holds that an employer may be liable for an injury to his employee through his falling into a machine by stumbling over a nail projecting from the floor near the machine, which is concealed by the litter on the floor. 242. The rule that the master's duty to furnish a reasonably safe place to work cannot be devolved upon a fellow servant, so as to relieve the master, held not applicable in favor of a member of a gang of workmen whose duty it is to enter a portion of a trench in course of construction, after a blast had been fired by a preceding gang, and assist in removing broken stone, who was injured by the fall of some loose dirt by the side of the trench (340); or in favor of an employee injured while engaged with fellow servants under a competent foreman in a detail of the work of removing a bank of earth and gravel by the fall of an overhanging ledge, which was a condition arising on the day of the accident, and not a condition previously existing (344); or to a place at which railroad employees are engaged in clearing the tracks of débris from a land slide (348); or to the slippery condition of a passageway caused by ice formed 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as a necessary result of the trucking down over the platform as a part of the regular work of the establishment or through the negligence of fellow servants, the injured employee having long been cognizant of the fact of ice being there in freezing weather (355). So, the duty of caring for the safety of a place, or of appliances, in cases in which the work which the servants are employed to do necessarily changes the character of the place or of the appliances as to safety as the work progresses, held to be the duty of the fellow servants to whom the work is intrusted, and not the duty of the master. 361. But one who puts his servant to work in a ditch, held bound, when he takes upon himself the direction and control of the work, to see that the place is reasonably safe when the servant enters it, and is kept reasonably safe so long as the servant is required to stay there. 367. A master held responsible for the torts of his servant, done in the course of his employment with a view to the furtherance of his master's business, and not for a purpose personal to himself, whether the same are done wilfully but within the scope of his agency, or in excess of his authority, or contrary to the express instructions of his master. 255.

Injury to passenger. One held not negligent as a matter of law in boarding a street car after it was in motion, so that he was on the running board looking for a seat when the car reached an obstruction near the track which was in plain view, notwithstanding that he might have boarded the car before it started and gained a seat inside the car. 296. A street railway company held negligent in maintaining tracks, used by cars running in opposite directions, so close together that the natural swaying of the cars in motion, emphasized by an uneven condition of the track, brings the cars from 3 to 6 inches from each other, without taking any precautions to prevent injury to passengers. 213. Failure of the conductor to notify passengers inside the car that the train had not reached the station when it stopped, held not the proximate cause of injury to a passenger who unnecessarily and voluntarily rode on the platform, and attempted to alight, to his injury, before the train had reached the station. 1028. One who, without paying fare, voluntarily attempts to ride in a cab of a locomotive at the invitation of those in charge of the train, held to assume the known hazards incident to the exposed position, so that he cannot hold the company liable for injuries in a collision of the cab with a car negligently left on a side track. 988.

Railroad crossing. One undertaking to cross between freight cars standing on a switch track with only a narrow opening between them, to reach a railroad station, held to assume the risk of injury from the opening being closed in the operation of the road. 558.

Electricity. An electric company which maintains defectively insulated wires over another's roof in violation of a penal ordinance of a municipality held not liable for the death of a boy who, in trespassing on the roof, comes in contact with the wires and is killed. 504.

Places of amusement. A roller-skating rink held to be within a statute imposing a penalty for exclusion, on account of color, of any person from the privilege of inns, restaurants, saloons, barber shops, eating houses, public conveyances, or any other place of public accommodation or amusement. 907. A ferry company which maintains a pleasure resort on its own property for a particular class of persons whose patronage it invites and for whose accommodation it runs a boat devoted exclusively to their transportation held not, so far as that enterprise is concerned, a common carrier. 872. That a transportation company maintaining a pleasure resort at the termination of its line as an inducement to persons to patronize the line charges no fee for admission, depending for its profit on the passengers carried, held not to exempt it from the rule requiring the owners of pleasure resorts to protect invited guests from unusual occurrences which may result in serious danger to them. 772.

Concurrent negligence. A tenant held not precluded from holding one who causes the fall of a wall of a building upon him through negligent excavation of the adjoining lot liable for the injury thereby caused to his goods, by the fact that one of the proximate and efficient causes of the falling of the wall was the negligence of his landlord. 498.

Contributory negligence. A Kansas case holds that it is not per se negligence for a man sixty-eight years old to stand up while riding in a dray in a city street. 223.

Imputed negligence. A husband's negligence as driver of a conveyance in which his wife was riding at the time of an injury held not imputable to her, so as to prevent her recovering against the other negligent person, where the relation of principal and agent or master and servant did not exist between them. 230.

Last clear chance. A licensee held not entitled to hold the railroad liable for injuries caused by a piece of lumber which is struck by a passing train, if, by the exercise of care which an ordinarily prudent 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

man would have exercised under similar circumstances, he could have discovered the danger in time to have avoided the injury. 453. Whether the negligence of a railroad conductor, who, in the course of his work, placed himself in the way of an expected passenger train, will preclude his recovery for injuries received from the train, held to be for the jury upon evidence that the train was running at an extraordinary and illegal rate of speed, not under full control as required by the company's rule, and might have been stopped before striking him after the engineer discovered that he was so absorbed in his work as to be unconscious of his peril. 446.

Libel. The publication by a newspaper of the report of a meeting of a private corporation, which contains libelous statements made by stockholders against the officers, held not privileged. 862.

Trover. A sheriff who takes from a prisoner in his custody property rightfully belonging to the prisoner, and thereafter surrenders it to another, in disregard of the prisoner's rights, and in recognition of an adverse claim asserted by another, held guilty of conversion and liable in trover, without any precedent demand for a return of the property. 833.

Malice. A Massachusetts case holds that an officer of a corporation may be liable for maliciously inducing it to break its contract with its employee and discharge him from his employment. 561.

Manufacturer. A manufacturer of canned goods held to be under a duty to one who, in the ordinary course of trade, becomes an ultimate consumer, to exercise care that the goods are wholesome and fit for food, and not tainted with poison. 923.

Nuisance. An Arkansas case holds that the operation of a planing mill objectionable to occupants of neighboring houses by reason of noise, smoke, and cinders will not be perpetually enjoined where the preponderance of the evidence does not show that it is of such a nature as to deprive normal persons living where complainant lives, of the comforts of a home, or render living in such homes a positive discomfort. 174. An Alabama case holds that a state may maintain a bill to abate a nuisance in a city street. 1173. The owner of property adjoining that on which a liquor nuisance is maintained, held to have sufficient interest to entitle him to seek a writ of certiorari to review a consent decree, in a suit by a citizen to enjoin the maintenance of the nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community. 610. A near-by property owner who, together with those in his employ, is compelled to witness indecent conduct of which would have resulted by a continuance of the mother's life. 128. See also infra, Mental anguish.

Mental anguish. A Minnesota case denies the right to recover for mental anguish from the breach of a contract by a railroad company to transport a corpse, occasioning a delay of twenty-four hours in the funeral arrangements, there being no evidence of wilful or malicious conduct on the part of the company or its agents. 564. A telegraph company which fails promptly to transmit money sent by a father to secure the forwarding of the corpse of his daughter for burial, held liable to him for mental pain and anguish by reason of the delay in shipment of the corpse. 575. The mere fact that the wife of the addressee of a telegram was a sister of the one whose death is announced by the message held not sufficient to entitle her to recover damages for mental anguish because of its non-delivery. 475. Damages for mental anguish held not recoverable by the undisclosed principal for delay in transmitting and delivering a telegram announcing death, although both the sender and sendee are his agents. 479. A Kentucky case holds that, in actions to recover for mental anguish from the failure to deliver a telegram, the plaintiff should be confined to a statement of the mere facts of mental anguish, and not permitted to introduce testimony as to special relations or conditions. 409. An Iowa case holds that no presumption of mental suffering will arise in case of failure to deliver a telegram announcing the death of a relative, by affinity only, such as a son's wife; and that it is necessary in such cases to plead and prove facts showing special friendship or affection, although it is not necessary to show that the telegraph company had notice of such facts. 374. One accompanying her invalid sister on a railroad journey, who does not make the contract for the transportation, held not entitled to recover damages for mental suffering due to the physical suffering of the invalid because of the wrongful acts of the carrier. 500.

Evidence. A Vermont case holds that one killed at a railroad crossing under circumstances of which there was no witness cannot be presumed to have been in the exercise of due care, in an action to hold the company liable. 973. The presumption of negligence arising from the setting out of a fire by a locomotive held not defeated by the fact that the setting of the fire by the locomotive was proven by circumstantial, rather than direct, evidence. 742. A Pennsylvania case holds that, where an intentional killing by the use of a deadly weapon has been established, accused has the burden of showing that it was in self-defense, by a fair preponderance of facts. 483. The record of a deed held not admissible to prove its existence, on behalf of the grantee claiming under it. 438.

Res ipsa loquitur. A Virginia case holds that, when a passenger shows an injury to himself by the breaking of the carrier's bridge, the burden is cast upon the carrier of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that the accident and resulting injury were caused by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented. 316. The derailment and overturning of a freight car in a train held not such evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company towards its brakeman as to cast upon it the burden of exonerating itself from the charge of negligence. 790.

Election of remedies. Bringing an action upon express contract for electric lights furnished to a city held not an election which will preclude an action upon quantum meruit in case the first action is dismissed for failure to prove compliance with the contract. 219.

Limitation of actions. A single transaction on an account which has been dormant less than the statutory period, consisting of the debit of a small item and the credit of an amount necessary to cancel it a short time afterwards, held sufficient to bring the account within a statute providing that the cause of action in mutual accounts shall be deemed to accrue at the time of the last item proved in such account. 126.

New trial. A Colorado case holds that a verdict will be set aside, and the party in whose favor it was rendered required to pay the costs regardless of his intent, where, pending the action, he took jurors to a bar to drink in the absence of other jurors and the officers in charge of them. 733.

Judgment. A judgment discharging a subscriber to the stock of a corporation as garnishee for its debt upon failure of the plaintiff to contest his answer denying indebtedness held res judicata of the question of indebtedness, in a subsequent direct proceeding by the creditor against him to apply his individual stock subscription to the payment of the corporate indebtedness. 604. A Wisconsin case holds that equity will enjoin the enforcement of a judgment secured by perjury where the judgment debtor used diligence, but failed to discover the perjury in time to be available at the trial, or to secure the relief provided by statute in such cases. 1080.

Writ and process; name. A Califor-

(CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.)

nia case holds that jurisdiction in an action to quiet title to real estate may be acquired, as against a married woman, upon publication of a summons against her in her maiden name in which she took title to the property. 983. Where initials instead of a given name before a surname are used to identify a person in court proceedings, the initials must be all given and correctly given. 905.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

Adultery. The spouse of either of the guilty parties held entitled to make complaint against either or both under a statute providing that no prosecution for adultery shall be commenced except on the complaint of the husband or wife. 786.

Confession. A confession of one charged with obtaining money by false pretenses by means of a worthless check, that the check was known by him to be worthless, held sufficiently corroborated by evidence that the check was forwarded through the regular channels for collection, and returned unpaid. 443.

Presence of accused. A West Virginia case holds that it is prejudicial error for the court, after receiving a prisoner's plea of guilty of murder in the first degree and before pronouncing judgment, to proceed with and inquire as to the circumstances and facts of the killing, whether the inquiry be for the personal satisfaction of the judge, or to advise him as to the character of the judgment that should be pronounced. 713.

Defendant's Testimony. An instruction to the jury in a criminal case that they are not bound to consider the testimony of defendant as absolutely true, but are to remember that he speaks in his own behalf, and to consider the great temptation which one so situated is under to speak so as to procure an acquittal, held erroneous. 802.

Gambling. A pool table for the use of which the loser of the game is, within the knowledge of the keeper, to pay, held a gambling device, within the meaning of a statute providing for punishment on one who exhibits such devices. 913.

Commitment. A court which, after imposing a judgment of imprisonment, makes an order under which the defendant is discharged from custody, held to have no power er or jurisdiction, after the lapse of the time involved in the sentence, and after the term, to issue commitment on such judgment. 1041.

Embezzlement. A laundress held guilty of embezzlement who, upon discovering in a clothes basket committed to her a bag of money belonging to her employer, accidentally placed therein, recognized her duty to return it to the owner, but subsequently and before returning it fraudulently converted the money. 371.

Indictment and information. A paper writing purporting to be an information, not exhibited or presented by the county attorney or someone authorized by law, held invalid and incapable of amendment so as to confer jurisdiction of the prosecution upon the county court. 1050.

Intoxicating liquor. A Kansas case holds that, a Manhattan cocktail being generally and popularly known as an intoxicating liquor, no proof of its intoxicating character is necessary in a prosecution under the prohibitory law. 848.

Malice. An Idaho case holds that, in a prosecution for maliciously killing, wounding, or maiming dogs, the state must either show that the defendant entertained malice against the owner of the dogs, or that the killing, wounding, or maiming was characterized by such wanton and reckless disregard of the rights of property in others as to raise the presumption of malice from the manner of the commission of the act. 835. The word "maliciously" as used in a statute relating to the crime of "malicious mischief" held to import that the act to which it relates must have resulted from actual ill-will or revenge, implying an intent to vex and annoy the owner of the property injured. 273.

1. The owner of a pleasure resort, who permits the playing of ball away from the portion of the grounds devoted to such sport and near to that devoted to dancing, without notifying those interested in the dancing or taking precautions to protect them from injury, may be liable for an injury inflicted by a ball thrown upon a spectator of the dancing. Blakeley v. White Star Line, 19: 772, 118 N. W. 482, — Mich. —.

(Annotated)

2. That a transportation company maintaining a pleasure resort at the termination of its line as an inducement to persons to patronize the line charges no fee for admission to it, depending for its profit on the passengers carried, does not exempt it from the rule requiring the owners of pleasure resorts to protect invited guests from unusual occurrences which may result in serious danger to them. Blakeley v. White Star Line, 19: 772, 118 N. W. 482, — Mich. —.

Criminal liability for killing dog, see Malicious Mischief, 4.

1. Malice is the gist of the action in a statutory prosecution for maliciously killing, maiming, or wounding a dog, and must be established beyond a reasonable doubt in order to justify a conviction. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

(Annotated)

2. In a prosecution for maliciously killing, wounding, or maiming dogs, the state must either show that the defendant entertained malice against the owner of the dogs, or that the killing, wounding, or maiming was characterized by such wanton and reckless disregard of the rights of property in others as to raise the presumption of malice from the manner of the commission of the act. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

3. The owner of premises is justified in using such force in ejecting dogs which are 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

chasing and worrying his live stock to its apparent danger, as a reasonably prudent man would use under like circumstances in defense and protection of his property. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

4. An owner of premises is justified in using such force as is necessary to eject therefrom dogs which are harassing and worrying gravid animals in such a manner as will likely cause pecuniary loss, even though he has knowledge of the traits and habits of that particular breed of dogs, and that they would not in fact kill or maim a domestic animal. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

Statute denying appeal in proceedings to contest local-option election, see Constitutional Law, 3; Statutes, 4.

Right of appeal; finality of decision.

1. An order sustaining a demurrer to a petition to contest a local-option election is a determination of the merits, from which no appeal can be taken, under a statute providing that the trial court shall have final jurisdiction to hear and determine the merits of such cases. Saylor v. Duel, 19: 377, 86 N. E. 119, 236 Ill. 429.

2. A provision in a local-option law that the county court shall have final jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter of contested elections under the statute makes inapplicable a general statute providing for appeals in contested-election cases, and prevents an appeal in such cases. Saylor v. Duel, 19: 377, 86 N. E. 119, 236 Ill. 429.

3. A judgment on demurrer is a final judgment, reviewable on error. Tomlinson v. Armour & Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 923, 70 Atl. 314, 75 N. J. 748.
Record on appeal.

4. The court of appeals will not consider an objection based on a rule of the nisi prius court unless a copy of the rule appears in the record. Bennett v. Bennett, 19: 121, 66 Atl. 706, 106 Md. 122.

5. A record which sets forth simply that the court below, having heard argument upon a demurrer to the petition, and having duly considered same, did order that the demurrer be sustained with costs, recites a judgment sufficient in substance for purposes of review, although there was no formal judgment or any award of a specific sum for costs, and joinder in error and argument of the cause upon the merits having been made, the record should be treated as if amended in the court of review with respect to matters of form. Tomlinson v. Armour

& Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 923, 70 Atl. 314, 75 N. J. 748.

6. The common joinder in error is an admission by the defendant in error that what is returned as the record of the judgment below is true; and after such joinder neither party can of right allege diminution or have a certiorari. Tomlinson v. Armour & Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 923, 70 Atl. 314, 75 N. J. 748.

7. The technical phrase, ideo consideration est, is not necessary to constitute such a judgment as will support a writ of error, as the want thereof, being merely a defect of form, can be amended in the court of review. Tomlinson v. Armour & Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 923, 70 Atl. 314, 75 N. J. 748.

8. An order determining the provisions of the judgment on the subject of costs necessarily affects the judgment within the meaning of a statute requiring such orders to be included in the judgment roll, and also within the operation of a statute permitting intermediate orders to be reviewed, whether excepted to or not. Jones v. Broadway Roller Rink Co. 19: 907, 118 N. W. 170, — Wis. —.

Objections and exceptions.

9. An exception that a charge is contrary to law is too general to be of avail on appeal. W. T. Walker Furniture Co. v. Dyson, 19: 606, 32 App. D. C. 90.

What matters reviewable generally.

10. The allowance or denial of a motion for a new trial, filed after a general verdict in a lower court, is largely a matter of judicial discretion as to the finding of facts and the weight of evidence involved in the verdict, but alleged errors of law occurring upon the trial are not matters of discretion, and are fully subject to review upon appeal. Manker v. Tough, 19: 675, 98 Pac. 792, — Kan. —.

11. The exclusion, in an action against a property owner for injuries to a pedestrian falling on a sidewalk because of the alleged freezing of water turned from his roof onto the walk, of a photograph of the direction taken by water coming from the roof during a severe rainstorm, is not so plainly wrong that it will be interfered with by the reviewing court. Field v. Gowdy, 19: 236, 85 N. E. 884, 199 Mass. 568.

12. A person cannot complain of a favorable amendment, pending appeal, of a judgment which inadvertently failed to afford him relief to which he was entitled. Brown v. Sebastopol, 19: 178, 96 Pac. 363, 153 Cal. 704.

Discretionary matters.

13. The determination of the chancellor that, because of laches, a joint tenant should not be permitted to share in the benefit of a purchase by his cotenant under an outstanding encumbrance on the property, will not be interfered with on appeal, except in case of abuse of discretion. Stevenson v. Boyd, 19: 525, 96 Pac. 284, 153 Cal. 630.

14. The right to permit a defendant to withdraw his plea of "guilty of murder in the first degree," after having withdrawn his former plea of "not guilty," and allow him to plead anew his plea of "not guilty," and to have a trial thereon before a jury, rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, and is reviewable on appeal for any abuse. State v. Stevenson, 19: 713, 82 S. E. 688, — W. Va. —.

15. The question of granting or overruling a motion to require an election between a count upon an express contract and a count upon quantum meruit, in a suit on account for legal services rendered, is addressed to the discretion of the court, where there is more or less uncertainty as to the grounds for recovery. Mellon v. Fulton, 19: 960, 93 Pac. 911, — Okla. —.

Questions not raised below.

16. A plaintiff who makes no objection to the jurisdiction of a Federal court to which the case is removed on the ground of diverse citizenship because neither party resides within the district, but proceeds with the trial, will not be heard to raise the objection on appeal. Shanberg v. Fidelity & C. Co. 19: 1206, 158 Fed. 1, 85 C. C. A. 343.

Errors waived or cured below.

17. Error in an instruction on a vital issue in a case is not cured by another instruction which correctly states the law which should be applied to that issue, but which is, in fact, applied to another contention in the case. Wagner v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 19: 1028, 61 S. E. 171, 147 N. C. 315.

Review of facts.

18. Decisions by a referee that legal services were rendered under a general, as distinguished from a special, contract, will not be disturbed upon appeal where the evidence is conflicting. Mellon v. Fulton, 19: 960, 98 Pac. 911, — Okla. —.

Grounds for reversal.

19. Erroneous rulings, if not prejudicial to the rights of the party, may be disregarded; but where the findings are contrary to the evidence, and the erroneous rulings may have misled the jury, they are material and constitute reversible error. Fleming v. Thorp, 19: 915, 96 Pac. 470, — Kan. —.

20. Refusal to continue a case to permit defendant to take the deposition of plaintiff to enable him to prepare his defense, to which he has a right by statute, is prejudicial error. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Williams, 19: 409, 112 S. W. 651, — Ky. —.

21. A judgment will not be reversed because of refusal of the trial court to strike out portions of a pleading because redundant, or a legal conclusion, in the absence of anything to show prejudice therefrom. Smith v. Hicks, 19: 938, 98 Pac. 138, — N. M. —.

22. An inadvertent insertion of a word in an instruction to the jury is not reversible error where it operates in favor of the complaining party. Hiroux v. Baum, 19: 332, 118 N. W. 533, — Wis. —.

23. Statements by counsel in argument, of facts outside the record, will not require reversal if the admonition of the court was sufficient to cause the jury to disregard the statement. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Quigley, 19: 575, 112 S. W. 897, — Ky. —.

24. A conviction for obtaining money by false pretenses will not be reversed because the prosecuting attorney, in his argument to the jury, stated that the defendant was committing adultery every day, where he was living with a woman not his wife, and the gist of the argument was not that his relations were such as the word used defines, but that they were immoral and affected the credibility of the accused. People v. Ranney, 19: 443, 116 N. W. 999, 153 Mich. 293.

25. It is prejudicial error for the court, after receiving a prisoner's plea of guilty of murder in the first degree, and before pronouncing judgment thereon, to proceed, in the absence of the prisoner to examine witnesses and hear, from the special judge who presided at the time of receiving such plea, statements respecting the circumstances and facts of the killing, whether such examination be for the personal satisfaction of the judge pronouncing the judgment of the court, or to advise him as to the character of judgment that should be pronounced on said plea. State v. Stevenson, 19: 713, 62 S. E. 688, — W. Va. —.

26. It is reversible error for a regular judge, pending the trial of a cause begun and continued before a special judge, duly elected to preside in the absence of such regular judge, on making his appearance at the same term, to assume jurisdiction thereof, proceed with the trial, and pronounce judgment therein. State v. Stevenson, 19: 713, 62 S. E. 688, — W. Va. —.

27. A verdict recovered by a party who, pending the action, took jurors to the bar to drink in the absence of other jurors and the officers in charge of them, will be set aside at the instance of the other party; and he will be required to pay the costs regardless of the absence of wrongful intent or the fact that the verdict was not influenced thereby. Scott v. Tubbs, 19: 733, 95 Pac. 540, 43 Colo. 221. (Annotated)

28. A verdict directed for defendant in an action against a railroad company for killing a person at a railroad crossing will not be reversed where nothing in evidence before the court tends to show the exercise of care by the person killed, or anything that in law would excuse it, merely because the jury viewed the premises and might have seen something not disclosed by the evidence which would have warranted a recovery. Shum v. Rutland R. Co. 19: 973, 69 Atl. 945, — Vt. —.

29. A judgment which is proper upon the undisputed facts shown by the record will be affirmed upon appeal without considering whether the reasons given by the trial judge for his conclusion were competent and adequate to support the same. Bowhay v. Richards, 19: 883, 116 N. W. 677, — Neb. —.

APPEARANCE.

To set aside judgment for lack of jurisdiction, see Judgment, 3.

ARBITRATION.

1. A general stipulation in a contract of lease that, in case of difference between the parties, it shall be referred to arbitration, does not prevent either party from resorting to the courts in the first instance without such reference unless the stipulation makes such submission the only mode by which the amount of damages may be ascertained or by which liability can be fixed. Lawrence v. White, 19: 966, 63 S. E. 631, — Ga. —.

2. No valid award can be made without notice to the parties of the selection of the third arbitrator and of the time and place of meeting to make the award, where arbitrators who have failed to agree select a third arbitrator in accordance with the terms of the arbitration agreement. Bray v. Staples, 19: 696, 62 S. E. 780, — N. C. —. (Annotated)

3. The original rights of parties who have entered into an arbitration agreement are not affected by a judgment setting aside an award because the arbitrators acted without giving the necessary notice to the parties. Bray v. Staples, 19: 696, 62 S. E. 780, — N. C. —.

Duty of assignor to show that he is entitled to interest on funds kept by assignee in bank, see Evidence, 4.

Enforcement against assignee of equitable mortgage on property, see Mortgage.

1. An assignor for creditors cannot set aside a sale of the property to a corporation because an agent of the assignee, who was managing the property, was a stockholder in the purchasing corporation, and, before the deed was executed, he increased his holdings out of stock issued to pay for the property, and one of the assignees became a stockholder, and both were elected directors of the purchasing corporation. Whitman v. McIntyre, 19: 682, 85 N. E. 426, 199 Mass. 436.

2. An assignor for creditors cannot complain that the property was sold to a corporation for shares of its stock where the property was not sufficient to satisfy in full the demand of creditors, and they consented to take the stock in payment of their claims. Whitman v. McIntyre, 19: 682, 85 N. E. 426, 199 Mass. 436. (Annotated.)

Institution of disbarment proceedings by commonwealth's attorney, see State.

1. Conviction in another jurisdiction is not within the provision of a statute declaring that an attorney must be disbarred upon his conviction of a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and permitting his disbarment if he shall have been convicted in open court of some criminal offense showing himself unfit to be trusted. State v. Ebbs, 19: 892, 63 S. E. 190, — N. C. —. (Annotated)

2. Courts have no inherent power to disbar an attorney for conviction of crime in a foreign jurisdiction where the legislature has expressly provided what convictions shall result in disbarment, which do not include those in foreign jurisdictions. State v. Ebbs, 19: 892, 63 S. E. 190, — N. C. —.

3. An attorney who impliedly debars himself, under the terms of a general retainer, from employment by others whose interests are antagonistic to those of his clients, may recover a retaining fee in a suit for services rendered under such general employment. Mellon v. Fulton, 19: 960, 98 Pac. 911, — Okla. —. (Annotated)

Rights of bona fide holders.

1. The indorsement by the payee of a.

note, of his name under a guaranty of payment combined with a waiver of demand, notice, and protest, constitutes a blank indorsement, so as to pass title to one who takes the paper in due course for value. Voss v. Chamberlain, 19: 106, 117 N. W. 269, — Iowa, —.

2. A transferee of negotiable paper need not show that he paid for it in order to hold it against the payee, from whom it was obtained by fraud, under a statute providing that a bona fide holder for value may not recover against the maker a greater sum than he paid for the paper if it was procured by fraud upon the maker. Voss v. Chamberlain, 19: 106, 117 N. W. 269, — Iowa, —.

3. The return by a bank officer to the private receptacle of a customer, of negotiable paper indorsed in blank which such official had wrongfully taken from such receptacle and pledged for his own indebtedness, and had recovered from the pledgee ostensibly for collection, does not render the owner a new holder for value, which will render his rights superior to those of the pledgee. Voss v. Chamberlain, 19: 106, 117 N. W. 269, — Iowa, —.

4. The rights of the owner of negotiable paper which is indorsed in blank and deposited in a receptacle in a bank for safe-keeping are inferior to those of a transferee for value without notice in due course of business, from a bank official who wrongfully misappropriates the paper and uses it for purposes of his own. Voss v. Chamberlain, 19: 106, 117 N. W. 269, — Iowa, —. (Annotated)

Who are bona fide holders.

5. The word "trustee," added to the payee's name in a written instrument, is sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to all the terms and conditions under which it may have been executed, and, in the absence of such inquiry, knowledge thereof will be presumed. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 49 Or. 536.

6. One taking a pledge of negotiable paper from a bank official as collateral for his own debt is not bound to show diligence in ascertaining the official's right to the paper as against the payee who has indorsed it in blank and left it in a receptacle in the bank for safe-keeping, under a statute providing that the rule that, when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated such paper was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove title acquired in due course, does not apply in favor of a person who became bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of defective title. Voss v. Chamberlain, 19: 106, 117 N. W. 269, — Iowa, —.

7. One taking negotiable paper as a substitute for other securities held as collateral for a debt which he surrenders at the time is a holder for value. Voss v. Chamberlain, 19: 106, 117 N. W. 269, — Iowa, —.

1. Mere fear or suspicion on the part of the lessor that a lessee intends to sell intoxicating liquor on the leased premises without authority of law will not avoid a bond by which the lessee undertakes to hold the lessor harmless from any expenditure or costs because of the unlawful sale of liquor upon the premises. Harbison v. Shirley, 19: 662, 117 N. W. 963, — Iowa, —. (Annotated)

Municipal bonds.

2. The exoneration of a county from its former subscription to the stock of another corporation is a condition precedent to the issuance of bonds in aid of a subscription to railroad stock, where the order for the election contained the condition that bonds in aid of the subscription should not be issued until the county was fully and completely exonerated from the payment of the capital stock voted and authorized to be issued to the former company. Quinlan v. Green County, 19: 849, 157 Fed. 33, 84 C. C. A. 537.

3. The construction of the road upon a certain route through the county, and the expenditure of the subscription therein, is not a condition precedent to the issuance of county bonds in aid of a railroad under a vote upon a submission of the question whether or not bonds in aid of the subscription should be issued upon condition that the company so locate and construct the road and expend the money. Quinlan

v. Green County, 19: 849, 157 Fed. 33, 84 C. C. A. 537.

4. Bonds issued by a county in aid of a railroad company are not invalidated in the hands of a bona fide holder for value by the failure of the company to comply with a condition on which they were issued, that the road should be located and constructed upon a certain route through the county, and that the money received from the bonds should be expended therein. Quinlan v. Green County, 19: 849, 157 Fed. 33, 84 C. C. A. 537. (Annotated)

Construction of ordinance imposing license tax on real-estate agents, see License, 2.

1. A real-estate agent employed to find a purchaser for land is not deprived of his right to compensation by the fact that the contract of sale entered into between the purchaser and seller could not be specifically enforced because some of its provisions were contrary to law. Manker v. Tough, 19: 675, 98 Pac. 792, — Kan. —.

2. An agent employed to sell land for another, upon whom no authority to execute a contract of sale or to execute an instrument of conveyance is conferred, is required merely, in order to entitle him to compensation, to find a purchaser ready, willing, and able to make the purchase at the price and on the terms prescribed by the seller to the agent. Manker v. Tough, 19: 675, 98 Pac. 792, — Kan. —.

3. A broker receiving exclusive authority to sell real estate by a writing which he does not sign cannot recover commissions in case the property is sold by the owner without aid from him, if he fails to show that, prior to the sale, he had used ordinary diligence in endeavoring to make a sale of the property, resulting in the expenditure of time, money, or effort under the contract. Schoenmann v. Whitt, 19: 598, 117 N. W. 851, — Wis. —. (Annotated)

4. A contract between a real-estate agent and a landowner, that, if the agent should find a purchaser for the land, he should have, as compensation for his services, the amount the land might sell for above a certain price, is not a joint venture, in which neither may profit to the exclusion of the other, but is a contract of agency merely, and the agent is entitled to his compensation where he finds a satisfactory purchaser for the land, although the contract is subsequently canceled by the mutual agreement of the seller and purchaser, without the consent of the agent. Manker v. Tough, 19: 675, 98 Pac. 792, — Kan. —.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

1. A receiver appointed after insolvency of a building and loan association proceeds in like manner as the directors thereof might have done if insolvency had not supervened as to mortgage debts that become due and payable, not by the insolvency of the association, but according to the terms of such mortgages and under the by-laws of the association, by the default of the borrower himself, prior to the insolvency of the association. Re State Mut. Bldg. & Loan Assn. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 588, 71 Atl. 251, — N. J. —.

2. The rule that the mortgagor, in the computation of the amount payable upon a mortgage made to a building and loan association by one of its members, and which has become due by reason of the insolvency of the association, is entitled to have credited upon the principal of the mortgage, all sums paid by him as premiums for the loan, does not apply to mortgage debts that become due, not by the insolvency of the association, but according to the terms of such mortgages and under the by-laws of the association, by the default of the borrower himself prior to the insolvency of the association, since, in the latter case, the mere breach of the legal contract gives rise to no equitable considerations. Re State Mut. Bldg. & Loan Assn. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 588, 71 Atl. 251, — N. J. —.

1. A failure to exercise the care and diligence due from railroad companies as common carriers is negligence, without any legal distinction as being gross or ordinary. Summerlin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 191, 47 So. 557, — Fla. —.

2. A ferry company which maintains a pleasure resort on its own property for a particular class of persons whose patronage it invites and for whose accommodation it runs a boat devoted exclusively to their transportation is not, so far as that enterprise is concerned, a common carrier; and it may exclude from the boat persons who will be undesirable to its patrons, or destroy the success of its undertaking. Meisner v. Detroit, B. I. & W. Ferry Co. 19: 872, 118 N. W. 14, — Mich. —.

Who are passengers.

3. The rights of a section man on a street railway, who is injured while riding to his work from his home, on the company's car, without paying fare, in accordance with a custom of the company to carry such employees free upon their displaying badges furnished to them, are not those of a passenger, but merely of an employee. Birmingham R. L. & P. Co. v. Sawyer, 19: 717, 47 So. 67, — Ala. —. (Annotated)

4. A passenger who boards a train after telegraphing for a reservation on a certain Pullman car which is not attached to that train, but will be picked up a few miles down the road, and is allowed to remain in a Pullman car pending the arrival of the one on which his reservation is, is not a passenger of the Pullman company, and it is not liable for negligence of its conductor which results in his missing his car. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine, 19: 753, 113 S. W. 495, — Ky. —.

5. Neither the conductor nor the engineer of a train, nor the master mechanic of a railroad, has the implied authority to invite a person to ride in the cab of a locomotive without paying fare. Clark v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. 19: 988, 165 Fed. 408, — C. C. A. —.

6. Where a sleeping car conductor undertakes, in the presence of the train conductor, to put a lady holding a railroad ticket on the right Pullman car, and tells her to remain in his car until the desired car arrives, the railroad company is liable for his neglect to do so. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine, 19: 753, 113 S. W. 495, — Ky. —.

7. A switching crew is not guilty of wantonness or recklessness towards a passenger riding in an engine cab because it leaves a car on a switch, which does not clear the main track, where it does not know of its presence in the cab; nor are those in charge of the engine guilty of such negligence toward him when they do not know that the car does not clear the track. —so as to render the railroad company liable in case he is injured by the engine coming in contact with the car. Clark v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. 19: 988, 165 Fed. 408, — C. C. A. —.

8. A passenger on a railroad train may recover damages for inconvenience and injury suffered by failure of the carrier to exercise toward her that degree of care which is due to a passenger. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Overton, 19: 500, 110 S. W. 736, — Tex. —.

9. A street railway company is negligent in maintaining the tracks used by cars running in opposite directions so close together that the natural sway of the cars in motion, emphasized by an uneven condition of the track which it permits to exist, brings passing cars within 3 to 6 inches of each other, without taking any precautions to prevent injury to passengers who, because of the crowded condition of the cars, may project some portion of the body beyond the sides of the cars. La Barge v. Union Electric Co. 19: 213, 116 N. W. 816, 138 Iowa, 691.

10. A carrier is not liable for injury to a passenger through the fall of a bridge caused by the breaking of an imperfect weld in a cord, which could not have been detected by the utmost scrutiny, where the bridge was constructed by a thoroughly reputable competent, and reliable builder.

Roanoke R. & E. Co. v. Sterrett, 19: 316, 62 S. E. 385, 108 Va. 533.

Assault on passenger.

11. A street car company is liable for the act of one employed to care for its cars, who unlawfully assaults a passenger while attempting to eject him from the car at the express or implied request of the conductor, but not if his act is of his own volition, and beyond the scope of his employment. Mills v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 19: 704, 96 Pac. 520, 50 Wash. 20.

Negligence of passenger.

See also supra, 8.

Negligence of person riding on running board, see Trial, 7.

12. A passenger on a open street car cannot be said, as matter of law, to be negligent if, when compelled to stand because of the crowded condition of the car, he leans against a side post, and in the act of laughing throws his head back a few inches beyond the post, so that it comes in contact with a car passing in the opposite direction. La Barge v. Union Electric Co. 19: 213, 116 N. W. 816, 138 Iowa, 691.

13. One who, without paying fare, voluntarily attempts to ride in the cab of a locomotive at the invitation of those in charge of the train, assumes the known hazards incident to such exposed position, and cannot hold the railroad company liable for injuries caused by the collision of the cab with a car negligently left on a side track so as not to clear the main track, where the negligence was not wanton, and no injury occurred to anyone else on the train. Clark v. Colorado & N. W. R. Co. 19: 988, 165 Fed. 408, — C. C. A. —.

14. A passenger on a mixed train is negligent, as matter of law, in riding upon the platform when there is plenty of room in the car, merely because the weather is warm and he prefers to ride there. Wagner v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 19: 1028, 61 S. E. 171, 147 N. C. 315.

Ejection.

See also supra, 11.

15. One holding a street car ticket entitling him to transportation to any one of several points at different distances along the line from the starting point, who boards a car plainly marked as going only as far as the nearest stop to which the ticket entitles him to ride, is not entitled to damages in case the car stops at that point and goes back, and he is ejected therefrom without undue force after being refused a transfer to another car. Mills v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 19: 704, 96 Pac. 520, 50 Wash. 20. (Annotated)

16. A street car company cannot eject a trespasser from its car while the car is in motion, so as to endanger life or limb, or wilfully or unnecessarily assault him. Mills v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 19: 704, 96 Pac. 520, 50 Wash. 20.

Injuries in getting on and off.

Injury to child attempting to board train, see Negligence, 2.

17. A railroad company is not required to maintain in populous communities a lookout for children who are in the habit of jumping on and off its cars while in motion, and provide against injuries to them. Swartwood v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19: 1112, 111 S. W. 305, — Ky. —

Fares; transfers.

18. Entirely distinct lines of street railway originally constructed and operated by different companies and brought into physical relation to each other by a third line connecting them do not, although the three lines have by leases and contracts come into possession of one company, which is operating them as a single system, constitute a road and connecting branches thereof, or a main line of road and any branch or extension thereof, within the meaning of a statute requiring a street railway company to charge only one fare for transporting a passenger over such road and branch within a city. Bull v. New York C. R. Co. 19: 778, 85 N. E. 385, 192 N. Y. 361.

19. An attorney traveling over a street railway simply for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a transfer will be given him at a certain point as required by statute, which information he desires for the benefit of suits already commenced on behalf of clients for the statutory penalty for refusal to give them transfers, is not entitled to bring an action for the statutory penalty because of the refusal to give him one, where the statute requires the carrying of passengers desiring to make a continuous trip between certain points for one fare, and imposes a forfeiture to the person aggrieved by refusal to issue the necessary transfer. Bull v. New York C. R. Co. 19: 778, 85 N. E. 385, 192 N. Y. 361.

Baggage.

Proximate cause of loss of baggage, see Proximate Cause, 2.

20. A provision on a transportation ticket that the carrier is not to be responsible for the destruction of baggage by fire is binding on the passenger in its application to fires not caused by the carrier's negligence, although it is in print so fine that the passenger cannot, because of defective sight, read it, if the printed provisions on the ticket are sufficiently conspicuous to charge him with notice that they contain a contract. French v. Merchants & M. Transp. Co. 19: 1006, 85 N. E. 424, 199 Mass. 433. (Annotated)

Of freight; generally.

Presumption of negligence in case of loss of or damage to goods in hands of carrier, see Evidence, 9-11.

Direction of verdict in action against carrier for loss of property in transit, see Trial, 13.

21. While a bill of lading is to be construed as a whole, invalid conditions will not necessarily render the contract invalid, it being enforceable as far as valid. Whitnack v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19: 1011, 118 N. W. 67, — Neb. —.

22. The common-law duty of express companies to make free deliveries of parcels committed to their care is not such as to preclude them from fixing charges for transportation which will not include such deliveries, and requiring consignees to pay for making a personal delivery to them. State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Adams Exp. Co. 19: 93, 85 N. E. 337, — Ind. —.

23. A common-law exception relieving a carrier from loss occasioned by an act of the shipper or owner of goods will not be read into a statute imposing liability of an insurer upon an inland common carrier for loss of property consigned to it for carriage when unaccompanied by the consignor, except for loss resulting from certain specified causes. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 902, 118 N. W. 826, — N. D. —.

24. A carrier is liable for the loss, through leakage, of flax carried by it, even though the shipper may not have fastened properly inside doors furnished by the carrier for the purpose of retaining the flax, where, after these doors were inserted, the car was receipted for and the outside doors closed and sealed by the carrier's agent, who had full opportunity to observe, while closing the outside doors, whether the inside doors were properly fastened. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 952, 118 N. W. 826, — N. D. —. (Annotated)

Carrying live stock.

25. The liability of a common carrier as an insurer does not extend to any damage resulting from an intrinsic cause against which care and foresight could not provide, such as damage resulting from the nature, disposition, or viciousness of live stock, undertaken to be transported, as such cause is within the principle which excuses common carriers from loss or damage resulting from the act of God. Summerlin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 191, 47 So. 557, — Fla. —.

26. A railroad company, by receiving live stock and undertaking to transport the same for hire, assumes the relation of a common carrier, and becomes chargeable with the duties and obligations incident to that relation, except so far as such duties and responsibilities may legally be modified by special contract. Summerlin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 191, 47 So. 557, — Fla. —.

Limitation of liability.

As to limitation of liability for loss of baggage, see supra, 20.

27. A common-law doctrine holding a common carrier to the liability of an insurer does not preclude the parties to the shipment from entering into a contract referring to the carrier's liability. Summerlin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 191, 47 So. 557, — Fla. —.

lin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 191, 47 So. 557, — Fla. —.

28. A common carrier of goods cannot legally stipulate for exemption from liability for losses occasioned by its own negligence of that of its agents or servants, and all stipulations for exemption from negligence, whether gross or ordinary, are ineffectual. Summerlin v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 191, 47 So. 557, — Fla. —.

Connecting carriers.

29. A railroad company receiving a sleeping car from another company upon which is a passenger for a car on its train whom the conductor of the former car has undertaken to put on the right car is not liable for sending that car forward in the first section of the train, so that the passenger does not get it, where it had no notice of her desire until after the train had been separated, and its conductor did all he could to rectify the mistake after learning of it. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine, 19: 753, 113 S. W. 495, — Ky. —.

30. A common carrier who undertakes, during extreme cold weather, to carry two car loads of potatoes and deliver them to a connecting carrier, the contract providing that the shipper should furnish a care taker to accompany the shipment, and keep fires in the cars, to prevent freezing, is liable for loss of potatoes which became frozen by reason of the cars becoming separated in transit on its lines, whereby the care taker is prevented from attending to one car of the potatoes, even though they may not have become frozen until after they were delivered to the second carrier. Whitnack v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19: 1011, 118 N. W. 67, — Neb. —.

31. A common carrier who accepts goods for shipment to be delivered to a connecting carrier will be liable for any damages to the goods resulting directly from its negligence, although the loss may not actually occur until after the goods are delivered to the second carrier. Whitnack v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19: 1011, 118 N. W. 67, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

Governmental control; discrimination.

State statute requiring express company to make free deliveries, see Commerce, 1-3.

32. A state cannot compel an express company to make free delivery of parcels committed to its care, in violation of contracts made at the place where the parcels are received in another state, that delivery charges shall be paid by the consignee. State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Adams Exp. Co. 19: 93, 85 N. E. 337, — Ind. —.

Discrimination between hackmen.

33. A railroad company cannot give to one hackman the right to occupy such a position on its grounds as necessarily to result in his securing by far the larger share of the business, and a contract by which it attempts to do so is void. Anderson v. Palmer Transfer Co. 19: 756, 115 S. W. 182, — Ky. —.

CASE.

Sufficiency of complaint in action for causing breach of contract, see Pleading, 9.

1. To render one liable for preventing the performance of a contract he must have had knowledge of it. McGurk v. Cronenwett, 19: 561, 85 N. E. 576, 199 Mass. 457.

2. An officer of a corporation may be liable for maliciously inducing it to break its contract with its employee and discharge him from his employment. McGurk v. Cronenwett, 19: 561, 85 N. E. 576, 199 Mass. 457. (Annotated)

CERTIORARI.

See also Appeal and Error, 6.

1. The owner of property adjoining that on which is maintained a liquor nuisance has sufficient interest to be entitled to seek a writ of certiorari to review a consent decree in a suit by a citizen to enjoin the maintenance of the nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community. Hemmer v. Bonson, 19: 610, 117 N. W. 257, — Iowa —.

2. A consent decree in an action under the statute by a citizen to enjoin the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community, of which he fails or refuses to seek correction by appeal, may be reviewed under a writ of certiorari at the suit of any citizen, upon a proper showing of his qualifications. Hemmer v. Bonson, 19: 610, 117 N. W. 257, — Iowa. —.

(Annotated)

3. That the real motive of an interested person in applying for a writ of certiorari to review a decree in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, which permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community, is to compel the purchase of his property at an exorbitant price, cannot be considered by the court as a reason for denying the relief. Hemmer v. Bonson, 19: 610, 117 N. W. 257, — Iowa, —.

4. Neither the oral statements of a judge in entering a decree enjoining the maintenance of a liquor nuisance, which, by its terms, permits acts contrary to the statute and prejudicial to the community, nor the interpretation which the parties have put upon the decree, can be considered upon a petition for a writ of certiorari to correct the decree. Hemmer v. Bonson, 19: 610, 117 N. W. 257, — Iowa, —.

COMMERCE.Express companies.

Power of state to compel express company to make free deliveries, see Carriers, 32.

1. A state statute requiring express companies to make free deliveries of parcels committed to them for transportation is, as applied to interstate shipments, invalid as an attempted regulation of interstate commerce. State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Adams Exp. Co. 19: 93, 85 N. E. 337, — Ind. —. (Annotated)

2. A state statute requiring express companies to make free delivery of parcels committed to their custody for transportation is not in aid of the common law to such an extent that it cannot be said to be in conflict with the Federal statutes governing the regulation of rates of interstate shipments. State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Adams Exp. Co. 19: 93, 85 N. E. 337, — Ind. —.

3. A state cannot compel express companies to make free deliveries, within cities of a certain class, of interstate shipments committed to their care, in view of the railroad rate law of Congress requiring the filing by transportation companies with the Interstate Commerce Commission of schedules of rates for transportation or any service connected therewith, and empowering the commission to determine what regulations in respect to transportation are reasonable, and to require the carrier to conform to such regulations. State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Adams Exp. Co. 19: 93, 85 N. E. 337, — Ind. —.

Railroads.

State statute restricting hours of labor of railroad employees, see Statutes, 1.

4. A regulation by Congress of the number of hours per day for which telegraph operators and train despatchers on interstate railroads may be employed inhibits state legislation upon the same subject, especially such as limits such employment to fewer hours per day than allowed by Congress, and puts the regulation in force sooner than the time provided by the congressional act. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 19: 326, 117 N. W. 686, — Wis. —.

5. An act of Congress regulating the hours of labor of railroad employees engaged strictly in the business of interstate commerce cannot be annulled because not within its constitutional powers. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 19: 326, 117 N. W. 686, — Wis. —.

Regulating and licensing sales.

Presumption as to when sale by agent in one state for merchant in another is completed, see Evidence, 21.

6. The right of a merchant of one state to sell his goods in another state carries with it the right to deliver them, and to employ for that purpose any agency he may deem proper, providing that at no time before the delivery the goods become so mingled with the common mass of property in such other state as to deprive the transaction of its interstate features. Kinsley v. Dyerly, 19: 405, 98 Pac. 228, — Kan. —.

7. A statute forbidding without license, the canvassing for or selling by sample of goods made in another state, after they have been shipped into the state passing the statute, while permitting such canvassing for domestic goods, violates the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. State v. Bayer, 19: 297, 97 Pac. 129, — Utah, —. (Annotated)

8. The state may make the license tax on the right to sell certain classes of goods by sample to consumers by canvassing from house to house apply to goods shipped from foreign states, when it applies equally to those of domestic origin. State v. Bayer, 19: 297, 97 Pac. 129, — Utah, —.

9. An agent who solicits orders for a merchant of another state may be made agent to deliver and collect without destroying the interstate character of the transaction. Kinsley v. Dyerly, 19: 405, 98 Pac. 228, — Kan. —.

1. Regulating or prohibiting the cutting of trees on wild or uncultivated lands for the purpose of protecting the water supply of the state is not a denial of the equal protection of the laws, since the classification is based on real differences in the nature, situation, and condition of things. Opinion of Justices, 19: 422, 69 Atl. 627, — Me. —. (Annotated)

2. A state statute imposing a heavy license tax upon the right to canvass from house to house for a certain limited number of articles not produced or manufactured within the state, and not injurious to health or morals, for the apparent purpose of favoring resident merchants with established places of business, violates the provisions of the Federal Constitution against abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and denying equal protection of the laws. State v. Bayer, 19: 297, 97 Pac. 129, — Utah, —.

3. A statute denying an appeal in proceedings to contest a local-option election does not unconstitutionally deprive contestants of the privileges and immunities of citizens, nor of property without due process of law, nor of the equal protection of the laws. Saylor v. Duel, 19: 377, 86 N. E. 119, 236 Ill. 429.

 1. The personal knowledge of a sales agent located at a commercial center, acquired in the sale of his line there, his experience in the business, his acquaintance with available salesmen and to probable customers, and his ability to secure a similar agency in a rival house, may be found to constitute what the parties refer to as good will which his principal purchases from him when placing another person in charge of the agency, so as to form a consideration for the amount agreed to be paid therefor. Gordon v. Knott, 19: 762, 85 N. E. 184, 190 Mass. 173.
 2. An agreement in writing by one to take up a past due note of another if it remains unpaid at a certain future date, without additional consideration to support it, is without consideration, and unenforceable, where the promisor makes no request for forbearance of suit against the maker of the note, and the promisee does not agree to forbear suit; and the mere fact that he does so forbear is not sufficient to establish either such promise or request. J. H. Queal & Co. v. Peterson, 19: 842, 116 N. W. 593, 138 Iowa, 514. (Annotated) Definiteness.

3. A contract to support a woman in consideration of a release from a promise to marry her is not too indefinite and uncertain to be enforceable. Henderson v. Spratlen, 19: 655, 98 Pac. 14, — Colo. —.

Statute of frauds.

Burden of proving contract valid under statute of frauds, see Pleading, 11.

4. Issued shares in a corporation are good within the meaning of the statute of frauds, and oral contracts for their sale which do not comply with the terms of that statute are invalid. Sprague v. Hosie, 19: 874, 118 N. W. 497, — Mich. —.

(Annotated)

5. Shipping a display cabinet which an hotel proprietor has contracted in writing to place on the counter does not make the contract mutual, so that it can be enforced against him, when not signed by the other party, where it was to run for six years, with a change of cabinet every two years, since the undertaking of the shipper is void under the statute of frauds. Adams v. Harrington Hotel Co. 19: 919, 117 N. W. 551, — Mich. —.

6. Delivery of a power of attorney and the land contract to which it related, by the one upon whom it is conferred, to the intended assignee of the contract without executing it, is not sufficient to transfer the contract. Flinner v. McVay, 19: 879, 96 Pac. 340, 37 Mont. 306.

7. An assignment of a land contract must be evidenced by writing where a writing is necessary to transfer an interest in real estate. Flinner v. McVay, 19: 879, 96 Pac. 340, 37 Mont. 306. (Annotated)

8. Absence of writing will not defeat, under the statute of frauds, an agreement between mortgagor, the purchaser of the mortgage, and a trustee, to hold it and collect the rents and payments of principal and make application thereof, after the agreement has been performed. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 49 Or. 536.

Construction.

Construction of contract of insurance agent, see Insurance, 2.

Law authorizing regulation of public service as part of contracts therefor, see Public Service Corporations, 2.

9. A custom which contravenes a positive statute is invalid, and does not become a part of a contract. Deadwyler v. Karow, 19: 197, 62 S. E. 172, — Ga. —.

Validity; public policy.

Effect of partial invalidity of bill of lading, see Carriers, 21.

Validity of carrier's contract limiting liability, see Carriers, 28.

10. The business of a real-estate agent is not within the letter of an ordinance imposing a license tax upon the business of "real estate," which was passed under statutory authority to impose a license tax upon real-estate agents, and therefore the contract of an agent to find a purchaser for real estate will not be held void and unenforceable because of his failure to obtain a license. Manker v. Tough, 19: 675, 98 Pac. 792, — Kan. —.

11. A contract by one, who, after agreeing to marry a woman, induces her to submit to surgical operations which render her unable to support herself, to support her in consideration of release from his engagement is valid and enforceable. Henderson v. Spratlen, 19: 655, 98 Pac. 14, — Colo. —.

12. A sale of the good will of an established business in connection with a sale of the business is not, if reasonable in other respects, void because unlimited as to time. Southworth v. Davison, 19: 769, 118 N. W. 363, — Minn. —.

Remedies; contracts against public policy.

13. Jobbers who are compelled to become parties to a general undertaking between manufacturers of a household necessity for the creation of a corporation to act as their sales agent for the purpose of stifling competition between them, which is void under the Federal anti-trust act, cannot be compelled by the sales agent to pay for goods purchased under and in accordance with the agreement. Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Lewis Voight & Sons Co. 19: 143, 148 Fed. 939, 78 C. C. A. 567.

Condition; certificate of performance.

14. Absence of a final estimate by the engineer upon completion of the work will prevent a recovery by the subcontractor against the contractor for the performance of certain work of the amount alleged to be due, where, by the terms of the contract by which the parties are bound, the procuring of such estimate is to constitute a condition precedent to the right to recover for the work done. Johnston & Grommett Bros. v. Bunn, 19: 1064, 62 S. E. 341, 108 Va. 490.

Termination.

15. One who is released from his promise to marry a woman, whom he has induced to submit to surgical operations to such an extent that she is unable to support herself, upon consideration that he will support her during life, is not absolved from his promise by her marriage to another person, after the latter's obligation to support her is terminated. Henderson v. Spratlen, 19: 655, 98 Pac. 14, — Colo. —. (Annotated)

CONTRIBUTION.

Residuary legatees who, after the special legacies have been substantially paid, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1. A general agent of an insurance company taking charge of its business in another state does not become such a factor in its domestic affairs, mechanism, internal organization or policy, that his contract for compensation is subject to reduction by the legislature under its reserve power over corporations. Boswell v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. 19: 946, 86 N. E. 532, 193 N. Y. 465.

Contracts.

2. Communication by one employed as manager of a corporation, to its directors, of acceptance of a proposition contained in its duly adopted resolution, that, in case of his inability to dispose of his private business, the corporation purchase it for a certain sum at any time before a certain date, is sufficient to constitute a sale without the necessity of entering the fact of the acceptance in the records of the corporation. Iowa Drug Co. v. Souers, 19: 115, 117 N. W. 300, — Iowa, —.

3. A corporation organized to transact a wholesale drug business, with power to purchase such personal property as may be deemed advisable in the conduct of said business, cannot repudiate a consummated purchase by its directors of the retail drug business of a person whose services they desired to secure as manager, after the value of such business has been destroyed. Iowa Drug Co. v. Souers, 19: 115, 117 N. W. 300, — Iowa, —.

Subscriptions to stock; cancellation:
Presumption that obligation to subscribe to stock was terminated, see Evidence, 20.

4. An action by a corporation to cancel stock on account of overvaluation of the property for which it was issued is not for the benefit of other stockholders, so as to permit an adjustment in it of their grievances for being induced to invest money in the enterprise through fraud. Iowa Drug Co. v. Souers, 19: 115, 117 N. W. 300, — Iowa, —.

5. The trust-fund doctrine, requiring one paying for corporate stock in property to show that the property was actually worth the value of the stock, has no application as between the corporation itself and the stockholder who has received his stock in exchange for property surrendered at an agreed valuation. Iowa Drug Co. v. Souers, 19: 115, 117 N. W. 300, — Iowa, —.

Liability of stockholders.

When statute of limitations begins to run against stockholder's liability, see Limitation of Actions, 4.

6. The shareholders of a corporation, and not its creditors, must bear the loss occasioned by loss of assets due to the misconduct of the receiver. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

7. Stockholders of a corporation which, having guaranteed payment of principal and interest on mortgages sold by it, became insolvent, after which defaulted mortgages were returned to and collected by the receiver, cannot object to his placing the proceeds in the general funds of the corporation, rather than applying them to the individual claims of the purchasers of the mortgages, for the first time after the money has been paid out and the proceeding closed. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

8. One cannot avoid his statutory liability for the debts of the corporation by adding the word "trustee" to his name as it stands upon the stock books. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

9. The statutory liability of a stockholder for the debts of a corporation is not affected by whether he purchased his stock before or after the incurring of the debt. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

10. Permitting a corporation to continue in business and exercise powers conferred by an amendment to its charter imposing an additional liability on stockholders is sufficient L.R.A. (N.S.)

cient to establish their acceptance of the amendment after contracts have been made for the performance of which their liability is sought to be enforced. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

11. The fact that the principal of the debt of a corporation has been paid by its receiver out of its assets does not prevent the maintenance of an action against the stockholders for unpaid interest, under a statute making them individually liable for the debts of the corporation, where the payments by the receiver were not accepted in full payment of the corporate debts, but merely as dividends thereon. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

12. Voluntary stopping of payment by a corporation which has sold mortgages with a guaranty of principal and interest and the sequestration of its assets deprives it of the right to insist on a demand upon it for payment of defaulted mortgages to charge it with interest on the demand; and therefore stockholders cannot avoid liability for such interest in actions to enforce their statutory liability for the corporate debts because no demand was made upon the corporation for payment. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

13. The statutory liability of stockholders for debts of the corporation extends to interest on claims beyond the time the affairs of the corporation are placed in the hands of a receiver, although the commissioner appointed to determine the claims in the receivership proceedings was instructed to allow interest to the date of the receivership. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —. (Annotated)

14. A creditor of a corporation cannot be deprived of the right to enforce interest on his claim against stockholders under their statutory liability for the corporate debts, for the period covering the time the affairs of the corporation are being wound up by the receiver, on the ground that it would be a hardship on them to hold them liable for interest during the delays of administration of the estate. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

15. The statutory liability of stockholders of a corporation rests upon persons holding the stock as collateral security for loans to the real owners, where they appear upon the stock books as owners. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

16. One to whom corporate stock has been transferred as collateral security, but who appears upon the books of the corporation as the general owner thereof, is liable as a stockholder for the debts of the corporation. Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans, Johnson, Sloan Co. 19: 249, 118 N. W. 55, — Minn. —.

17. One to whom corporate stock has been transferred as collateral security, the stock being so registered in the corporation record, thereby showing his true relation thereto, is not liable as a stockholder for the debts of the corporation. Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans, Johnson, Sloan Co. 19: 249, 118 N. W. 55, — Minn. — (Annotated)

18. The words, "issued for collateral security for note of even date," written upon the printed stub of a certificate of stock in the stock book of the corporation, sufficiently advise creditors of the conditions and terms upon which the stock is held. Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans, Johnson, Sloan Co. 19: 249, 118 N. W. 55, — Minn. —

19. A decree declaring the assets of a corporation to be exhausted leaving debts unpaid is not necessary to justify a creditors' suit to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders, if the report of the commissioner on claims and that of the receiver have been allowed, which show that fact. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 423, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —

1. Even though defectively organized, a municipal court authorized by law is at least a de facto court, and the officers thereof de facto officers, and the right of the court to exercise judicial functions can be inquired into only at the instance of the state in direct proceedings brought for that purpose. State ex rel. Bales v. Bailey, 19: 775, 118 N. W. 676, — Minn. —

2. A court which has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and which acquires jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by service of process, is vested with full power and authority to hear and determine all questions that occur in the case and are essential to determine the merits of the issues raised, and it likewise has authority and jurisdiction to make such orders and issue such writs and process as may be necessary and essential to carry the decree into effect and render it binding and operative. Taylor v. Hulett, 19: 535, 97 Pac. 37, — Idaho, —

3. The courts of one state, in ascertaining, decreeing, and protecting property rights in water appropriations within the jurisdiction of the state, may, at the same time and for the same purpose, inquire into and determine rights and priorities that are located and situated higher up the stream and beyond the state line, in order fairly and finally to determine judicially the relative rights of the parties, and decree the extent of title and right of possession of the subject-matter located and situated within the state. Taylor v. Hulett, 19: 535, 97 Pac. 37, — Idaho, — (Annotated)

4. A state court which has jurisdiction of both the subject-matter and of the person of the defendants, in an action by a resident of the state against nonresidents, to determine their respective rights in an interstate stream, has jurisdiction to grant an injunction to prevent the diversion, in another state, of the waters of the stream by the nonresident defendants, to the detriment of the plaintiff, the injunction being merely ancillary to, and in aid of, a decree establishing and quieting the latter's title, and being a remedy in personam, acting only upon the person of the party enjoined. Taylor v. Hulett, 19: 535, 97 Pac. 37, — Idaho, —.

5. The jurisdiction of the courts of one state to ascertain and determine water appropriations within the state is not ousted or defeated by the fact that a defendant sets up in his answer that he has an appropriation of the waters of the stream in controversy, and that he diverts the waters from such stream in another state for use and application in irrigating lands situated within that state. Taylor v. Hulett, 19: 535, 97 Pac. 37, — Idaho, —.

Relation to other departments of government.

6. Requiring the judges of the district court to appoint park commissioners, whose duties are wholly administrative and executive, and over whom the judges are given no supervision or control, the power of supervision being expressly and exclusively delegated to the mayor and city council, violates the provision of the Constitution dividing the government into three departments, and prohibiting persons of one department from exercising powers properly belonging to either of the others. State ex rel. Thompson v. Neble, 19: 578, 117 N. W. 723, — Neb. —. (Annotated)

7. The power to appoint to a public office is not the exercise of a judicial function, but is executive or administrative in its nature. State ex rel. Thompson v. Neble, 19: 578, 117 N. W. 723, — Neb. —.

8. Requiring a police judge to notify the county attorney of violations of the prohibitory liquor law that come to his notice, and to furnish him with the names of the witnesses by whom such violations may be proved, under penalty of a fine and forfeiture of his office, does not violate the constitutional provision as to the separation of the departments of government, since the police judge, although exercising judicial functions, is not a repository of judicial power, within the meaning of the constitutional provision vesting the judicial power in a supreme court, district court, etc., and "such other courts, inferior to the supreme court, as may be provided by law," to which courts alone the constitutional doctrine of the separation of powers applies. State v. Keener, 19: 615, 97 Pac. 860, — Kan. —. (Annotated)

Rules of decision.

9. In determining the common law of another state, the decisions of the courts of final resort of that state will be followed, regardless of precedents to the contrary, in the state where the trial is held; and this rule applies to the law merchant as well as to other branches of the common law. Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 19: 665, 98 Pac. 206, — Kan. —.

1911 K.A. (N.S.)

10. A decision of a foreign state holding a promissory note which is uncertain and indefinite as to time, negotiable at common law, will not be accepted as determining the law of that state where the decision was rendered by an intermediate court, and is in conflict with the well-settled common law doctrine of the state in which the action arises. Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 19: 665, 98 Pac. 206, — Kan. —.

2. A court which has imposed a judgment of imprisonment on plea of guilty or conviction, which is not stayed as provided by law, should forthwith commit the defendant to the proper officer for incarceration; but, where this is not done, and an order is made under which the defendant is discharged from custody, the court has no power or jurisdiction after the lapse of the time involved in the sentence, and after the term, to issue commitment on such judgment. If a part of a custom would be valid if it stood alone as a separate and independent custom, such part would be invalid when another part of the entire custom of which it forms a part was invalid, unless it were reasonably certain that to enforce the former as a separate and independent custom would correspond with the intent and purpose with which the custom, as a whole, was established and used. Deadwyler v. Karow, 19: 197, 62 S. E. 172, — Ga. —.

DAMAGES.

Sufficiency of averment of, see Pleading, 2.

Evidence on measure of damages for failure to furnish water for irrigation, see Evidence, 38.

1. The measure of damages for breach of contract to furnish water to irrigate growing crops so that they become worthless is the value of the crops on the market at maturity, less the cost necessary to put them in condition for and upon the closest market. Smith v. Hicks, 19: 938, 98 Pac. 138, — N. M. —. (Annotated)

Sales of personality.

2. The rental value of a cotton gin is the measure of damages for delay in complying with a contract to furnish machinery for the establishment of a new plant, where the operation of the gin depends on the machinery, which fact is fully explained to the seller when the contract is made, and the failure to comply with the contract prevents the operation of the gin. Standard Supply Co. v. Carter, 19: 155, 62 S. E. 150, 81 S. C. 181. (Annotated)

Telegrams.

See also infra, 11-15.

3. Compensation for loss of time and for money expended in fruitlessly meeting trains to receive a corpse for burial may be recovered against a telegraph company whose negligence in failing to transmit a telegram was responsible therefor. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Quigley, 19: 575, 112 S. W. 897, — Ky. —.

Failure in duty to passenger.

See also infra, 16.

4. A railroad company which negligently causes a passenger to miss a train on a connecting road so that she is compelled to stop over at a way station and return home is not liable for injury to her through going into a cold room of a hotel and sitting up all night, or for vexation or personal inconvenience because of the delay, but may 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be chargeable for hotel bills and lost time. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Raine, 19: 753, 113 S. W. 495, — Ky. —.

Personal injuries.

5. Direct evidence of the value of a physician's services in treating one injured by another's negligence is not necessary to authorize an allowance therefor against the person responsible for the injury, where the fact of his employment and the nature and extent of the treatment are shown, but the jury may fix the value from their own knowledge and experience. Moran v. Dover, S. & R. Street R. Co. 19: 920, 69 Atl. 884, 74 N. H. 500. (Annotated)

6. A verdict of $15,000 for injury to the driver of a fire wagon, thirty-eight years old, which requires him to submit to several surgical operations, causes him much physical and mental suffering, and leaves him a cripple for life, will be reduced to $7,500. Dole v. New Orleans R. & L. Co. 19: 623, 46 So. 929, 121 La. 945.

7. The reviewing court will not interfere with a verdict for $1,200 in favor of a man sixty-three years of age who was knocked down by an automobile, rendered unconscious, and suffered a contusion of the head and hip, and who at the time of the injury was earning $1.50 per day, and at the time of the trial, six months later, was unable to work, and for three weeks after the accident did not rest well where at the later date the tenderness in the wounds had not disappeared, and in the opinion of a doctor was permanent. Hiroux v. Baum, 19: 332, 118 N. W. 533, — Wis. —.

Mental anguish because of failure promptly to transmit telegram to secure forwarding of corpse, see Telegraphs, 3.

Sufficiency of findings to support judgment for mental anguish, see Trial, 20.

8. Damages for mental pain and anguish, illness, threatened miscarriage, and possibly permanent injuries, due to fright resulting from an assault committed by a stranger in the hearing of a pregnant woman, are too remote to form a basis of action on her behalf against the assailant. Reed v. Ford, 19: 225, 112 S. W. 600, — Ky. —.

9. Damages for mental anguish can be recovered in an action for breach of contract only where the breach amounts to an independent, wilful tort. Beaulieu v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 564, 114 N. W. 353, 103 Minn. 47.

10. Damages for mental anguish cannot be recovered for breach of a contract by a railway company to transport a corpse over its line to a particular point, and to deliver it there to an intersecting carrier, to be conveyed to its place of destination, where the breach consists in the negligence of the company in carrying the corpse beyond the connecting point, thus causing a delay in the funeral arrangements, in the absence of wilful or malicious misconduct on the part of the company or its agents. Beaulieu v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 564, 114 N. W. 353, 103 Minn. 47. (Annotated)

11. A telegraph company cannot escape liability for damages for mental suffering of a man because, through its failure to deliver a telegram to his father announcing the death of his wife, he is deprived of the presence of the father at the funeral, on the ground that it was not informed that its failure would cause such suffering. Foreman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19: 374, 116 N. W. 724, — Iowa, —.

12. The relationship of the parties need not appear on the face of the telegram announcing a death, to render the company liable for damages for mental suffering in case it fails to deliver it, if it had knowledge of such relationship. Foreman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19: 374, 116 N. W. 724, — Iowa, —.

13. The mere fact that the wife of the addressee of a telegram was the sister of the one whose death the message announced is not sufficient to entitle her to recover damages for mental anguish for its non-delivery. Holler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19: 475, 63 S. E. 92, — N. C. —. (Annotated)

14. Damages for mental anguish cannot be recovered by the undisclosed principal for delay in transmitting and delivering a telegram announcing death, although both the sender and sendee are his agents. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Potts, 19: 479, 113 S. W. 789, — Tenn. —.

15. A telegraph company which fails promptly to transmit money sent by a father to secure the forwarding of the corpse of his daughter for burial is liable to him for mental pain and anguish by reason of the delay in shipment of the corpse, and for loss of time and expenditure of money thereby caused. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Quigley, 19: 575, 112 S. W. 897, — Ky. —. (Annotated)

16. One accompanying her invalid sister on a railroad journey, who does not make the contract for the transportation, cannot recover damages for mental suffering due to the physical suffering of the invalid because of the wrongful acts of the carrier in its manner of placing her on the train and neglecting to assist her off. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Overton, 19: 500, 110 S. W. 736, — Tex. —. (Annotated)

Loss of profits.

17. The damages to be allowed for breach of contract to furnish machinery for the establishment of a cotton gin, whereby the operation of the gin for a season is prevented, cannot be based upon the anticipated profits for that season, nor the advantage which the owner hoped to obtain because of the aid afforded by the gin in collecting his accounts. Standard Supply Co. v. Carter, 19: 155, 62 S. E. 150, 81 S. C. 181.

Aggravation.

18. That one who wrongfully enters upon property occupied by another as a residence attempts to seduce his wife may be considered in aggravation of damages for trespass, notwithstanding statutes enlarging the rights of married women and permitting them to sue alone for injuries to their persons. Brame v. Clark, 19: 1033, 62 S. E. 418, 148 N. C. 364. (Annotated)

1. An action may be maintained, under a statute permitting the administrator of the mother to recover for the benefit of the children the damages occasioned by the deprivation of the expectation of pecuniary advantage which would have resulted by a continuation of the mother's life, where the mother, who has performed ordinary household duties, including such care of the children as a mother usually takes, has lost her life through the wrongful act of another, notwithstanding the children have been supported in a home maintained with the earnings of the father. Carter v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 128, 71 Atl. 253, — N. J. —.

2. A statute permitting the personal representative of a deceased person to recover for the benefit of the children the damages occasioned by the deprivation of the expectation of pecuniary advantage which would have resulted by a continuance of the parent's life, does not require the plaintiff to show that the children would probably have received from the deceased contributions of money or of things purchased with money. Carter v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 128, 71 Atl. 253, — N. J. —. (Annotated)

1. A grant to one, his heirs and assigns, habendum to him during the term of his natural life, remainder to such of his children as shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, their heirs and assigns, creates a fee in the first taker to hold for his use during life and then for the use of such of his children as shall attain majority, whether they do so before or after his death. Simonds v. Simonds, 19: 686, 85 N. E. 860, 199 Mass. 552.

2. The rule that a limitation, if it can so operate, is to be construed as a remainder, and not as an executory devise, even if applicable to springing and shifting uses, will not be applied if the effect will be to thwart the intent of the maker and defeat the terms of the instrument. Simonds v. Simonds, 19: 686, 85 N. E. 860, 199 Mass. 552.

3. A fee will pass by a deed from a man who, having received an absolute conveyance of real estate from his wife, recites in the deed that he is entitled to a life estate in the property by right of survivorship under the laws of the state, which interest he has agreed to sell, and grants to his grantee, his heirs and assigns, forever, all the right he has in the property, to have and to hold he life estate and interest which the grantor has, and no more. *Dickson v. DRAINAGE DISTRICTS.

Liability for flooding of lands by obstruction of water, see Eminent Domain, 4.

1. The drainage of lands to improve them for agricultural purposes cannot be regarded as an exercise of the police power, so as to exempt the land so drained from liability for injury caused by the improvement to other land not within the district. Bradbury v. Vandalia Levee & Drainage Dist. 19: 991, 86 N. E. 163, 236 Ill. 36.

2. A drainage district cannot escape liability for injury done by its improvements, to lands lying out of its limits, on the theory that it is an involuntary quasi public corporation not liable to respond in damages for any of its acts, where its organization depends upon a petition of those living within its limits, and the statute provides that lands lying within the district shall be liable for any and all damages which shall be sustained by any lands lying above such district by the construction of its works. *Bradbury v. The object of requiring the voter to have resided for a time at the place where he offers to vote is that he may be afforded an opportunity to acquire the information necessary for an intelligent vote, and become identified with the interests of the locality, and also to prevent the colonization of voters. Estopinal v. Michel, 19: 759, 46 So. 907, 121 La. 879.

2. The term "residence," used by the Constitution in fixing the qualification of voters, does not mean domicil. Estopinal v. Michel, 19: 759, 46 So. 907, 121 La. 879.

(Annotated.)

3. In the absence of proof that a person otherwise qualified has acquired a residence elsewhere, he must be considered to be a resident of the parish where his work requires him to stay, where he was born, and where he has always lived and voted; and it makes no difference that he has never had in said parish any other home than a boarding house, while he has had in another parish a home, where he has kept his wife and children, whom he has visited as often as he could. *Estopinal v. EMINENT DOMAIN.

Pleading in eminent domain proceedings, see Pleading, 10.

For what purpose.

1. That a corporation seeking by right of eminent domain property necessary to enable it to generate a supply of electricity has power to serve a private use will not defeat its application for property which it proposes and proves shall be used exclusively for public service. Walker v. Shasto Power Co. 19: 725, 160 Fed. 856, 87 C. C. A. 660. (Annotated)

What constitutes a taking.

2. Private property is not taken, so as to require compensation, by regulating the cutting of trees on wild and uncultivated land to protect the public water supply, and, for the same purpose, prohibiting the cutting of small trees on such property, the value of which standing is equal to or greater than when cut, and regulating the cutting of small trees on such land to enhance the value of such land and the trees thereon, and promote the interests of the owners and the common welfare of the public. Opinion of Justices, 19: 422, 69 Atl. 627, — Me. —.

3. Regulation by the state of the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild and uncultivated land, or prohibition of the wanton cutting of small trees on such lands which are of equal or greater value standing than cut, for the purpose of protecting the water supply of the state, is not a taking of property for which compensation must be made under the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, since that amendment was not intended to interfere with the police power of the state. Opinion of Justices, 19: 422, 69 Atl. 627, — Me. — (Annotated)

Compensation.

4. A drainage district which constructs a levee along a river and from the river to the highlands, in such a way as to obstruct the natural flow of the flood water of the river and cast it back on property farther up the stream, is liable for the injury thereby caused, where the Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation. *L.R.A. Retaining jurisdiction.

2. Upon refusal of specific performance of a contract to sell real estate because of inequitable conduct on the part of complainant, the bill need not be retained for the assessment of damages, but may be dismissed, and complainant left to his remedy at law. Banaghan v. Malaney, 19: 871, 85 N. E. 839, 200 Mass. 46.

3. A bill for specific performance of a contract will not be retained for the assessment of damages where a case is not made for specific performance, and no other special equity is shown which will support jurisdiction of the court. Bromberg v. Eugentotto Construction Co. 19: 1175, 48 So. 60, — Ala. —.

4. The nonestablishment of the right to a lien in a bona fide proceeding by a subcontractor to enforce a lien against the property of the owner for work performed for the contractor does not defeat the jurisdiction of the court to render a personal decree against the contractor for the amount found due by him. *Johnston & Grommett Bros. v. That the holder of one of the new notes representing the respective interests of the purchasers of a mortgage does not originate a suit to foreclose the mortgage to secure its payment, but is made defendant therein, does not prevent the application against him of the rule that he cannot treat the original note as existing for the purpose of upholding the mortgage and repudiate it for other purposes, where he seeks affirmative relief in his answer, by way of foreclosure of the mortgage, to secure the sum due on his note. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 49 Or. 536.

EVIDENCE.Judicial notice.

1. A Manhattan cocktail is generally and popularly known as an intoxicating liquor, and no proof of its intoxicating character is necessary, in prosecutions under a prohibitory law. State v. Pigg, 19: 848, 97 Pac. 859, — Kan. —. (Annotated)

2. In the absence of proof of the law of a foreign country, where a contract for sale of the good will of a business was entered into, the court of the forum will presume that it is the same as its own law; and this presumption cannot be affected by statements in its own opinions, or those of the courts of the foreign country, which are not put in evidence. Gordon v. Knott, 19: 762, 85 N. E. 184, 199 Mass. 173.

3. The common law of one state, governing commercial transactions in issue in the courts of another state, in the absence of proof on the subject, will be presumed to conform to the lex fori. Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 19: 665, 98 Pac. 206, — Kan. —.

4. An assignor for creditors has the burden of showing that he is entitled to interest on funds which the assignee kept on deposit in the bank, and the amount of it, at least where the assignor was insolvent, so that the trust was a creditors' trust, and they did not object to such proceeding. Whitman v. McIntyre, 19: 682, 85 N. E. 426, 199 Mass. 436.

5. Where an intentional killing by the use of a deadly weapon has been established, accused has the burden of showing that it was in self-defense, by a fair preponderance of facts. Com. v. Palmer, 19: 483, 71 Atl. 100, 222 Pa. 299. (Annotated)

6. There is no conclusive presumption that a mother knew that her son, in investing her money for her without compensation, was securing compensation for his services from the borrower. Franzen v. Hammond, 19: 399, 116 N. W. 169, — Wis. —.

7. There is no conclusive presumption of law that a twelve-year-old boy is able to foresee the danger of being crushed by a loaded push car which he and other children are pushing along a track, or that he has sufficient wisdom to avoid it; at least, not in the face of an averment to the contrary in the pleadings. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co. 19: 1094, 96 Pac. 84, 153 Cal. 571.

8. When a passenger shows an injury to himself by the breaking of the carrier's bridge, the burden is cast upon the carrier of establishing by a preponderance of evidence that the accident and resulting injury were caused by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented. Roanoke R. & E. Co. v. Sterrett, 19: 316, 62 S. E. 385, 108 Va. 533.

9. The separating of two cars of merchandise which a common carrier's contract contemplated keeping together in transit, whereby the care taker is prevented from attending to one of them, loss thereby ensuing, imports negligence, and the burden of proof is on the common carrier to prove that there was sufficient cause for separating the cars. Whitnack v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19: 1011, 118 N. W. 67, — Neb. —.

10. The burden of proof is upon the carrier to exempt himself from liability in case of loss or damage to goods consigned to it for carriage by showing that it was occasioned either by an inherent defect, vice, or weakness, or spontaneous action of the property itself, by the act of a public enemy of the United States or of the state, by act of law, or any irresistible superhuman cause. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 962, 118 N. W. 826, — N. D. —.

11. Proof of the delivery of property to a carrier in sound condition, and of its redelivery at the end of the route in damaged condition, or of a failure to redeliver it, makes a sufficient case to sustain a recovery for the damage or loss sustained by the shipper. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 952, 118 N. W. 826, — N. D. —.

12. The fact that the setting of a fire by a railroad locomotive has been proved by circumstantial evidence does not prevent the presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant, arising under the rule casting the burden of rebutting that presumption on the defendant. Osburn v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 19: 742, 98 Pac. 627, — Idaho, —.

13. In an action against a railroad company for the destruction of property by fire set by sparks from the company's locomotive, proof of actual negligence or want of ordinary care must be made by complainant. when the presumption of negligence which arises upon the establishment of the fact that the fire was communicated from the engine to the property destroyed is rebutted by proof of proper appliances and careful management and operation. Osburn v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 19: 742, 98 Pac. 627, — Idaho, —.

14. A prima facie case is established against a railroad company for the destruction of property by fire set by sparks from a locomotive, by proof that fire has been communicated from the company's engine to the property, which resulted in its destruction, since such proof raises a presumption of negligence either in construction and equipment, or in management and operation of its engine, which it is necessary for the defendant to rebut. Osburn v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 19: 742, 98 Pac. 627, — Idaho, —.

15. The derailment and overturning of a freight car in a train is not such evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company towards its brakeman as to cast upon it the burden of exonerating itself from the charge of negligence to absolve itself from liability for injury to him thereby. Henson v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 19: 790, 87 N. E. 85, — N. Y. —.

16. One killed at a railroad crossing under circumstances of which there was no witness cannot be presumed to have been in the exercise of due care in an action to hold the railroad company liable for his death, where the burden of showing due care is on the plaintiff. Shum v. Rutland R. Co. 19: 973, 69 Atl. 945, — Vt. —.

17. Railroad aid bonds issued by a corporation, which contain no recitals as to compliance with the conditions upon which they are to be issued, are entitled to the same presumption, in the hands of bona fide holders for value, as to compliance with such conditions, where proof is made that the proceedings were in fact regular, as though the recitals had been incorporated in them. Quinlan v. Green County, 19: 849, 157 Fed. 33, 84 C. C. A. 537.

18. The holder of negotiable county aid bonds lawfully issued is, by presumption, clothed with the character of a bona fide holder for value. Quinlan v. Green County, 19: 849, 157 Fed. 33, 84 C. C. A. 537.

19. The existence of the record of a deed for more than fifty years, together with the occupation of the land by the grantee for a time subsequently to the date of the record, without anything to show that he claimed under the deed, is not sufficient to raise a presumption of the existence of a duly executed and delivered original. McClerry v. Lewis, 19: 438, 70 Atl. 540, — Me. —.

20. The fact that several times the length of time required by the statute or limitations to bar an obligation on a contract to subscribe to the stock of a railroad company has elapsed since the contract was made, without any step being taken to perfect the subscription, may be considered in support of the presumption raised by other facts in the case, that the obligation to subscribe for the stock has been terminated. Quinlan v. Green County, 19: 849, 157 Fed. 33, 84 C. C. A. 537.

21. If there be a doubt as to whether a sale made by an agent in one state for a merchant in another was completed by the acceptance of the orders by the principal and his shipping of the goods, the contrary cannot be assumed in order to sustain a conviction for the violation of a city ordinance imposing a license tax upon persons soliciting orders for the sale of goods, but the prosecution must establish its case. Kinsley v. Dyerly, 19: 405, 98 Pac. 228, — Kan. —.

22. No presumption of mental suffering will arise in case of failure to deliver a telegram announcing the death of a relative by affinity only, such as a son's wife; and therefore to recover damage for such suffering in such cases facts must be pleaded and proved showing special friendship or affection, although it is not necessary to show that the telegraph company had notice of such facts. Foreman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19: 374, 116 N. W. 724, — Iowa, —.

24. Entries in a trustee's account showing payments on indebtedness due the beneficiaries are admissions against interest, which are proper evidence to show that the payments were made, in a controversy between the mortgagor and the beneficiaries of the trust. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 49 Or. 536.

25. The proofs of death are admissible in evidence in an action upon a mutual-benefit certificate. Beard v. Royal Neighbors of America, 19: 798, 90 Pac. 83, — Or. —.

27. An additional oath need not be administered to the officer in charge of the jury sent to view the locus in quo, unless required by statute. Emporia v. Juengling, 19: 223, 96 Pac. 850, — Kan. —.

Parol and extrinsic concerning writings.

See also infra, 50.

28. Parol evidence is admissible to show formal action by the directors of a corporation upon a proposition which came before them. Iowa Drug Co. v. Souers, 19: 115, 117 N. W. 300, — Iowa, —.

29. The rule against parol testimony to vary written contracts does not apply to usurious agreements. France v. Munro, 19: 391, 115 N. W. 577, 138 Iowa, 1.

30. A bill of lading issued by a common carrier, and signed and accepted by the shipper, constitutes a contract for the shipment of merchandise therein described, the terms of which cannot be varied by parol testimony. Whitnack v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 19: 1011, 118 N. W. 67, — Neb. —.

31. Liability for breach of warranty that the apparatus installed will produce certain results cannot be established by parol under a written contract to furnish certain electrical apparatus, to be first-class and of latest type, all work to be done in first-class manner. Electric Storage Battery Co. v. Waterloo C. F. & N. R. Co., 19: 1183, 116 N. W. 144, 138 Iowa, 309. (Annotated)

32. Parol evidence is admissible in an action by the drawer of a bill of exchange payable to his own order, against a stranger who placed his name on the back of the instrument before delivery, and above which the drawer's indorsement was placed, to show that he intended to become surety for the acceptor, and assume liability to the drawer, notwithstanding the negotiable-instruments law provides that, if the instrument is payable to the order of the drawer, a person not otherwise a party to the instrument, who places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, is liable to all persons subsequent to the drawer, since, the drawer being in legal effect an indorser, the parties are within the provisions of the section of the statute which declares that, as between indorsers, parol evidence is admissible to show the order in which they agreed to be liable. Haddock, Blanchard, & Co. v. Haddock, 19: 136, 85 N. E. 682, 192 N. Y. 499. (Annotated)

Error in excluding opinion of witnesses, see Trial, 1.

33. In a prosecution for maliciously killing and wounding dogs which were chasing and worrying defendant's live stock, evidence of experts as to the habits and traits of the particular breed of dogs, to the effect that they would not in fact harm or injure domestic animals, is inadmissible where the evidence as to the occurrence is direct, and not circumstantial, unless it appear that the defendant at the time had knowledge of such habits and traits. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

Admissions.

34. The declarations of a minor as to his age are admissible in evidence in an action by him to hold his employer liable for personal injuries because he was employed contrary to the provision of a statute making it a misdemeanor to employ minors of less than a specified age. Koester v. Rochester 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Candy Works, 19: 783, 87 N. E. 77, — N. Y. —.

Relevancy and materiality.

Exclusion of evidence of custom in negligence action, see Trial, 2.

35. The mere fact that a will, making no reference to real estate, gives legacies in excess of testator's personalty, will not admit evidence that testator meant by the legacies to repay money loaned him for the purchase of the realty, and therefore intended them to be a charge upon it. Fries v. Osborn, 19: 457, 82 N. E. 716, 190 N. Y. 35. (Annotated)

36. Upon the question of the rental value of a cotton gin which has been operated during past seasons, evidence may be considered of the physical conditions of the property, the conditions which surround it, including its patronage, the success and hazards in the past, and any change for better or worse. Standard Supply Co. v. Carter, 19: 155, 62 S. E. 150, 81 S. C. 181.

37. Upon the question of the damages to be allowed a son for mental anguish in being deprived of the privilege of attending his mother's deathbed, because of neglect to deliver a telegram, evidence is not admissible that he is a physician, and that treatments given by him when she had previously had similar attacks had resulted in recovery, or that she was depressed by his failure to come when expected, which had a tendency to hasten her death. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Williams, 19: 409, 112 S. W. 651, — Ky. —. (Annotated)

38. Upon the question of measure of damages for failure to furnish water to irrigate crops, so that they are lost, evidence is admissible of the value of matured crops of like kind with those planted, in the neighborhood where they were growing. Smith v. Hicks, 19: 938, 98 Pac. 138. — N. M. —.

39. A municipal ordinance forbidding any person to permit water from his eaves to be discharged upon the sidewalk, or to permit any conduit upon his land to discharge water upon the sidewalk, is not immaterial upon the question of the negligence of the property owner who cast water from his own roof upon his own walk in such a manner that it flowed naturally upon the sidewalk. Field v. Gowdy, 19: 236, 85 N. E. 884, 199 Mass. 508.

40. Upon the question of the safety of chimneys left standing during the demolition of a building, evidence is immaterial that a person, in passing the building, walked on the opposite side of the street because he was afraid the chimney would fall. Wilmot v. McPadden, 19: 1107, 65 Atl. 157, 79 Conn. 367.

41. In an action for injury to the driver of a fire wagon by collision with a street car as he leaves the engine house, evidence that the fire captain had complained to the street railway company about the manner in which the street cars were run by the engine house, and that the street railway officials told him the motormen were instructed to keep the cars under control when passing the house, for the reason that a hose wagon or other apparatus might come out on the track, is admissible as emphasizing the fact that an employee at the engine house who signaled the street car just before the wagon left the house was authorized to assume that the car was under control, and would therefore be stopped in time to avoid collision with the outcoming wagon. Dole v. New Orleans R. & L. Co. 19: 623, 46 So. 929, 121 La. 945.

42. Where evidence introduced shows that the particular engine which is identified as having set a fire for the loss occasioned by which damages are sought is no better than any of defendant's other engines, evidence of the setting of other fires a short time previous to the destruction of plaintiff's property is admissible, since, under such conditions and circumstances, the reasonable inference of fact would be that the identified engine would be as likely to throw igniting sparks and live coals and set the fire as was any of the other of the company's engines that are shown to have emitted sparks and fire about the same time. Osburn v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 19: 742, 98 Pac. 627, — Idaho, —.

43. The fact that the space between a main and repair track of a railroad company is at times obstructed so that it cannot be used by conductors in checking their trains is not admissible to show that it was obstructed at the time a particular conductor was injured while attempting to use the main track for that purpose. Neary v. Northern P. R. Co. 19: 446, 97 Pac. 944, 37 Mont. 461.

44. The rule applicable to civil actions for damages for killing dogs, allowing the introduction of evidence showing the pedigree, traits, habits, and reputation of a particular dog which is killed, is not applicable in a criminal prosecution for the malicious killing of the dogs, unless knowledge of the dogs' pedigree, etc., is brought home to the defendant. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

45. Upon trial of a proceeding to procure a right of way for a ditch to conduct water the right to which petitioner claims by right of appropriation, evidence is not admissible as to the rights of other alleged appropriators from the same stream, who are not made parties to the proceeding. Walker v. Shasta Power Co. 19: 725, 160 Fed. 856, 87 C. C. A. 660.

46. The homogeneous business of a master in dismantling machinery in the different buildings of a World's Fair cannot be divided into distinct and separate departments, so as to bring it within a rule to the effect that the superintendent of a distinct department of a vast, diversified business may be a vice principal, by the testimony to that effect of his servants, and such testimony is incompetent for that purpose, as the nature of the business alone can separate it into departments. Westinghouse, C. K. & 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. v. Callaghan, 19: 361, 83 C. C. A. 609, 155, Fed. 397.

47. That, upon examination of the place at which an employee stumbled and fell into a machine to his injury, a nail was found projecting from the floor, will justify a finding that a proper inspection before the accident would have disclosed its presence to the employer. Young v. Snell, 19: 242, 86 N. E. 282, 200 Mass. 242.

48. Evidence that a bolt was missing from a car which had been in a wreck, after it had been removed to the railroad yards, is not sufficient to charge the railroad company with negligence which would render it liable for injuries growing out of the wreck, although the absence of such a bolt might be found to increase the chance of the accident which occurred. Henson v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 19: 790, 87 N. E. 85, — N. Y. —.

49. A cause of action against a railroad company for injuries to a brakeman by the derailment of a train is not established by evidence that one of the trucks under the car was defective, without showing which one, and that a defective forward truck might have caused the accident without showing that it was so caused. Henson v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 19: 790, 87 N. E. 85, — N. Y. —.

50. Proof of the existence of a nail projecting from the floor near a machine a week after an employee stumbles over something at that point and falls into the machine to his injury will justify a finding that it was there at the time of, and was the cause of, the accident. Young v. Snell, 19: 242, 86 N. E. 282, 200 Mass. 242.

51. Proof that a father owned and kept an automobile upon his premises, and that his daughter, aged nineteen, was accustomed to and did drive it, sometimes without permission, there being no proof that the daughter was actually employed by the father to operate the machine, is not sufficient to constitute the daughter the servant of the master, so as to charge him with liability where the daughter, in using the machine without permission, and for her own pleasure in driving her personal friends, negligently injured a person in the highway. Doran v. Thomsen (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 335, 71 Atl. 296, — N. J. —.

52. The confession of one charged with obtaining money by false pretenses by means of a worthless check, that the check was, and was known by him to be, worthless, upon which a conviction cannot be had without corroboration, is sufficiently corroborated by evidence that the check was forwarded through the regular channels for collection, and was returned unpaid. People v. Ranney, 19: 443, 116 N. W. 999, 153 Mich. 293.

53. Evidence corroborating facts stated in a confession, which is necessary to uphold a conviction on the confession, is that which not merely tends to produce confidence in the truth of the confession, but which refers to facts which concern the corpus delicti. People v. Ranney, 19: 443, 116 N. W. 999, 153 Mich. 293.

Variance.

54. There is no variance between a declaration charging a city for negligent injury by the act of its bridge tender, and evidence showing that the injury was caused by persons who, to the knowledge of the city, were employed by its appointee to do the actual work of operating the bridge. Gathman v. Chicago, 19: 1178, 86 N. E. 152, 236 Ill. 9.

Negligence toward, see Negligence, 1-10.

1. An infant who, in conveying property, fraudulently represents that he is over twenty-one years of age, cannot invoke the aid of equity to cancel the deed, though it may be absolutely void, unless he offers to refund the consideration given in reliance upon the truth of such representations, although the grantee may have had prior notice that the grantor was under age, and may not have exercised reasonable care. International Land Co. v. Marshall, 19: 1056, 98 Pac. 951, — Okla. —.

2. An infant who, in conveying property, fraudulently represents that he is over twenty-one years of age, cannot, while in possession of the property, have the deed canceled in equity as a cloud on title, although it may be absolutely void, without offering to refund the consideration obtained by such fraudulent representations, which, in view of his appearance and size, were believed by the grantee. International Land Co. v. Marshall, 19: 1056, 98 Pac. 951, — Okla. —.

Mandatory Injunction.

1. The court will not grant a mandatory injunction to compel the alteration of a completed building to make it comply with the terms of a contract executed before its construction, for the lease of a certain floor space therein. Bromberg v. Eugenetto Construction Co. 19: 1175, 48 So. 60, — Ala. —.

Contract rights.

2. Injunction will not lie to prevent violation of a contract to lease a certain floor space in a building to be constructed after the construction of the building is completed with a provision for less floor space than called for by the contract. Bromberg v. Eugenotto Construction Co. 19: 1175, 48 So. 60, — Ala. —.

Legal proceedings.

3. Equity will not restrain the enforcement of a judgment on the ground that it was secured by perjury unless the perjury is established beyond all reasonable controversy by evidence clear, convincing, and satisfactory. Boring v. Ott, 19: 1080, 119 N. W. 865, — Wis. —.

4. Equity will enjoin the enforcement of a judgment secured by perjury where the judgment debtor used diligence, but failed to discover the perjury in time to be available at the trial, or to secure the relief provided by statute in such cases. Boring v. Ott, 19: 1080, 119 N. W. 865, — Wis. —.

Procedure; parties.

5. Publishers of school books cannot enjoin discontinuance in a particular school of the books published by them because the school board has not complied with the provisions of the statute in making the change, where they have no contract with the patrons of such school to furnish it with their books. Allyn v. Louisville School Board, 19: 1003, 115 S. W. 206, — Ky. —.

(Annotated)

6. Upon a petition to enjoin a town from carrying out an illegal contract consisting of the satisfaction without consideration of a judgment recovered by it, which has in fact been done, a court of equity may set aside the satisfaction and restrain the parties from carrying out the agreement. Farnsworth v. Wilbur, 19: 320, 95 Pac. 642, 49 Wash. 416.

7. A judgment enjoining the performance of a contract which has already been performed is irregular. Farnsworth v. Wilbur, 19: 320, 95 Pac. 642, 49 Wash. 416.

INSURANCE.

Admissibility in evidence of proofs of death, see Evidence, 25.

Agents.

Right of state to reduce compensation of insurance agent, see Constitutional Law, 4, 5; Corporations, 1.

1. A statute limiting the amounts which insurance companies may expend for securing new business does not apply to an existing long-term contract with a general agent, so as to reduce the amounts to be paid him under his contract. Boswell v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. 19: 946, 86 N. E. 532, 193 N. Y. 465. (Annotated)

2. A provision in a contract by a general agent of an insurance company placed in charge of the business in another state, that the contract is subject to the condition that the company continue to be legally authorized to transact business in said district, does not make the provisions of the contract as to compensation subject to future legislation of the state where the company is incorporated. Boswell v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. 19: 946, 86 N. E. 532, 193 N. Y. 465.

3. Changes in premium rates or clauses in present forms of life-insurance policies are not to be construed as new forms, within the meaning of a provision in an agent's contract that the commissions specified in the contract shall not apply to any new forms of policies hereafter adopted. Boswell v. Security Mut. L. Ins. Co. 19: 946, 86 N. E. 532, 193 N. Y. 465.

Insurable interest.

4. An adult son has an insurable interest in the life of his mother although he is not dependent upon her for support and has no direct pecuniary interest in her life. Woods v. Riner, 19: 233, 113 S. W. 79, — Ky. —.

(Annotated)

Validity of policy.

5. That a son, in taking insurance on the life of his mother, contracts with a cousin to pay a portion of the premiums and share in the proceeds of the policy, does not invalidate the policy so far as the rights of the son are concerned. Woods v. Riner, 19: 233, 113 S. W. 79, — Ky. —.

Conditions; warranties; representations.

Truth or falsity of warranties by applicant for insurance as question for court, see Trial, 11.

Materiality of statement of age by applicant for insurance, see Trial, 12.

6. The appointment of a receiver and the taking of actual possession by him in a suit to take possession and control of certain personal property prevents recovery of loss sustained under a fire insurance policy on the property, which provides that, if any change take place in the interest, title, or possession of the property, "whether by legal process of judgment, or otherwise," the policy shall be wholly void. Bronson v. New York F. Ins. Co. 19: 643, 63 S. E. 283, — W. Va. —.

(Annotated)

7. Courts will never construe a statement by an applicant for insurance as a warranty unless the language of the policy is so clear as to preclude any other construction. Spence v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. 19: 88, 86 N. E. 104, 236 Ill. 444.

8. To constitute a warranty a representation by an applicant for insurance must appear in the contract itself. Spence v. Cen- tral Acci. Ins. Co. 19: 88, 86 N. E. 104, 233 Ill. 444.

9. An insurance company is not precluded from relying on breach by the insured of conditions and warranties inserted in the policy by failure to attach to it a copy of the application, which is not referred to in the policy, although they are similar to those contained in the application, under a statute providing that omission to attach a copy of the application to the policy will preclude the company from alleging or proving any such application or representations, or falsity thereof or any parts thereof, in an action on the policy, but permits the insured to plead or prove the application or representation at his pleasure. Kirkpatrick v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 19: 102, 115 N. W. 1107, — Iowa, —.

(Annotated)

10. A statement in an accident insurance policy that, in consideration of the warranties and agreements in the application, the applicant is insured, does not make the application a part of the contract, so as to render a statement in it as to the age of the applicant a warranty. Spence v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. 19: 88, 86 N. E. 104, 236 Ill. 444.

(Annotated)

11. Consultation by an applicant for insurance with a physician, within the meaning of a question in the application, is shown by the fact that her husband notified the physician that she was indisposed and asked him to attend her, and that, upon his arrival at the house, she advised him of her symptoms and received aid from him. Beard v. Royal Neighbors of America, 19: 798, 99 Pac. 83, — Or. —.

12. A negative answer to a question in an application for insurance the answers in which are made warranties, as to having had la grippe, will avoid the policy where it appears that the applicant had had such disease, although it was a very light attack and may have had nothing to do with his death. Beard v. Royal Neighbors of America, 19: 798, 99 Pac. 83, — Or. —.

Waiver and estoppel.

See also infra, 18.

13. That a letter from an insurer waiving a forfeiture for nonpayment of a premium note is not received or read by the insured before his death does not destroy its effect as a waiver. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Springgate, 18: 227, 112 S. W. 681, — Ky. —.

14. An insurance company is estopped to deny the effect of a demand by its general state agent for payment of a past-due premium note as a waiver of the forfeiture caused by such nonpayment although the policy provides that no waiver of conditions shall be valid unless in writing, signed by an officer of the company. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Springgate, 19: 227, 112 S. W. 681, — Ky. —.

15. Notification of a policy holder by an insurer after his premium note is overdue that, unless the note is paid at once, it will be compelled to return the note, which will cancel the policy, is a waiver of the forfeiture for nonpayment of the note when due; and the insurer cannot thereafter insist upon the forfeiture upon learning that the insured was in a dying condition when the notification was mailed. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Springgate, 19: 227, 112 S. W. 681, — Ky. —.

Risks and causes of loss or injury.

16. A fire burning an automobile originates within the vehicle, within the meaning of an exception of fires so originating in a policy of insurance on it, where, in consequence of the machine's running into a ditch, gasoline leaks from the tank, and the vapor penetrates the lamp forming the headlight and explodes, causing the fire. Preston v. Etna Ins. Co. 19: 133, 85 N. E. 1006, 193 N. Y. 142.

17. Recovery for loss of a barn by being knocked down by lightning, but not burned, cannot be had under a policy in a mutual company insuring against loss by fire, although the custom has been to pay such losses and to levy assessments therefor on the policy holders, since such payments were merely misappropriations of funds by the company. Sleet v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 19: 421, 113 S. W. 515, — Ky. —.

(Annotated)

18. Rupture of the heart, which is in a state of fatty degeneration, by assisting in carrying a door weighing 86 pounds, or by filling the lungs with air by drawing a long breath after putting it down, causing death, is not within the provisions of a policy insuring against death from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means. Shanberg v. Fidelity & C. Co. 19: 1206, 158 Fed. 1, 85 C. C. A. 343.

(Annotated)

Indemnity insurance.

19. A policy holder in a title insurance company which has been judicially declared insolvent is not entitled to the return of that part of the unearned premium upon the winding up of such company's affairs which the application for insurance stipulated might be retained by the company for its services in investigating the title insured. State ex rel. Schaefer v. Minnesota Title Ins. & T. Co. 19: 639, 116 N. W. 944, 104 Minn. 447.

20. The holder of a policy of insurance issued by a real estate title insurance company is, upon a cancellation or annulment of the policy by a judicial decree declaring the company insolvent and appointing a receiver to wind up its affairs, entitled to a return of a proportionate part of the premium paid therefor, measured by the time elapsing between the date of the policy and the date on which the company was so adjudged insolvent. State ex rel. Schaefer v. Minnesota Title Ins. & T. Co. 19: 639, 116 N. W. 944, 104 Minn. 447.

2. Demand for payment of deposits from a bank which stops payment and the assets of which are sequestered by the court is not necessary to entitle them to bear interest from the time of such stoppage. Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. 19: 428, 69 Atl. 771, — Me. —.

3. Interest on a bond to indemnify a surety on a contractor's bond accrues not from the time the surety's liability accrues on the contractor's default, but from the time the duty of the second obligor arises to indemnify the first one for loss suffered because of his undertaking, which, in case he contests liability for the alleged breach of the contractor's duty, is at the time judgment is rendered fixing such liability. American Surety Co. v. Pacific Surety Co. 19: 83, 70 Atl. 584, 81 Conn. 252.

JOINT CREDITORS AND DEBTORS.

1. An acknowledgment by the plaintiff of satisfaction against two of several defendants who are sued as joint wrongdoers will not release the others, where the instrument offered to show such release shows that it was not intended to have such effect. Edens v. Fletcher, 19: 618, 98 Pac. 784, — Kan. —.

2. Where an acknowledgment of satisfaction against two of several defendants who are sued as joint wrongdoers contains an express reservation of the right to proceed against the other wrongdoers, and other expressions in the instrument are not inconsistent with the retention of such right, the intention of the parties that the instrument should not operate as a release of such co-defendants sufficiently appears. Edens v. Fletcher, 19: 618, 98 Pac. 784, — Kan. —. (Annotated)

JOINT TORT FEASORS.

Jurisdiction.

1. A judgment quieting title to real estate against a married woman is valid although she was sued in her maiden name, in which stood the title to the property.—especially where, for the purposes of the marriage contract, she had changed the form of her Christian name so that there was nothing of record to indicate that she had married or changed her name. Emery v. Kipp, 19: 983, 97 Pac. 17, — Cal. —.

2. A judgment in personam for temporary alimony and attorney's fees cannot be lawfully rendered in a divorce suit brought against a nonresident husband who is only constructively served by publication, and who does not appear in the case. Hood v. Hood, 19: 193, 61 S. E. 471, 130 Ga. 610.

Conclusiveness; collateral attack.

3. One made a party to a suit by substituted service of process, who, after judgment, appears and moves to set aside the judgment for lack of jurisdiction, which motion is denied, cannot raise such question in a collateral proceeding to quiet title to property involved in that suit. Emery v. Kipp, 19: 983, 97 Pac. 17, — Cal. —.

4. A judgment discharging a subscriber to the stock of a corporation as garnishee for its debt upon failure of the plaintiff to contest his answer denying indebtedness is res judicata of the question of indebtedness in a subsequent direct proceeding by the creditor against him to apply his individual stock subscription to the payment of the corporate indebtedness. Roman v. Montgomery Iron Works, 19: 604, 47 So. 136, — Ala. —. (Annotated)

5. A judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover the contract price of light furnished a municipal corporation is no bar to a subsequent action to recover the value of the light upon quantum meruit. Water, Light, & Gas Co. v. Hutchinson, 19: 219, 160 Fed. 41, — C. C. A. —.

Foreign judgments.

Imprisonment for disobedience of order to pay alimony due under foreign decree, see Contempt.

6. The fact that persons against whom an injunction has been granted may go beyond the jurisdiction of the court, so that it cannot reach them to punish them for contempt in case they disobey the injunction, does not avoid the decree, since, being entitled to full faith and credit in every other state, it may be enforced against them wherever they are found and may be served with personal process. Taylor v. Hulett, 19: 535, 97 Pac. 37, — Idaho, —.

7. The courts of one state may enforce a decree of another state for alimony payable in instalments where no power to change the decree is reserved by the court or conferred by statute. Mayer v. Mayer, 19: 245, 117 N. W. 890, — Mich. —.

8. The courts of one state may not enforce payment of arrears under a decree of another state directing one party to a divorce suit to pay the other a certain amount per month for support of the children where the court reserved the right to modify the order in regard to the children at any time. *Mayer v. 2. A landlord does not comply with his agreement to furnish water to irrigate the crops to be grown on the land, from an artesian well on the property, by completing through a contractor whose contract antedated the lease a well sufficient to furnish the water, if the contractor, for the purpose of securing his compensation, immediately caps and locks the well to that to procure the water the tenant would be compelled to break the lock. Smith v. Hicks, 19: 938, 98 Pac. 138, — N. M. —.

3. The enactment during the term of a lease of a hotel including a barroom, of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, does not entitle the lessee, in the absence of a provision therefor in the contract, to a reduction or proportional abatement of the agreed rental, since the lessee is not deprived of the beneficial use of the premises, as he can still use them for other purposes not prohibited by law or the contract. *Lawrence v. MALICE.

As gist of action for maliciously killing dog, see Animals, 1, 2.

As essential ingredient of crime of malicious mischief, see Malicious Mischief, 1, 3, 4.

MALICIOUS MISCHIEF.

1. Malice is an essential ingredient of the crime of malicious mischief, and a conviction cannot be sustained in the absence of any evidence disclosing such malice. State v. Minor, 19: 273, 117 N. W. 528, — N. D. —.

2. "Maliciously," as used in a statute relating to the crime of "malicious mischief," while implying an intent to vex and annoy the owner of the property injured, must be given a restricted meaning, and imports that the act to which it relates must have resulted from actual ill-will or revenge. State v. Minor, 19: 273, 117 N. W. 528, — N. D. —. (Annotated)

3. A person who purchases a lot upon which a building of another stands, under a verbal license from the vendor, in the honest belief that by such purchase he acquires the building, and who, after learning of the claimed ownership, notifies such person to vacate, and when this is not done, enters the building, and removes certain property of such other person into the street, and then moves the building to another lot owned by him, is not, by reason thereof, guilty of malicious mischief, as in such case there is nothing from which the necessary element of malice may be inferred. State v. Minor, 19: 273, 117 N. W. 528, — N. D. —.

4. A person cannot be held criminally liable for malicious mischief in wounding and killing dogs while chasing and worrying his live stock, when it clearly appears that he was not acquainted with the owner of the dogs, and in the wounding and killing was not actuated by malice or a wanton or reckless spirit, but acted solely through a desire to remove the dogs, to prevent injury to his property. State v. Churchill, 19: 835, 98 Pac. 853, — Idaho, —.

MANDAMUS.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to restore a party to the possession of an office from which he has been illegally removed. State ex rel. Moyer v. Baldwin, 19: 49, 83 N. E. 907, 77 Ohio St. 532. (Annotated)

1. A boy may be found to be the agent of his father in operating the latter's automobile, where it was purchased mainly at his solicitation, with the understanding that he was to learn to run it for the benefit of the family, if at the time in question he was operating the car under the instructions of the vendor. Hiroux v. Baum, 19: 332, 118 N. W. 533, — Wis. —.

2. Neither one who purchases a building to be torn down and removed from the premises, and who is a suitable person for the purpose, nor his agents, is a servant of the landowner, so as to render him liable for their negligent conduct in the performance of the work. Wilmot v. McPadden, 19: 1101, 65 Atl. 157, 79 Conn. 367.

Master's duty generally.

3. A master cannot be charged with negligence in employing a minor to work on dangerous machinery in violation of the terms of a statute making it a misdemeanor to do so, if, in the exercise of proper vigilance and due caution, he was led to believe that the employee was above the statutory age. Koester v. Rochester Candy Works, 19: 783, 87 N. E. 77, — N. Y. —.

4. One about to employ a minor cannot rely alone on his own representation or that of his parents as to his age in order to absolve himself from liability for negligence in case the employee is injured in his service and is actually of such an age that the statute makes it a misdemeanor to employ him. Koester v. Rochester Candy Works, 19: 783, 87 N. E. 77, — N. Y. —.

Duty to warn or instruct.

See also infra, 30.

5. A master is not negligent in failing to warn an adult employee of ordinary intelligence, who has had several months' experience in drilling holes for blasting, and in actually firing the blasts, of the danger of putting powder into a drill hole in which the dynamite has been exploded, before the fire from the fuse and wrappings has had time to burn out. Hardy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 19: 997, 115 N. W. 8, — Iowa, —. (Annotated)

Negligence of master as question for jury, see Trial, 8.

6. An employer may be liable for an injury to his employee through his fall into a machine by stumbling over a nail projecting from the floor near the machine, which is concealed by the litter on the floor. Young v. Snell, 19: 242, 86 N. E. 282, 200 Mass. 242. (Annotated)

7. The duty of caring for the safety of a place where the work which the servants are employed to do necessarily changes the character thereof as to safety as the work progresses is the duty of the servants to whom the work is intrusted, and is not the duty of the master. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. v. Callaghan, 19: 361, 83 C. C. A. 660, 155 Fed. 397. (Annotated)

8. One employed to assist in unloading a cargo of coal from a vessel after the apparatus for doing the work is set up has no greater rights against the employer with respect to the safety of the manner in which the work is done than though he was employed at the time it was done. Lond v. Lane & Libby, 19: 680, 69 Atl. 270, 103 Me. 309.

9. The common-law doctrine of the duty of the master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work, which cannot be devolved upon a fellow servant so as to relieve the master, does not apply in favor of a member of a gang of workmen whose duty it was to enter a portion of a trench in course of construction after a blast had been fired by a preceding gang, and assist in removing broken stone, who was injured by the fall of some loose earth from the sides of the trench. Citrone v. O'Rourke Engineering Constr. Co. 19: 340, 80 N. E. 1092, 188 N. Y. 339. (Annotated)

10. A master cannot be charged with liability for injuries to a servant from the fall of an overhanging ledge, a changing condition in the work of removing a bank of earth and gravel, upon the ground that he did not supply the foreman with explosives for the removal of ledges, where it is not shown that there was any demand for explosives, or that they were deemed by the foreman to be necessary, or that the means at hand were ineffectual for the purpose. Russell v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 19: 344, 81 N. E. 122, 188 N. Y. 344. (Annotated)

11. The common-law doctrine of the duty of the master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work, which cannot be devolved upon a fellow servant so as to relieve the master, does not apply in favor of an employee injured while engaged with fellow servants under a competent foreman in a detail of the work of removing a bank of earth and gravel, by the fall of an overhanging ledge, which was the condition on the day of the accident, and not a condition that had previously existed. Russell v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 19: 344, 81 N. E. 122, 188 N. Y. 344.

12. An employee injured by slipping upon a platform used as a passageway in going to and from his work cannot hold the master liable for the injury if the slippery condition was caused by ice formed as a necessary result of trucking done over the platform as part of the regular work of the establishment, or through the negligence of fellow servants, he having long been cognizant of the probability of ice being there in freezing weather. Omaha Packing Co. v. Sanduski, 19: 355, 155 Fed. 897, 84 C. C. A. 89. (Annotated)

13. The rule requiring a master to furnish a safe working place for his servant does not apply to a place at which railroad employees are engaged in clearing the tracks of débris from a landslide. Maloney v. Florence & C. C. R. Co. 19: 348, 89 Pac. 649, 39 Colo. 384. (Annotated)

14. One who puts his servant to work in a ditch is bound, when he takes upon himself the direction and control of the work, to see that the place is reasonably safe when the servant enters it, and is kept reasonably safe so long as the servant is required to stay there. Hilgar v. Walla Walla, 19: 367, 97 Pac. 498, 50 Wash. 470. (Annotated)

15. A servant called from other work to assist in a ditch, upon work of the manner of doing which the master assumes direction and control, is not bound to inquire into the safety of the place where he is told to stand while working. Hilgar v. Walla Walla, 19: 367, 97 Pac. 498, 50 Wash. 470.

16. A telephone wire stretched over and across the track of a railroad company, not sufficiently high to permit an employee standing on the top of a freight car safely to pass thereunder, does not constitute a "defect in the way or track," within the meaning of the Alabama employers' liability act providing that an employer is liable for a personal injury received by his employee where the injury is caused by any defect in the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer, where there is nothing to indicate that the wire is not a mere movable object, temporarily placed too near the track. Hubbard v. Central of Georgia R. Co. 19: 738, 63 S. E. 19, — Ga. —. (Annotated)

17. It may be found to be negligence for a street car company to fail to take precautions against the forgetting or misunderstanding of an order which requires a regular car to await the arrival of a special one before proceeding out on the track, where the result of its nonobservance may be death; and so, where the custom is to notify the conductor and motorman of the regular car of the order, and to post it on the bulletin, failure to comply with the custom may be found to be negligence. Fitzgerald v. Worcester & S. Street R. Co. 19: 239, 85 N. E. 911, 200 Mass. 105. (Annotated)

Assumption of risk.

See also infra, 33.

Assumption of risk by servant of dangers of place of work, see Trial, 10.

18. A workman does not assume the risk of injury by being thrown into a machine by falling over a nail projecting from the floor, where it is habitually covered with litter so that the risk from it is not obvious. L.R.A. (N.S.)

Young v. Snell, 19: 242, 86 N. E. 282, 200 Mass. 242.

19. A servant sent to take measurements underneath a bridge, who, before going beneath it, has an understanding with the bridge tenders that the bridge shall not be raised without a signal from him, does not assume the risk of their negligent violation of that understanding. Gathman v. Chicago, 19: 1178, 86 N. E. 152, 236 Ill. 9.

20. The rule that a direction by the master to continue the use of a defective instrument or tool, coupled with a promise to replace it with one not defective, relieves the servant from the doctrine of assumed risk, if injured during such continued use and because of the defect, does not apply to cases of ordinary labor with a tool of simple construction, with which the servant is entirely familiar, and which he understands, and comprehends as fully as the master. McGill v. Cleveland & S. W. Traction Co. 19: 793, 86 N. E. 989, — Ohio, —.

21. An employee whose duties require the use of an ordinary stepladder, who discovers and appreciates that the stepladder furnished is dangerous and unfit to use, cannot recover from the master for injury sustained while using such ladder, although he had notified the master of its defective condition, and had been ordered to continue its use until a proper one could be furnished. McGill v. Cleveland & S. W. Traction Co. 19: 793, 86 N. E. 989, — Ohio, —.

22. A miner does not, by continuing his work after the master has refused to comply with its statutory duty to furnish necessary props to make the room in which he is working safe, assume the risk of injury from such breach of duty. Johnson v. Mammoth Vein Coal Co. 19: 646, 114 S. W. 722, — Ark. —. (Annotated)

23. A workman is not negligent per se in walking toward a machine in motion without sweeping the litter from the floor to ascertain if it contains projections which may cause him to stumble and fall into the machine. Young v. Snell, 19: 242, 86 N. E. 282, 200 Mass. 242.

24. It is not negligence per se for a miner, knowing that a portion of his room is in need of props which the master refuses to furnish, to continue to work in another portion, the roof of which he has tested, where the fall of the unprotected portion of the roof may affect the portion in which he is working, or may not. Johnson v. Mammoth Vein Coal Co. 19: 646, 114 S. W. 722, — Ark. —.

25. An experienced freight conductor is negligent in walking along a track in a yard, on which is momentarily expected a passenger train, to check the cars of his train, which he can do as conveniently after the passenger train arrives, with his back to the expected train, and without paying any attention to its approach, at a time when switch engines are at work, the noise of which will obscure, more or less, the signals and noise of the passenger train. Neary v. Northern P. R. Co. 19: 446, 97 Pac. 944, 37 Mont. 461.

26. A freight conductor cannot justify or excuse his negligence in walking along a track on which a train is momentarily expected, to check his train, by showing that the company passively acquiesced in the use of tracks for that purpose. Neary v. Northern P. R. Co. 19: 446, 97 Pac. 944, 37 Mont. 461.

Fellow servants.

See also supra, 12.

27. An accident to an employee who stumbles over a nail projecting from the floor and falls into a machine cannot be said to have been caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in failing to remove the litter from the floor, where there is nothing to show that he had neglected to remove it when his duty required him to do so. Young v. Snell, 19: 242, 86 N. E. 282, 200 Mass. 242.

28. One engaged in discharging coal from vessels, who provides suitable apparatus for the work, is not responsible to an employee for the manner in which it is set up by the men employed in doing the work; and therefore he is not liable for injury to an employee caused by the fall of the apparatus because it was fastened to a decayed cleat on the mast of the vessel, without stays to prevent its falling if the fastenings should give way. Loud v. Lane & Libby, 19: 680, 69 Atl. 270, 103 Me. 309.

29. One who enters the employment of another thereby assumes the risk of the negligence of his fellow servants in the performance of all acts which they do while they are not discharging a positive duty of the master. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. v. Callaghan, 19: 361, 83 C. C. A. 669, 155 Fed. 397.

30. Where the method adopted by a salt company for carrying on its business involves the occasional dislodging of masses of salt, thereby covering the floor of a room with fragments moving with such force as to expose to danger employees who are there in the discharge of their duties, and the only adequate way to protect them from such danger is to warn them just before such dislodgment, the giving of such warning is a nondelegable duty of the employer, and its omission imposes a liability for any consequent injury to an employee, regardless of any question of coservice. Brice-Nash v. Barton Salt Co. 19: 749, 98 Pac. 768, — Kan.

31. The forgetting by a conductor of a street car of a verbal order to await the arrival of a special car before taking his car out on the track is not such an immediate and sole cause of an injury resulting from a collision of the two cars as to relieve the company from liability for the death of the motorman on the special car because of its negligence in failing to notify the motorman of the other car of the order, and post it on the bulletin according to custom. Fitzgerald v. Worcester & S. Street R. Co. 19: 239, 85 N. E. 911, 200 Mass. 105.

32. All who enter the employment of a common master to accomplish a common undertaking are prima facie fellow servants, although their grades of service are different, and some direct and supervise the men subject to their command and their work, while others perform the labor. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. v. Callaghan, 19: 361, 83 C. C. A. 669, 155 Fed. 397.

Vice principal.

33. A servant assumes the risk of the negligence of his superior fellow servant in the direction of the men and the work to the same extent that he assumes the risk of the negligence of the fellow laborer by his side, who is engaged in performing the work. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. v. Callaghan, 19: 361, 83 C. C. A. 669, 155 Fed. 397.

34. A foreman employed under a superintendent who was under a manager in dismantling heavy machinery, for which purpose and at his direction a heavy wooden frame had been erected and temporarily fastened in place with guy ropes, is a fellow servant, and not a vice principal, as regards a common laborer whom he had directed to go upon the frame, and who was injured by the falling thereof, caused by the foreman untying one of the temporary guy ropes so that they could use it at another place as a permanent one, as the act of the foreman in untying the rope was the act of a servant in common employment with the injured servant, and is therefore one for which the master is not liable. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. v. Callaghan, 19: 361, 83 C. C. A. 669, 155 Fed. 397.

35. Representations of the foreman in charge of a section of railroad on which a landslide occurs, to the foremen of other sections who have brought their crews to help clear the tracks, that he examined the place before dark and it was safe, are those of a fellow servant of the men engaged in the common enterprise; and the master is not responsible for their inaccuracy. Maloney v. Florence & C. C. R. Co. 19: 348, 89 Pac. 649, 39 Colo. 384.

36. A car despatcher to whom is confided the management of cars on a street railway is an employee intrusted with and exercising superintendence, and whose sole and principal duty is that of superintendence, within the meaning of a statute rendering the employer responsible for the negligence of such person. Fitzgerald v. Worcester & S. Street R. Co. 19: 239, 85 N. E. 911, 200 Mass. 105.

37. An automobile which has been purchased with the understanding that the son of the purchaser shall be taught to operate it may be found to be in possession of the son as agent of the purchaser while the instructions are being given, and not in that of the vendor as an independent contractor. Hiroux v. Baum, 19: 332, 118 N. W. 533. — Wis. —.

38. A municipal corporation is liable for the negligent operation of a bridge by persons employed with its knowledge by its duly appointed bridge tender to do the actual work required in the operation of the bridge, although they are not in the actual employment of the city. Gatham v. Chicago, 19: 1178, 86 N. E. 152, 236 Ill. 9.

39. To render a master liable for the negligence of a servant, the negligent act must be done for the purpose of executing the master's orders, and in doing his work, and while actually engaged in serving the master; and it is not enough to say that the injuries complained of would not have been inflicted without the facilities afforded by the servant's relations to his master. Doran v. Thomsen (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 335, 71 Atl. 296, — N. J. —.

40. A master is not liable for injury sustained by a third person who is kicked by a horse while such horse, which is owned by his servant, who has hired it to another employee of such master, to be used in connection with such employment, is negligently being led through a street, since the horse was not at the time being used in the master's business, or in attempted furtherance thereof, but in the business of the servant who so hired the horse to his coemployee. Kwiechen v. Holmes & Hallowell Co. 19: 255, 118 N. W. 608, — Minn. —.

41. A master is responsible for the torts of his servant, done in the course of his employment with a view to the furtherance of his master's business, and not for a purpose personal to himself, whether the same be done wilfully, but within the scope of his agency, or in excess of his authority, or contrary to the express instructions of his master. Kwiechen v. Holmes & Hallowell Co. 19: 255, 118 N. W. 608, — Minn. —.

42. Whether or not a landowner used due and proper care in selecting one to whom to sell a building to be removed from his land is immaterial if the person is found to have been competent in fact. Wilmot v. McPad-den, 19: 1101, 65 Atl. 157, 79 Conn. 367.

Powers generally.

1. If reasonable doubt exists as to a particular power of a municipality under a grant of general power by a legislature, it should be resolved against the city; but, when the particular power is clearly conferred or is fairly included or inferable from other powers expressly conferred, and is consistent with the purposes of the municipality and the powers expressly conferred, the existence of the power should be resolved in favor of the city, so as to enable it to perform its proper functions of government. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

2. A general grant of power to a municipality by intendment includes all the powers fairly within the terms of the grant that are essential to the purposes of the municipality; but such implied power must not conflict with any expressly conferred power, as the law does not expressly grant certain powers and impliedly grant other powers to conflict therewith. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

3. General powers given a municipal corporation by a legislature are necessarily intended to confer other powers than those specifically enumerated, because of the difficulty of making specific enumerations of all such powers. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

4. Municipalities are subordinate governmental entities, and can exercise only such powers as are legally conferred by express provisions of law, or such as are, by fair implication and intentment, properly incident to, or included in, the powers expressly conferred, for the purpose of carrying out and accomplishing the object of the municipality. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

5. All doubts as to the propriety of the means used in the exercise of an undoubted municipal power should be resolved in favor of the municipality where there is no abuse of power or discretion. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

6. A municipal corporation has a discretion in the choice of means and methods for exercising the powers given it for governmental or public purposes unless expressly or impliedly restrained by statute, and the usual limitations upon the actions of municipalities within their legal powers are good faith and reasonableness, not wisdom or perfection. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

7. The powers, duties, and liabilities of municipal corporations created by legislature as proper and convenient agencies in the work of government, in so far as they relate to governmental matters, are subject to legislative regulation and control. Shigley v. Waseca, 19: 689, 118 N. W. 259, — Minn. —.

Ordinances.

Evidence of ordinance forbidding water to be discharged on sidewalk, on question of negligence of property owner in casting water on walk, see Evidence, 39.

Construction of ordinance imposing license to tax, see License, 2.

8. It cannot be said that a municipal ordinance contract containing invalid provisions for the furnishing of water to a city would not have been passed without the invalid portions, or that an elimination of such portions would cause results not intended by the ordinance, where the expressed purpose thereof was to provide water for the city and its inhabitants, and that can be accomplished by its valid portions. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

9. A city ordinance containing provisions sufficient of themselves to accomplish an expressed lawful purpose is not rendered void in toto by the fact that it also contains separable illegal or improper provisions, when the elimination of the illegal portions will not cause results not intended, or affect the integrity of the remaining portions for the purposes expressed. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

10. Statutory authority to a municipal corporation to require railroad companies operating roads across its streets to light the crossings at night, provided that it shall have no authority to require the railroad to maintain any different kind of light at the crossing from that maintained by the municipality at street crossings, refers simply to the kind of light, and does not compel the requirement of a light of the strength of those maintained at street crossings if one of less power will properly light the crossing. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Salem, 19: 658, 82 N. E. 913, 170 Ind. 153.

(Annotated)

11. A municipal ordinance requiring a railroad company to maintain at places where its tracks cross public streets, during the passage of trains at night, and for not less than thirty minutes prior thereto, except when the moonlight is sufficient, lights of a certain character and power in such manner as to enable persons passing over the crossings to see the tracks and protect themselves from danger of running trains, is not invalid for uncertainty or indefiniteness. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Salem, 19: 658, 82 N. E. 913, 170 Ind. 153.

12. A statute and ordinance requiring the maintenance by a railroad company at street crossings of lights which are not excessive in foggy or stormy weather are not, because they may be so in clear weather, so unreasonable as to amount to unconstitutional invasion of property rights. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Salem, 19: 658, 82 N. E. 913, 170 Ind. 153.

13. A court will not inquire as to the reasonableness of a requirement which a municipal corporation makes of a railroad company with respect to the lighting of the places where its tracks cross streets if it is within the authority conferred upon the municipality by the legislature. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Salem, 19: 658, 82 N. E. 913, 170 Ind. 153.

14. A skating rink is not a nuisance per se, and cannot be made so by municipal ordinance. Johnson v. Philadelphia, 19: 637, 47 So. 526, — Miss. —.

15. Charter authority to regulate, suppress, and impose taxes on skating rinks does not empower a municipality to require such rinks as are not in fact nuisances to close at 6 o'clock P. M. Johnson v. Philadelphia, 19: 637, 47 So. 526, — Miss. —.

Contracts generally.

16. Where a municipal contract for the rendering of public service contains provisions that would be unenforceable because unreasonable, and the law provides for the regulation of the service rendered under the contract, such right to regulate may relieve the apparent unreasonable features of the contract. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

17. Municipal contracts for the rendering of public service will be sustained where the power is given to make the contract, and the terms of it, taken with the law controlling them, are not clearly violative of some provision or principle of law. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

Water and light.

Supply of water by private corporations and supply by municipality to its inhabitants, see Waters, 2-5.

As to rates charged for water, see Waters, 5.

See also supra, 8.

18. Authority to make provisions, within lawful limitations, for securing or furnishing to a city and its inhabitants an abundant supply of good water for all purposes, is a usual and necessary power of a municipality, and such power may be included in powers given in general terms, where there is nothing in the enumeration of particular powers conferred to limit in this particular the operation of the general powers conferred. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

19. The method used by a city which is authorized to provide for the establishment of waterworks, in providing waterworks therefor, is within its lawful discretion, if no particular method is indicated by the law. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

20. The limitations upon the taxing and bonding powers of the city of Tampa, contained in the charter act and the General Statutes of Florida, do not preclude the city from granting privileges in its streets, or from making valid contracts by ordinance to carry out a lawful purpose of the municipality in procuring for the city and its inhabitants an adequate supply of good water for all purposes. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

21. The authority given a municipality in the general law "to make and sink wells, erect pumps, dig drains," etc., is distinct from, and does not limit or qualify, the express particular authority "to pass all laws necessary to guard against fire," or the charter power "to provide for the establishment of waterworks," nor limit the powers given by the general clauses conferring powers upon the municipality. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

Children: dangerous attractions.

1. Persons engaged in the demolition of a building which is left with standing chimneys on Saturday night are not, although the building is uninclosed, bound to anticipate that children may, during the next day, trespass upon the property, undermine the chimneys, and be injured by their fall, so as to be bound to protect against such an occurrence. Wilmot v. McPadden, 19: 1101, 65 Atl. 157, 79 Conn. 367. (Annotated)

2. That a railroad company has left a pile of sand unguarded on a vacant lot adjacent to its tracks, which is attractive to children, will not render it liable to a child who, attracted thereto to play, attempts to board a passing train, to its injury. Swartwood v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19: 1112, 111 S. W. 305, — Ky. —.

(Annotated)

3. It is not the duty of an occupier of land to exercise care to make it safe for infant children who come upon it without invitation, but merely by sufferance. Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Harvey, 19: 1136, 83 N. E. 66, 77 Ohio St. 235.

4. The mere maintenance of an insecurely covered well of hot water upon an open space unfenced from the street, near the rear of a theater, will not render the owner liable for injury to a thirteen-year old child of average intelligence, who falls into it, although the child was allured to the place by a desire to see what was going on in the rear part of the theater. Briscoe v. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. 19: 1116, 62 S. E. 600, 148 N. C. 396.

5. The mere erection of a building with large windows and doors through which can be seen machinery constantly in motion, upon a lot unfenced from the highway, which is calculated to allure children to see the machinery, does not render the owner liable for injury to a child falling into an insecurely covered well of hot water in an open space some distance from the building, where there is nothing to show that children had ever been allured to the premises by the machinery, or that the injured child was so allured. Briscoe v. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. 19: 1116, 62 S. E. 600, 148 N. C. 396. (Annotated)

6. One who, in constructing a railroad in a public street, rightfully leaves a loaded push car standing unfastened and unattended upon the track, may be liable for injury thereby caused to a child not guilty of contributory negligence, who has been permitted to play upon it, where the car is on a grade down which, if it starts, it cannot be readily stopped, and the injury is caused by the child's being caught and crushed while attempting to stop the car after it has been set in motion down the grade. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co. 19: 1094, 96 Pac. 84, 153 Cal. 571.

7. A loaded push car standing upon rails upon which it may be easily moved by children, and of sufficient weight to crush a person over whose body it might pass, is a dangerous thing for children to be allowed to play with. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co. 19: 1094, 96 Pac. 84, 153 Cal. 571. (Annotated)

8. A railroad company owes no duty to a trespassing child to lock or guard its turntables, although such machines are calculated to allure children to them for amusement. Thompson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 19: 1162, 67 Atl. 768, 218 Pa. 444. (Annotated)

9. A railroad company is not liable to an infant who comes upon its premises without invitation, and who is injured there while playing, without its knowledge, with a turntable. Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Harvey, 19: 1136, 83 N. E. 66, 77 Ohio St. 235. (Annotated)

10. A waterworks company is not liable for the death by drowning, of an infant who comes upon its land without invitation, and there falls into a reservoir or basin of water while playing about it, without the knowledge of the company. Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Harvey, 19: 1136, 83 N. E. 66, 77 Ohio St. 235. (Annotated)

On highway.

Injury to person on highway by kick of horse owned by servant but used in employer's business, see Master and Servant, 40.

11. It is not per se negligence for a man sixty-eight years old to stand up while riding on a dray in a city street. Emporia v. Juengling, 19: 223, 96 Pac. 850. — Kan. — (Annotated)

12. One who carelessly ties a horse to a vehicle by a long rope, for the purpose of leading it through a street, is liable in damages for injury sustained by reason of the led horse running upon the sidewalk and kicking a person standing thereon. Kwischen v. Holmes & Hallowell Co. 19: 255, 118 N. W. 668, — Minn. —

Contributory.

Contributory negligence of person injured as question for jury, see Trial, 7.

13. A pedestrian who, upon stepping from the curb into the street for the purpose of crossing it, sees a delivery wagon apparently traveling near the opposite curb, and then proceeds on his way without paying any attention to his surroundings, is negligent, so that he cannot hold the owner of the wagon liable for injury caused by its collision with him through the horses crossing the street diagonally, because of inattention of the driver, whose view is obstructed by articles piled in front of him. Borg v. Spokane Toilet Supply Co. 19: 160, 96 Pac. 1037, 50 Wash. 204. (Annotated)

Imputed.

14. Where a wife may sue in her own name to recover damages for injuries to her person, and her husband has no interest in the recovery, his negligence as driver of the conveyance in which she was riding at the time of the injury will not be imputed to her so as to preclude her recovering against the other negligent person, where, in the particular instance, the relation of principal and agent or master and servant did not exist between them. Louisville R. Co. v. McCarthy, 19: 230, 112 S. W. 925, — Ky. —.

15. Tenants are not precluded from holding one who causes the fall of a wall of the building occupied by them through negligent excavation of the adjoining lot liable for the injury thereby caused to their goods, by the fact that one of the proximate and efficient causes of the falling of the wall was negligence of their landlord. Contos v. Jamison, 19: 498, 62 S. E. 867, 81 S. C. 488. (Annotated)

NEW TRIAL.

Setting aside verdict because of treating of jurors, see Appeal and Error, 27.

1. Mere refusal to enforce formal rules for the questioning of witnesses is not ground for new trial where no material harm is done to the objecting party. Willmot v. McPadden, 19: 1101, 65 Atl. 157, 79 Conn. 367.

2. A new trial will be awarded if the issues submitted in a case are not sufficient to support the judgment rendered. Holler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19: 475, 63 S. E. 92, — N. C. —.

3. A verdict in favor of a passenger injured by the fall of the carrier's bridge must be set aside when the evidence fails to establish his contention that the cause of the accident was one for which the carrier would be liable, and sustained the theory of the carrier that it was caused by a defect for which it was not responsible. Roanoke R. & E. Co. v. Sterrett, 19: 316, 62 S. E. 385, 108 Va. 533.

4. A new trial will not be granted for misconduct of a jury sent to view the locus in quo in talking with strangers, taking measurements, and examining the earth, if no substantial prejudice could have resulted therefrom. Emporia v. Juengling, 19: 223, 96 Pac. 850, — Kan. —.

Sufficiency of notice of tax foreclosure proceedings, see Taxes, 8.

The fact that the owner of a building used a wall upon the land of an adjoining proprietor for the support of his building before the same was destroyed by fire is not such notice as charges a purchaser of the property upon which the wall is situated with knowledge of a stipulation in an unrecorded written contract that the owner of such building might renew the use of such wall in case it should be destroyed and rebuilt. Bowhay v. Richards, 19: 883, 116 N. W. 677, — Neb. —.

Private right of action.

2. A property owner who is compelled, together with his clerks and customers, to witness indecent conduct of the inmates of a bawdyhouse on adjoining property, and to hear loud, boisterous, indecent, and annoying noises made by them and their dissolute companions, suffers a special injury different from that suffered by the general public, entitling him to enjoin the same, notwithstanding the maintenance of such place is a public nuisance. Seifert v. Dillon, 19: 1018, 119 N. W. 686, — Neb. —.

Equitable remedies.

3. The operation of a planing mill which is objectionable to the occupants of neighboring houses by reason of its noise, smoke, soot, and cinders will not be perpetually enjoined where the preponderance of the evidence does not show that it is of such a nature as to deprive normal persons living where complainants live of the comforts of a home, or render living in such homes a positive discomfort. Terrell v. Wright, 19: 174, 112 S. W. 211, 87 Ark. 213.

Defenses.

4. That municipal authorities tolerate the maintenance of a house of prostitution on certain property, in violation of law, constitutes no defense to a suit by a near-by property owner who shows special damage different from that suffered by the general public, to enjoin such maintenance. Seifert v. Dillon, 19: 1018, 119 N. W. 686, — Neb. —.

5. The right of a landowner to restrain an adjoining property owner from using his property as a bawdyhouse, to which persons resort for the purposes of prostitution and lewdness, cannot be defeated by showing that the premises were so used to the knowledge of the plaintiff before he purchased his property. Seifert v. Dillon, 19: 1018, 119 N. W. 686, — Neb. —.

6. The illegal use of property as a house of ill fame constitutes a continuing injury to a near-by property owner which is unaffected by lapse of time. Seifert v. Dillon, 19: 1018, 119 N. W. 686, — Neb. —.

A mayor has no authority originally to hear charges against a police officer and to remove him, and may act only after the chief of police has suspended the officer and filed written charges with the mayor, under a statute, giving the chief of police exclusive right to suspend members of his department, and providing that upon suspension he shall, in writing, certify such fact, together with the cause thereof, to the mayor, who shall render judgment thereon. State ex rel. Moyer v. Baldwin, 19: 49, 83 N. E. 907, 77 Ohio St. 532.

2. The mayor of a city, who sanctions a system of imposing fines upon places where intoxicating liquor is illegally sold, as a method of obtaining public revenue on the traffic, and who fails to make a bona fide attempt to enforce the law against them, or inform the prosecuting attorney of known violations of the law, forfeits his office. Nonjoinder of the husband in a suit against a married woman is waived by her suffering a default judgment to go against her. Emery v. Kipp, 19: 983, 97 Pac. 17, — Cal. —.

PARTITION.

A wife holding land by entireties with her husband is not entitled to partition of trees cut therefrom by him, nor of lumber into which they are converted, since both are seised of the entirety. Jones v. Smith, 19: 1037, 62 S. E. 1092, — N. C. —.

PATRON.

Injury to patron at place of amusement, see Amusements.

PAYMENT.

Admissibility of entries in trustee's account showing payments on mortgage indebtedness due beneficiaries, see Evidence, 24.

Payments to agent, see Principal and Agent, 2, 3.

1. That one constituted trustee to hold a mortgage and note secured thereby, collect rents and payments on the indebtedness, and release portions of the property as payments were made, himself purchases a tract of the mortgaged land and credits the trust account with the purchase price, does not throw upon the mortgagor the duty of seeing that the payment is properly applied; but the beneficiaries for whom he holds the mortgage are chargeable with his neglect to apply the proceeds upon the indebtedness. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 40 Or. 536.

2. The mortgagor, in making payments to the trustee, need not see that they are properly applied, where several persons furnish money to purchase a mortgage, which, together with the note which it secures, is assigned to a trustee, who is to collect rents and receive payments on the principal and apply them in satisfaction of the debt, the share of each contributor being shown by a new note executed to the trustee and indorsed with a guaranty to the contributor. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 40 Or. 536.

PENALTY.

Exclusion of, from evidence, see Appeal and Error, 11.

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS.

Right of one injured by another's negligence to recover value of physician's services, see Damages, 5.

Right to practise dentistry under license to practise medicine and surgery, see Dentists.

1. A husband cannot recover damages for the loss of the society, care, and comfort of his wife, due to her death because of the neglect of a physician engaged by him to attend her to perform his contract, unless the action is brought under the statute providing for damages for death caused by negligence. Sherlag v. Kelley, 19: 633, 86 N. E. 293, 200 Mass. 232. (Annotated)

2. A husband is not precluded from recovering against a physician for breach of his contract to attend his wife, the additional expenses for nursing, care, and treatment due to such breach, by the fact that failure to perform the duty causes the death of the wife. Sherlag v. Kelley, 19: 633, 86 N. E. 293, 200 Mass. 232.

3. The negligent performance by a physician of his contract to a man to furnish medical services to his wife is sufficient to sustain an action against him for breach of the contract. Sherlag v. Kelley, 19: 633, 86 N. E. 293, 200 Mass. 232.

Necessity of pleading special friendship or affection to justify recovery for mental suffering for failure to deliver telegram announcing death of relative by affinity, see Evidence, 22.

Declaration or complaint.

1. Contributory negligence is matter of defense where it does not appear upon the face of the complaint or by the evidence of plaintiff. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co. 19: 1094, 96 Pac. 84, 153 Cal. 571.

2. A general averment of damages for breach of contract in the ad damnum is sufficient where there are previous averments to show a liability, and no special damages are claimed. Sherlag v. Kelley, 19: 633, 86 N. E. 293, 200 Mass. 232.

3. A breach of contract may be assigned in the negative of the words of the contract, unless such negative does not plainly show that there is a breach. Sherlag v. Kelley, 19: 633, 86 N. E. 293, 200 Mass. 232.

4. A complaint upon a bill or note, which does not allege a collateral agreement between the parties whose names are on the instrument, but which seeks to recover against a person otherwise than as provided by the negotiable instruments act, states no cause of action. Haddock, Blanchard & Co. v. Haddock, 19: 136, 85 N. E. 682, 192 N. Y. 499.

5. A declaration in an action to recover damages for breach of contract to sell shares of stock is not insufficient because it does not allege facts to show whether or not the contract was obnoxious to the statute of frauds, if the existence of a valid contract is asserted. Sprague v. Hosie, 19: 874, 118 N. W. 497, — Mich. —.

6. The use of the term "alleyway" in describing the place where a personal injury occurred, does not, of itself, imply that the strip of land was dedicated to public use. Briscoe v. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. 19: 1116, 62 S. E. 600, 148 N. C. 396.

7. A declaration against a manufacturer of canned meats for ptomaine poisoning caused by the eating of unwholesome meat alleged to have been negligently canned and placed upon the market by defendant sets forth a good cause of action notwithstanding the absence of a scienter. Tomlinson v. Armour & Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 923, 70 Atl. 314, 75 N. J. 748.

8. Where by statute fraud is a fact to be specially pleaded, a complaint is not sufficient to assert passive fraud by concealment, which sets out misrepresentations of fact, stating that the true fact was wilfully concealed, and concludes that by virtue of said fraudulent misrepresentations and concealments damage was done. American Surety Co. v. Pacific Surety Co. 19: 83, 70 Atl. 584, 81 Conn. 252.

9. That one knew of a contract with the performance of which he wrongfully interfered is not shown by an allegation that he maliciously prevented its performance. McGurk v. Cronenwett, 19: 561, 85 N. E. 576, 199 Mass. 457.

Pleas and answers.

10. The ownership by a corporation of a certain amount of water for the conveyance of which it is seeking a right of way under the power of eminent domain is not put in issue by a denial that it is the owner or ever was the owner of or entitled to any water which is to be conducted into a certain stream. Walker v. Shasta Power Co. 19: 725, 160 Fed. 856, 87 C. C. A. 660.

11. The burden of proving a contract valid under the statute of frauds may be cast on plaintiff by the plea of the general issue, in an action to recover damages for breach of contract to sell shares of stock in which the declaration alleges the existence of a valid contract. Sprague v. Hosie, 19: 874, 118 N. W. 497, — Mich. —.

Demurrer.

Right to appeal from judgment on demurrer, see Appeal and Error, 3.

12. A declaration to recover damages for the construction of a levee which causes the water to set back on plaintiff's land is not demurrable because it alleges that the levee caused the water to rise higher than normal on the opposite side of the river from and above the levee, which would show injury to lands of others than plaintiff, where the allegation is made simply to show the injury to plaintiff's land. Bradbury v. Vandalia Levee & Drainage Dist. 19: 991, 86 N. E. 163, 236 Ill. 36.

13. A complaint to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land is not demurrable for failure to present facts which will enable the court to say that the consideration is adequate, where it specifically alleges the adequacy of the consideration. Brown v. Sebastopol, 19: 178, 96 Pac. 363, 153 Cal. 704. (Annotated)

14. Although a complaint which charges no wilful or intentional misconduct on the part of a railway company in carrying a corpse beyond the contracted point of delivery to an intersecting carrier, whereby the funeral arrangements were delayed, does not state a cause of action for the recovery of damages for mental anguish, it does state a cause of action for nominal damages for breach of the contract of carriage, and a demurrer thereto is properly overruled. Beaulieu v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 564, 114 N. W. 353, 103 Minn. 47.

1. An agent of a corporation may be found to have had power to receive property in satisfaction of notes issued to the corporation where he sold the machinery for which the notes were issued, received the notes and the mortgage securing them, collected all payments upon them, and conducted the proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, although an officer of the corporation states that his authority was only to collect the notes. Northwest Thresher Co. v. Dahlgren, 19: 324, 97 Pac. 228, 50 Wash. 325. (Annotated)

2. Persons furnishing money to purchase a mortgage, which, together with the note which it secures, is assigned to the cashier of a bank as trustee, new notes for the amounts furnished by the respective parties being executed to him and indorsed to them with his guaranty, under the agreement that the trustee shall collect the rents and receive all sums paid on principal, executing releases of the mortgaged property as payments are made, are bound by his act of receiving money; and, in case he becomes insolvent without paying it over, cannot compel a second payment by the mortgagor. McLeod v. Despain, 19: 276, 90 Pac. 492, 49 Or. 536.

3. Buyers of a mortgage, who have left it and the notes secured by it in the hands of a trustee to receive the rents on the mortgaged property and payments on the indebtedness, cannot take advantage of his acts so far as they are advantageous to them and repudiate collections made by him which he failed to turn over prior to his insolvency. *McLeod v. PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Of injury to passenger.

1. The failure of the conductor of a train to notify passengers inside the car that the train had not reached the station when it stopped, notwithstanding the announcement of the porter that the stop would be at the station, was not the proximate cause of injury to a passenger who, without necessity, voluntarily rode on the platform and attempted to alight to his injury when the train stopped; where he could not have heard the notice had it been given within the car, and the train men did not know that he intended to alight at that stop. Wagner v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 19: 1028, 61 S. E. 171, 147 N. C. 315.

Of loss of baggage.

2. Mere delay in forwarding baggage from an intermediate station is not the proximate cause of its destruction by fire while there, so as to render the carrier liable therefor on the ground of negligence in permitting the delay. French v. Merchants & M. Transp. Co. 19: 1006, 85 N. E. 424, 199 Mass. 433.

PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATIONS.

1. Articles of incorporation obtained under a general law authorizing the corporation to engage in the business of rendering public service in a municipality do not ipso facto authorize the corporation to use privileges and franchises that may be conferred by the municipality to render the public service therein. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

2. The law authorizing the regulation of service rendered the public becomes a part of and controls contracts providing for such public service, whether so expressed or referred to in the contract or not. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

Injury to persons on or near track.

1. One undertaking to cross between freight cars standing on a switch track with only a narrow opening between them, to reach a railroad station as a passenger train is arriving, assumes the risk of injury from the opening being closed in the operation of the road, although the track is between the postoffice and depot, where persons may be expected to cross, if the opening is not a continuation of any traveled path; and the railroad company cannot be held liable for injury due to his being caught between the cars if his danger was not known to the railroad employees in time to avoid the injury. Brackett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19: 558, 111 S. W. 710, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 921.

(Annotated)

2. One who goes for a purpose of his own upon a portion of a railroad right of way over which the public has been permitted freely to pass, and which is devoted to the storage of lumber, freight, and railroad materials, has the rights of a licensee. Muse 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 453, 63 S. E. 102, — N. C. —.

3. A railroad does not lose the right to use a portion of its right of way for railroad purposes, such as the storage of lumber and other freight or railroad supplies, by permitting its use by the public, which passes over it in vehicles and on foot to such an extent that it has been designated a street. *Muse v. Contributory negligence.

Direction of verdict in action for killing of person at crossing, see Appeal and Error, 28.

Presumption of exercise of due care by person killed at railroad crossing, see Evidence, 16.

5. A license upon a portion of a railroad right of way used for the storage of lumber and railroad materials cannot hold the railroad liable for injuries caused by a piece of lumber which, lying too close to the track, is struck by a passing train and hurled against him, if, by the exercise of care which an ordinarily prudent man would have exercised under similar circumstances, he could have discovered the danger from its being so struck in time to have avoided the injury. Muse v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 19: 453, 63 S. E. 102, — N. C. —.

6. If a pedestrian struck on a railroad crossing by an engine running 60 miles an hour could, in approaching the crossing, have seen 165 feet along the track when 4 feet therefrom, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that any prudence he might have exercised in looking along the track would not have avoided the accident because of the excessive speed of the engine. *Shum v. Sufficiency of complaint in suit to compel, see Pleading, 13.

1. Equity will not enforce performance of a contract to let a certain amount of floor space in a building to be constructed which would require supervision of the method of construction to produce the requisite space. Bromberg v. Eugenotto Construction Co. 19: 1175, 48 So. 60. — Ala. —.

Contracts as to real property.

2. Specific performance of a contract for sale of property may be refused where it was obtained by a person of superior mental ability from an aged, inexperienced, and ignorant woman, who was persuaded to refrain from consulting an adviser, and whose racial prejudices were appealed to for present execution of the contract, while circumstances which might enhance the value of the property were not disclosed to her. Banaghan v. Malaney, 19: 871, 85 N. E. 839, 200 Mass. 46.

3. Specific performance of a contract to convey land will not be denied because the consideration was services to be rendered by the grantee, if they have been fully performed. Brown v. Sebastopol, 19: 178, 96 Pac. 363, 153 Cal. 704.

4. The right of a town to specific performance of a contract to convey land to it in consideration of its opening and constructing a road through other property of the grantor without expense to him is not affected by the fact that some of the money for the construction of the road was gathered by private subscription, and did not all come from the public treasury. Brown v. Sebastopol, 19: 178, 96 Pac. 363, 153 Cal. 704.

5. The right of a town to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey property to it in consideration of its opening a street is not affected by a finding that the agreement was made with members of the board of township trustees, if they were acting for the town. Brown v. Sebastopol, 19: 178, 96 Pac. 363, 153 Cal. 704.

6. An incorporated town having charter authority to purchase real estate may compel specific performance of a parol agreement to convey to it real estate in consideration of its opening a road through remaining property of the grantor, after it has fully performed its agreement and been let into possession, and the former owner has disclaimed further interest in the property and been relieved from taxation on it on that account. Brown v. Sebastopol, 19: 178, 96 Pac. 363, 153 Cal. 704.

STATE.

A proceeding to disbar an attorney for unfitness to practise his profession because he has collected money for clients which he has refused upon demand to pay over may be instituted by the commonwealth's attorney in the name of the commonwealth, although a statute permits him to be disbarred for the cause specified upon application of the person whose money is withheld. Com. v. Roe, 19: 413, 112 S. W. 683, — Ky. — (Annotated)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

See Contracts, 4-8.

STATUTES.

Validity of statute requiring license for sale by sample of goods made in other state, see Commerce, 7.

Validity of statute requiring lights at railroad crossings, see Municipal Corporations, 12.

Partial invalidity.

Partial invalidity of ordinance, see Municipal Corporations, 8, 9.

1. A state statute applicable to every corporation operating a line of railroad wholly or partly within the state, which limits the hours during which its telegraph operators and train despatchers may be allowed to work, and which restricts the employment of all operators, without discrimination as to the character of their services, cannot be upheld as applying only to operators engaged exclusively on business wholly within the state. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 19: 326, 117 N. W. 686, — Wis. —

2. The inclusion of money, which cannot be exempted from taxation, in a provision of a statute exempting credits, which may properly be exempted, does not invalidate the entire exemption. State ex rel. Wolfe v. Parmenter, 19: 707, 96 Pac. 1047, 50 Wash. 164.

Title.

3. A provision of a statute exempting certain property from taxation is not insufficiently covered by the title, which states that it relates to revenue and taxation, by the fact that it further states that it is an amendment of a statute, designated by chapter and year of passage, which designation is clearly erroneous, the statute referred to being on an entirely different subject. State ex rel. Wolfe v. Parmenter, 19: 707, 96 Pac. 1047, 50 Wash. 164. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Special legislation.

4. A statute denying an appeal in a proceeding to contest a local-option election when an appeal is allowed in a proceeding to contest other elections is not unconstitutional special legislation. Saylor v. Duell, 19: 377, 86 N. E. 119, 236 Ill. 420.

Obligation to operate.

1. A street railway company having only the right or license to operate its tracks in a public street until revoked or terminated by the public authorities may cease to use the permission granted, and discontinue the operation of the whole track covered by a particular location under which it was built, at its pleasure, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary. Stiles v. Citizens' Electric Street R. Co. 19: 865, 85 N. E. 419, 199 Mass. 394. (Annotated)

2. The legislature may make the right of a street railway company to discontinue the use of a portion of its tracks subject to TOWNS.

Right to specific performance of contract for sale of land to, see Specific Performance, 4-6.

A town council has no authority to satisfy a judgment obtained by the town upon payment of the costs of the action, since such satisfaction is in fact a gift to the judgment debtor which the council has no power to make. Farnsworth v. Wilbur, 19: 320, 95 Pac. 642, 49 Wash. 416. (Annotated)

TRADENAME.

The one first putting a flaring front on a lamp shell of his design is not entitled to a monopoly on the words "flare front" in connection with lamps, in the absence of anything to show that the words have acquired a secondary meaning. Rushmore v. Manhattan Screw & S. Works, 19: 269, 163 Fed. 939, — C. C. A. —.

TRANSFERS.

Street car transfers, see Carriers, 18, 19.

TREASURE-TROVE.

1. A joint finding of treasure-trove may be found from evidence that, while several workmen were engaged in making an excavation, one discovered the top of an old can, and called the attention of the others to it, whereupon all proceeded to get it out of the soil, in doing which it was broken and its contents of coin disclosed, and that, in securing such contents, other cans containing coin were discovered and secured. Weeks v. Hackett, 19: 1201, 71 Atl. 858, — Me. —.

2. The owner of the soil in which treasure-trove is found acquires no title to it by virtue of his ownership of the land. Weeks v. Hackett, 19: 1201, 71 Atl. 858, — Me. —.

2. One occupying property as a residence may maintain an action for damages against one who wrongfully enters upon the property and attempts to seduce his wife. Brame v. Clark, 19: 1033, 62 S. E. 418, 148 N. C. 364.

TRIAL.

Discretion as to granting or overruling motion to require election between counts, see Appeal and Error, 15.
Statements by counsel in argument of facts outside record, see Appeal and Error, 23.

Reception of evidence.

1. It is not error to exclude the opinion of witnesses as to the dangerous character of an obstruction in a street, where it can be easily described, and the question whether or not it was dangerous easily determinable by the jury. McKim v. Philadelphia, 19: 506, 66 Atl. 340, 217 Pa. 243.

2. Exclusion, in an action for death of a freight conductor by being run over by train while walking along a track to check his train, of evidence that his act was according to custom in railroad yards generally, is not error where he was negligent in becoming so absorbed in his duties as to fail to observe his surroundings. Neary v. Northern P. R. Co. 19: 446, 97 Pac. 944, 37 Mont. 461.

Sufficiency of evidence to go to jury.

3. If, upon plaintiff's evidence in an action to hold another liable for a personal injury, he shows negligence on his part as matter of law, the question of his negligence should not be submitted to the jury. Wagner v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 19: 1028, 61 S. E. 171, 147 N. C. 315.

Questions of law and fact.

Question for jury as to contributory negligence of passenger, see Carriers, 14.

Negligence of employees as question for jury, see Master and Servant, 23.

Question for jury as to contributory negligence of person struck by train, see Railroads, 6.

4. The proper disposition of a case upon the evidence, in case of a substantial conflict therein, must be determined by the jury as a question of fact; but where it is undisputed or is so clearly preponderant that it reasonably admits of but one conclusion, it becomes a question of law to be determined by the court. Bell v. Carter, 19: 833, 164 Fed. 417, — C. C. A. —.

5. The question of reasonable and probable cause, under a statute forbidding suits against a board of health, its officers or agents for their acts in abating a cause of disease, unless upon proof that the board acted without reasonable and probable cause to believe that the alleged cause of disease was in fact prejudicial and hazardous to the public health, is for the court. Valentine v. Engelwood (N. J. Err. & App.) 19: 262, 71 Atl. 344, — N. J. —.

6. Whether or not a city employee sent by an officer of one department of the government to take measurements of a bridge, and the persons tending the bridge, who are in another department of the government, and under the control of other officers, and whose duties do not bring them into habitual association with the former, are fellow servants, is a question for the jury. Gathman v. Chicago, 19: 1178, 86 N. E. 152, 236 Ill. 9.

7. That a person chose to board a street car after it was in motion, and was therefore on the running board looking for a seat when the car reached an obstruction near the track, which was in plain view, when he might have boarded the car before it started and gained a seat inside the car, or might have stopped the car and gained one, was not negligence as matter of law, so as to preclude his holding the person responsible for the obstruction liable for the injury resulting from collision therewith; but the question of his negligence was for the jury. United States Exp. Co. v. Kraft, 19: 296, 161 Fed. 300, 88 C. C. A. 346.

8. Whether or not a master, in attempting to remove a tongue of earth from between two ditches, renders the place where the servant is to work unsafe by attempting to throw down too long a section at one time without precautions to prevent accident in case of mistake of judgment, is for the jury, where there is a fair inference from the evidence that such is the fact. Hilgar v. Walla Walla, 19: 367, 97 Pac. 498, 50 Wash. 470.

9. Whether or not the negligence of a railroad conductor, who, in his work, negligently placed himself in the way of an expected passenger train, will preclude his holding the railroad company liable for injuries received from the train, is for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that the train was running at an extraordinary and illegal rate of speed, not under full control as required by the company's rule, and might have been stopped before striking him after the engineer discovered that he was so absorbed in his work that he was not conscious of his peril; since these facts, if found to exist, would justify an inference of reckless and wanton negligence, justifying a recovery notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff. Neary v. Northern P. R. Co. 19: 446, 97 Pac. 944, 37 Mont. 461.

10. Whether the dangers of a place in which a servant is directed to work were so plain and obvious that persons would not differ concerning it, so that the servant assumes the risk of working there over the positive assurance of the master that it is safe, is a question for the jury. Hilgar v. Walla Walla, 19: 367, 97 Pac. 498, 50 Wash. 470.

11. The truth or falsity of warranties by 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) an applicant for insurance may be determined by the court when the beneficiary has confessed upon the witness stand that they were not true. Beard v. Royal Neighbors of America, 19: 798, 99 Pac. 83, — Or. —.

12. Whether or not a statement of age by an applicant for accident insurance is material is not a question of law where it was not made in response to a direct inquiry by the insurer, or its materiality had not been settled by agreement of the parties. Spence v. Central Acci. Ins. Co. 19: 88, 86 N. E. 104, 236 Ill. 444.

Direction of verdict.

Correctness of directed verdict in negligence case, see Appeal and Error, 28.

13. In an action against a carrier for loss of flax caused by the bursting open of one of the inside doors furnished by the carrier and placed inside the car by the shipper, to retain the flax, the mere fact that the door came open while the car was in transit, without anything else to show the cause of its opening, does not contradict the positive testimony of those who prepared and loaded the car, that the door was properly fastened, so as to create a conflict in the evidence sufficient to render the direction of a verdict for the consignor erroneous, since, without other evidence, and finding of the jury as to what caused the opening of the door could only be arrived at by inference and would have been mere guesswork. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 952, 118 N. W. 826, — N. D. —.

14. Motions for a directed verdict by both parties to an action, without requesting the submission of any facts to the jury upon the denial of the motion, waives any right which either party may have otherwise had to an undirected verdict, and estops them from assigning error for not submitting the facts to the jury. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 19: 952, 118 N. W. 826, — N. D. —.

Instructions.

Exception to charge to jury, see Appeal and Error, 9.

Reversible error in instructions, see Appeal and Error, 22.

Curing error in instructions, see Appeal and Error, 17.

15. An instruction by the court to the jury, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries which involves a direction to find the issue that plaintiff was injured by defendant's negligence, for plaintiff upon the finding of certain facts, should require a finding on the matters of negligence with which defendant is charged. Wagner v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 19: 1028, 61 S. E. 171, 147 N. C. 315.

16. A charge in an action against a man for personal injuries resulting from the negligence of his minor child while driving the father's automobile, which bases the existence of the relation of master and servant between the father and child upon the purpose which the parent had in mind in acquiring the automobile, and its permissive

3. The power to provide waterworks, conferred upon a city by its charter and the general laws, does not authorize the city to grant an exclusive privilege to use the streets of the city for the purpose of furnishing water to the city and its inhabitants. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

4. Provisions in a city ordinance relating to the capacity of a waterworks plant, and authorizing use of the streets, should be construed as subject to an increase of capacity when future necessities may require, where the expressed design is to furnish an adequate supply of good water for all purposes. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

5. Provisions as to rates in a municipal contract for a public water supply are to be constructed as subject to the constitutional power of the legislature to regulate rates. State ex rel. Ellis v. Tampa Waterworks Co. 19: 183, 47 So. 358, — Fla. —.

Cutting off of contingent remainders by merger of life estate in fee, see Life Tenants.

Contest.

1. After issues have been framed covering all the grounds relied on in a caveat to a will, and sent to a court of law for trial, the caveator should not be permitted to dismiss them for the purpose of filing a new caveat, without the consent of the caveatee. Bennett v. Bennett, 19: 121, 86 Atl. 706, 106 Md. 122. (Annotated)

Construction generally.

Refusal of equity to entertain bill to construe, where no trust is involved, see Equity, 1.

Evidence that testator intended legacies to be a charge upon realty, see Evidence, 35.

2. A devise to the children of the life tenant will not be implied from a gift to 19 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one for life, "but, should he die without children, then" to others. Bond v. Moore, 19: 540, 86 N. E. 358, 236 Ill. 576.

3. A half-brother takes no interest in testator's real estate under a will directing the estate to be divided among testator's heirs according to the intestate laws, where such laws permit persons of half blood to share in personality but not in realty, although the will refers to him as "my brother," and a codicil gives him certain stock in addition to what has been given him as heir or distributee under the will. Re Line, 19: 293, 70 Atl. 791, 221 Pa. 374.

4. The word "heirs" in a will may be held to refer to those who should participate in personality as well as in realty, where the intention was to dispose of the whole property; and an interpretation which would exclude them from sharing in personality would result in intestacy as to the major part of the estate. Re Line, 19: 293, 70 Atl. 791, 221 Pa. 374.

5. Under a devise to testator's only child for life, and, should he die without children, to testator's next of kin, the remainder being contingent during the lifetime of the life tenant, the reversion in fee descends to such child as heir. Bond v. Moore, 19: 540, 86 N. E. 358, 236 Ill. 576.

Renunciation.

6. A written renunciation of a devise of an interest in real estate, made the day the will is admitted to probate, defeats a levy upon the property under execution against the devisee. Bradford v. Calhoun, 19: 595, 109 S. W. 502, — Tenn. —. (Annotated)

WITNESSES.

Refusal to enforce formal rules for questioning as ground for new trial, see New Trial, 1.

That one makes the adverse party his witness, does not prevent his proving admissions which had been made by him in conflict with his testimony. Koester v. Rochester Candy Works, 19: 783, 87 N. E. 77, — N. Y. —.
